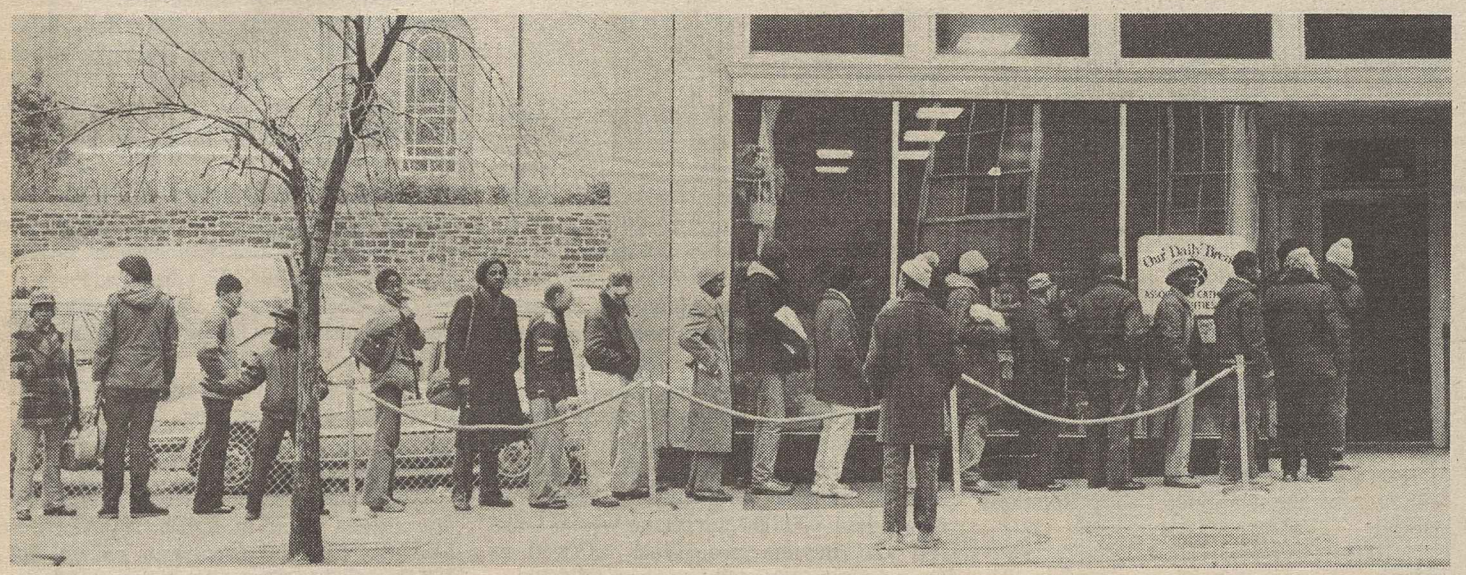
Prospects for economy cloudy



High unemployment and economic hardship cause lines to lengthen at a Baltimore soup kitchen.

15,000 face job losses

U.S. Steel cutbacks deal 'crushing' blow

By Susan Dunlop

For more than 15,000 Steelworkers, their families and the communities they live in, the new year arrived under a cloud of grave economic uncertainty as U.S. Steel Corp. announced plans for drastic production slashes.

In Pittsburgh, Steelworkers Acting President Lynn Williams branded the company's action "devastating news" and a "crushing blow" for about 4,590 active workers and more than 10,800 USWA members already on layoff who now face permanent loss of their jobs.

U.S. Steel Chairman David M. Roderick, in a year-end statement Dec. 27, said the nation's largest steelmaker would cut its steelmaking operations by about one-fifth, idling workers in nearly two dozen facilities either through complete shutdowns or curtailment of operations.

Many of the closings will be in the already hard-hit steel communities in western Pennsylvania, Cleveland and Chicago and in northwestern Indiana. The company is blaming wages and competition from subsidized imports for conditions leading to the shutdown program, which it calls "facility rationalization."

But Williams asserted that no "code word" can minimize "the consequences of shutdown and all the spinoffs of dislocation which continue to ravish the industrial communities so long associated with steelmaking."

He stressed that U.S. Steel's move points up the urgent need for Congress and the Administration to act "to take such decisions away from corporate boards and put them into the realm of national industrial policy."

Williams pointed out that while U.S. Steel is drastically curbing its operations—a move that the company boasts will let it make a profit while operating at only 50 percent of capacity—the nation is going begging for such public facility improvements as new roads, bridges and water systems.

New equipment

He noted that the company also announced plans to reopen and modernize facilities at its Fairfield, Ala., unit and install new, efficient continuous steel casters there and in its Gary, Ind., plant.

But Williams pointed out that workers deserve a share of the credit for those moves, because of their acceptance last March of temporary wage and benefit cuts "that totaled in excess of $3 billion, with the expectation that efforts could be made to revitalize and modernize the industry."

It was the efforts of the Steelworkers—at the national and the local level—"that

Hardships grow for jobless when benefits run out

Baltimore—When jobless workers exhaust their unemployment benefits, it spells increasing hardship for themselves and their families, according to a study done here for the Baltimore AFL-CIO and the Maryland Dept. of Human Resources.

Results of the study commissioned by the state and the city central labor body show that for many area workers whose benefits have run out, the chances of finding another job are slim, and those who do find work generally make much less than before they lost their jobs.

In large numbers, workers surveyed said their families had begun to scrimp on food and were putting off medical or dental care. Many face eviction or foreclosure on their homes and repossession of their cars or furniture.

Jobless workers also reported increasing domestic friction, more drinking and growing concerns about whether long-term joblessness is affecting their children's performance in school.

Henry Koellein, Jr., president of the Metropolitan Baltimore AFL-CIO, said the survey "painted a sad picture of human suffering" in the state.

"People who have worked their whole lives are being forced into poverty. They are going into debt, letting their life insurance lapse, losing their cars, facing a

Labor warns against rosy projections

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO rejected the Administration's forecasts of solid economic growth over the next six years, calling them "iffy" and questionable, and warned that a new downturn is in prospect unless there is a sharp shift in national economic policies.

Deputy Director Henry B. Schechter of the federation's Dept. of Economic Research told a group of Washington journalists that organized labor has "reasons for doubt about the durability of the cyclical upswing—even through 1984—and certainly about the vitality of the American economy on a longer range basis."

Schechter, addressing a conference sponsored by the Washington Journalism Center, stressed that the economy is moving into a post-recovery stage with high unemployment and underemployment, and there is an increasing drag on future growth from the adverse balance of trade. At the same time, inventory rebuilding, defense production and high-income consumer demands are likely to support continued inflationary pressures and high interest rates which are also caused by the huge budget deficits, he said.

In the absence of a viable tax policy, Schechter said, the Federal Reserve Board can be expected to use its traditional money-tightening, high-interest rate tool to suppress rising inflationary pressures.

Recession trigger

"However, that tool has been greatly weakened by basic, long-term changes in the economy, and a resort to prolonged, historically high interest rates will lead into the next recession," he warned.

Unless there is a shift in policies, "the probability of the start of the next downturn will increase with time during 1984 and 1985," he observed.

Just before Christmas, the Administration issued a six-year economic forecast that projects growth of 4.5 percent from the end of 1983 to the end of 1984, followed by annual growth of 4 percent a year through 1988, dropping to 3.7 percent in 1989.

The forecast envisions inflation running at 5 percent by the end of next year and

3 states challenge toxic chemical rule

By Arlee C. Green

New York, Connecticut and New Jersey have filed legal challenges to a new federal "hazard communication" regulation they say would pre-empt their existing state laws protecting workers against toxic chemicals.

All three states filed petitions to intervene in the case initiated by the Steelworkers in the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia on Nov. 22.

Additionally, New York and Connecticut filed separate petitions to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York City for a court review of the Reagan Administration's new standard, a petition similar to that filed by the Steelworkers.

Those two petitions are expected to be combined with the legal actions already before the 3rd Circuit Court, according to New York Atty. Gen. Robert Abrams.

The federal hazard communication standard covers only workers in the manufacturing sector. Abrams and Connecticut Atty. Gen Joseph Lieberman pointed out at a press conference that more than half the workers in their states would be without coverage if the federal law is allowed to pre-empt their state laws.

Limited coverage

Further, Abrams said, the New York law covers more than 57,000 hazardous substances used in the workplace, while the federal regulation covers only about 600. Abrams noted that farm workers are routinely exposed to pesticides, and construction workers come into contact with materials like paint thinner, asbestos, toxic fumes and smoke.

"These workers need protection just as much as those in the manufacturing sector," Abrams said. "A number of state right-to-know laws cover such workers, and there is no excuse to exclude them from protection."

Several industry groups are also moving to intervene in the Steelworkers' case in support of OSHA. These include trade groups representing the oil, chemical, paint, flavoring and fragrance industries.

The decade-long effort by labor to get a strong federal standard was thwarted by the Reagan Administration in 1981 when it withdrew a hazard identification rule proposed by the Carter Administration.

Labor's campaign for strong state regulations has been successful in 14 states and a number of cities. It was this success

Economic woes top 1983 labor news

The economy hit bottom early in 1983, but the road back from double-digit unemployment has been rocky. In a time of difficulty, the trade union movement again proved its resilience.

This is how the year shaped up in terms of labor's concerns, as gleaned from the 51 issues of the AFL-CIO News published during 1983:

January

With unemployment at 10.8 percent, AFL-CIO presses new Congress for quick action on jobs programs. . . . President Reagan's budget proposes further cuts in safety-net programs for the needy coupled with deficit financing of big military build-up. . . . Federal court backs union position, orders OSHA to issue emergency standard to reduce worker exposure to highly toxic ethylene oxide. . . . Bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform reaches consensus on recommendations to keep system financially solvent. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joins in recommendations, but suggests alternative to proposed coverage of federal employees.

People: Maurice A. Hutcheson, Carpenters president from 1952 to 1972, dies at 85.

February

House approves $5 billion first-phase jobs bill, with emphasis on speeding up funding of public works and other programs already authorized. . . . AFL-CIO Executive Council asks that the "small first step" be followed by a full-scale economic recovery program financed largely by tax reforms designed to restore fairness. Other council proposals to ease recession hardships include extended jobless benefits, protections against loss of health insurance, a moratorium on foreclosures and evictions of the jobless. . . . At congressional hearings, labor asks continuation of trade adjustment assistance for workers displaced by imports and opposes Reagan proposal to make workers pay taxes on value of health insurance coverage. Administration's latest youth subminimum proposal is "wrong approach" to reducing teen unemployment, AFL-CIO testifies. . . . Senate confirms Donald Dotson as National Labor Relations Board chairman. Kirkland had expressed "grave reservations" over appointment of a management partisan to protect workers' rights under federal labor law.

People: Presidents William H. Bywater of IUE, Marvin J. Boede of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, and Patrick J. Campbell of Carpenters elected AFL-CIO vice presidents to fill Executive Council vacancies.

March

Congress approves social security changes intended to keep the system solvent, closely following recommendations of the bipartisan reform commission. AFL-CIO welcomes the action, although disappointed with provisions affecting federal employees and with a future rise in the normal retirement age from 65 to 67. . . . Carpenters win pact at Croft Metals

Magnolia, Miss.—Members of Carpenters Local 2280 at Croft Metals, Inc. here have achieved a first contract with the company 14 years after beginning a struggle for their right to union representation.

The one-year agreement with the firm, which makes aluminum doors, windows and other home building products, ends what the Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell termed "one of the longest and most involved first contract disputes in the history of our union." The union also called off its boycott of Croft Metals products, in place since 1977. The action had been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

About 550 workers are covered by the pact which calls for substantial improvements in vacation, holidays and paid leave, seniority protections, improved overtime pay, pension and health and welfare plans.

Although the Carpenters began providing assistance to Croft workers as early as 1969, and the union was certified as bargaining agent in 1971, the company refused to come to the bargaining table until 1975, and then only after the National Labor Relations Board threatened to bring contempt charges. Over the course of the workers' efforts to in a contract, the company was cited by the NLRB and the courts with numerous unfair labor practices stemming largely from its refusal to bargain and its union-busting efforts.

Key campaign themes set forth by Mondale

Walter F. Mondale opened his 1984 campaign for the U.S. presidency by affirming his commitment to liberal domestic goals and pledging to "take charge"—as President—of the nation's foreign policy and reduce the risk of nuclear war.

Kicking off the campaign year with an address to members of the National Press Club in Washington, Mondale dealt directly with criticism of his appeal for support among broad-based groups labeled by the media as "special interests."

Most prominent among these is the AFL-CIO, which has endorsed Mondale's candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Mondale spelled out his own concerns—the "millions of unemployed who ought to have jobs," the millions of young people "who need a good education but are being denied it by the Reagan Administration," the need to turn around the Reagan Administration's "shameful record" of civil rights laws, protection of the environment, enactment of the Equal Rights Amendment, an all-out attack on hunger and poverty, and the use of defense and national strength "to keep the peace and . . . reduce the risk of nuclear war."

'Count me in'

"If those are special interests, count me in," Mondale declared. "I'm proud of every one of them."

He used the Press Club speech to project the key themes of his campaign—"a more competitive economy, a more just society, and a safer world"—and focused the bulk of his address on the last of the three.

Mondale delivered a sharp denunciation of President Reagan's "ad lib foreign policy" and remarked that after three years of the Reagan Administration, "the Middle East and Central America are at war . . . U.S.-Soviet relations are in crisis and . . . a dangerous escalation of the arms race is underway."

Outlining a series of foreign policy positions, Mondale said his first step as President would be to put U.S. relations with the Soviet Union "on a sound footing" that would "check the Soviets through means short of war" while meeting them "on the common ground of survival."

While supporting a strong defense based on a "coherent strategy," he warned against giving the Pentagon "a blank check."

Mondale branded the Reagan Administration's military budget "a shopping spree" that assures "sweetheart contracting, lemon procurement, and management that lurches from outrage to outrage."

Reducing war risk

Mondale called for a strategy to reduce the risk of nuclear war through negotiations with the Soviets on arms reductions, a comprehensive nuclear test ban, and "a mutual and verifiable nuclear freeze."

He called for steps to strengthen the nation's alliances with other countries and pledged to be "a voice again for American values" overseas.

Mondale stressed that "human rights is not the only dimension" of American foreign policy, but said a President "must know the strength that flows from our moral leadership. America must not only stand tall, it must stand for something."

Court slaps down change in federal job seniority rule

A federal district judge in Washington blocked the Reagan Administration from implementing new rules that would have given more weight to job performance than to seniority in determining pay raises and layoffs.

Judge Barrington D. Parker of the U.S. District Court ruled that the regulations, which would affect 1.4 million white-collar federal employees, were "null and void."

Parker agreed with arguments by federal employee unions that Congress had effectively nullified the new rules in a resolution attached to a stopgap spending measure last November.

The Office of Personnel Management, which originally had planned to put the new rules into effect last August, said it will appeal Parker's ruling.

OPM Director Donald J. Devine said that no attempt will be made to use the new rules in any form until the appeal is heard.

The ruling came in response to a suit first brought in early November by the unaffiliated National Treasury Employees Union. The American Federation of Government Employees had filed a similar suit, as had the unaffiliated National Federation of Federal Employees.

President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., hailed the decision and called upon Devine to end his campaign to impose unfair rules against federal workers.

Blaylock, who is also president of AFGE, said the ruling vindicated the congressional action banning the regulations.

Carpenters to the rescue

Members of Carpenters Local 87 in St. Paul, Minn., rounded up donated equipment and materials and worked in sub-freezing weather to build a sorely needed wheelchair ramp at a foster home for the handicapped. The union community service effort was launched after state, county and city governments refused for more than a year to provide funds for the project.

Donahue reaffirms support of Caribbean Basin unions

Bridgetown, Barbados — American labor will continue to cooperate with workers in the Caribbean and elsewhere in the free world in the struggle against oppression and exploitation of any kind, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told delegates to the eighth biennial conference of the Caribbean Congress of Labor.

"We must continue our struggle for jobs and justice—for social justice and for the opportunity for a decent life earned through a decent job," Donahue told the ORIT affiliate's meeting.

Donahue expressed satisfaction with the election of Luis Anderson of Panama as the new secretary-general of ORIT (Regional Inter-American Organization of Workers.) Anderson was elected at a special meeting of ORIT's executive council to succeed Tulio Cuevas of Colombia, who retired in October.

Anderson was formerly president of Local 907 of the State, County & Municipal Employees representing white-collar workers in the Panama Canal Zone.

Also representing the AFL-CIO, a founding member of ORIT, was Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the federation's foreign policy arm in Latin and Central America.

Donahue, who said he anticipated great achievements by ORIT under Anderson's stewardship, observed that the trade union movement in every free nation of the world remains "one of the great civilizing, humanizing, democratizing forces of life."

"It has been, first and foremost, a special interest organization seeking to improve the conditions of life of its members by improving their job-related conditions and trying to insure respect for their individual dignity on the job.

"It has, secondarily, sought to improve the conditions of life of its members by improving the conditions of life of all in a democratic society by political action and legislative efforts."

Rights link urged for Caribbean aid

Stepped-up American aid to countries of the Caribbean Basin is vital to U.S. interests, but should be linked to adherence to basic human rights, labor representatives on a bipartisan study panel declared.

A report by the prestigious Atlantic Council concludes that an enhanced economic development program for the countries and territories in the Caribbean should be of high priority to the United States and that the Reagan Administration is not giving enough attention to the area.

The report represents a two-year effort by a working group of some 50 prominent Americans in business, the academic world, the AFL-CIO, government services, international banking, and research institutions. The Atlantic Council makes policy recommendations on problems and opportunities shared by the western democracies and Japan and submits them to the Executive and Legislative Branches of the U.S. government and to appropriate international organizations.

William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, and Dale Good, special assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland for international affairs, concurred with parts of the policy paper on the Caribbean Basin, but found that it failed to come to grips with some fundamental issues.

In a dissent to the 46-page report, they agreed that the United States should embark on a "comprehensive and imaginative" program for the Caribbean countries, but stressed that "a primary objective of our assistance programs should be to assure that economic benefits of development are shared equitably."

Without necessities

However, they added, "we cannot hope to gain the wholehearted support of workers in the difficult and burdensome task of national development if they are without rights, without freedom, without justice, without bread.

"In granting assistance, a major consideration should be the adherence of recipient governments to the conventions of the International Labor Organization, especially those relating to freedom of association, discrimination, and forced labor."

Doherty and Good also said greater attention needs to be paid to the role of labor movements in country development as well as in improving the social and economic well-being of working men and women.

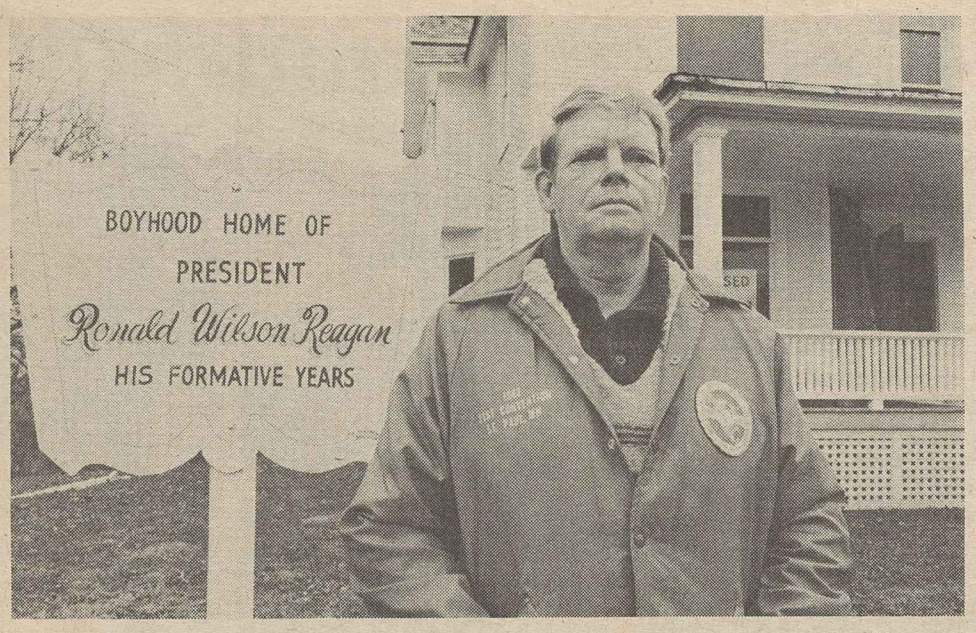
"We need to enlist free labor movements as partners in our assistance programs," they said.

A statement accompanying the panel's report noted that recent events in Grenada culminating in the U.S. invasion of the island nation have provided "additional evidence of Soviet and Cuban efforts to destabilize the region." But the panel considered these efforts to be "aggravating factors" secondary to the need for increased economic development of the area.

Americans need to develop a broad and informed consensus on how best to define and defend U.S. interests in the Caribbean Basin, the study panel observed.

"The countries of the Caribbean Basin confront serious problems," the report said. "Poverty, population pressures, inflation, inequalities of opportunity, and inequities in the distribution of income and wealth frequently have resulted in pressures for social and economic change."

Brent Scowcroft, who was national security adviser to former President Ford, and James R. Greene, dean of the School of Business at Monmouth College, co-chaired the working group.



Jack Cleary, financial secretary of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers local in Dixon, stands before Ronald Reagan's boyhood home.

Residents bitter

Reagan program cuts hit his hometown hard

Dixon, Ill.—The hometown of Ronald Reagan will remember its favorite son this November and it will remember all he has done to them since becoming President of the United States.

In 1980, the town's business community perpetuated a myth that Reagan's election would mean a boom for Dixon, Denny Biester recalled recently. He is the president of State, County & Municipal Employees Local 172 and a direct care worker at the Dixon Developmental Center (DDC) for the retarded.

The AFSCME-represented staff at the DDC has been cut by nearly two-thirds since Reagan took office. The loss of 1,300 jobs in this town of 20,000 population has had a severe impact.

"Even many of our members were positive Reagan wouldn't let Gov. (James R.) Thompson close down the major employer in Reagan's hometown," Biester said. He said he had voted Republican most of his life before getting involved in the union.

Devastated feelings

Local 172 Treas. Sylvia Williams is among the DDC workers who lost their jobs at the center, which houses 5,000 retarded residents. With 21 years at DDC, Williams said she was "devastated" by the loss of her job and finds "it's degrading for me to be on unemployment. The longer I'm unemployed, the less I think of myself."

The full impact of the layoff still hasn't been felt as many of the workers are still drawing unemployment benefits. Nyla Martinez lost her job just after her husband returned to work at a local steel mill following a 16-month layoff.

"I wrote President Reagan and told him that unless he did something soon, Dixon wouldn't be his hometown, it would be his ghost town," Martinez said. She's not surprised that her letter went unanswered.

Tim and Margie Richardson were among the lucky few to keep their jobs at the DDC, but they have felt the impact of Reaganomics in other ways. Her mother, a totally disabled widow, has lost $138 a month as a result of Reagan's cuts in social security programs.

The pair confessed to having never voted, but because of the policies of the town's most famous citizen, Margie is now determined to "learn more about what's going on politically" and Tim has concluded that when he does vote in the next election, it won't be for Ronald Reagan.

Statistics point to the setback Dixon has had under Reaganomics. Despite the tightening of food stamp eligibility under this Administration, the number of families on food stamps in Lee County (where Dixon is located) and adjoining Whiteside County has jumped more than 45 percent between fiscal years 1981 and 1983.

The jobless rate in 1981 was 8.7 percent in Lee County and 10.8 percent in Whiteside. By August 1983, the rate had jumped to 14.5 percent in Lee and 22.6 percent in Whiteside. Meanwhile, federal revenue-sharing funds for Lee County dropped more than 40 percent.

Victims of Reaganomics

Cristina Quinones, an AFSCME Local 2000 member and caseworker at the Lee County Welfare Office, noted that under Reagan policies, it is harder for her to help the victims of Reaganomics.

"People—more and more of them—are coming in saying they've worked all their lives and never asked for anything," she reported, "but we have to turn them away because of the new rules and cuts. All I can say is that I'm sorry." The staff in her office has been cut also, from 18 to 13 persons.

The results of Reaganomics hit especially hard in Dixon's black community.

"The DDC was the major employer of blacks in this area," Rev. A. J. Downing, pastor of the Second Baptist Church, noted. He pointed to a continuing problem of racial discrimination. "Just walk into the banks and grocery stores and see how many black people are working there."

When reminded of Reagan's comment that he grew up not knowing America has a race problem, Rev. Downing observed that Reagan "could not have grown up in this community and not realized that there's a race problem, unless he was wearing blinders."

The economic problems have meant people losing their homes, small businesses folding and cuts in school programs and other services, Rev. Downing said.

Sharp layoffs at the steel and cement factories in the town have also taken their toll. Jack Cleary, financial secretary of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers local, is one of 120 to be laid off from the cement plant since July 1982.

Ready to switch

"Many of our guys are about to lose their houses, and their unemployment insurance is about gone," Cleary said. "Many of them voted for Reagan, but they're ready to switch back to the Democrats."

He pointed out that federal program cuts have hurt Dixon, and he doesn't approve of proposals to raise $1.5 million to restore Reagan's boyhood home.

"Dixon needs $2 million for its sewer system, which I think is a little more important," he said.

Cleary, a lifelong resident, noted his mother "knew Ronald Reagan when he lived here, and she now has no use for him."

Among other contemporaries of Reagan gathered recently at the Lee County Senior Center, one who remembered him from school said, "We were all upset with him about social security and Medicare. He hasn't helped us at all. He's got what he needs and he just doesn't care about us, or Dixon."

Labor blasts watering down of proposed grain dust rule

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration this week released its grain dust safety proposal after watering it down to the taste of the grain industry during its seven-month stopover at the Office of Management & Budget.

"This OMB-OSHA proposal offers no hope, comfort, or consolation, much less protection, for the over 100,000 grain elevator and mill workers who put their lives on the line every day," President Robert F. Harbrant of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. charged.

"Special interest politics has left this nation's grain workers without the protections they are legally due under the OSHA Act," he said, noting that the National Academy of Sciences in its 1982 report singled out strict controls on the buildup of explosive grain dust as the most critical element in preventing explosions.

At the behest of White House budget office, OSHA backed off a plan to limit grain dust accumulations to one-eighth of an inch. The standard, as proposed, will allow the grain processing industry a self-regulatory choice on how to control dust buildup.

The 1982 NAS study had recommended limiting dust buildup to just 1/64th of an inch. The OSHA proposal that went to OMB on May 12, 1983, was eight times that amount.

Efforts by organized labor and congressional representatives to spring the proposal loose from OMB over the seven months proved fruitless as the agency gave precedence to its private discussions with industry groups.

The new language added to the OSHA proposal allows the employer either to install a pneumatic dust control system to control dust accumulations or to develop a "housekeeping program" whereby "a once-per-shift schedule for cleaning the workplace of dust" will be established.

There is no limit set on the amount of dust that can accumulate during a shift and no limit on the amount of residue that can exist after sweeping the facility.

The industry's cost of complying with the proposed standard will drop under the new proposal from $77 million annually to just $22 million, according to OSHA.

Country elevators

OMB's concerns about the impact of the proposed safety standard on "country" elevators, which represent over 90 percent of the nation's grain elevators, were answered by OSHA, which pointed out that most of the "country" elevators are either owned by larger firms or are part of a cooperative. The proposed standard will cover all elevators.

OSHA has been working on the grain safety standard for more than six years as the need for such a standard was made tragically evident by the nation's worst grain elevator explosion which killed 34 workers in 1977. There have since been 143 more explosions and another 108 workers killed.

Harbrant, in noting the fatalities of hundreds of workers, said: "It is a desecration of their memory that the cause of their deaths has been side-stepped once again. The proposed grain standard released today by OSHA, after being massacred by OMB, would not have saved the 108 lives of those killed in grain elevators and mills in the past six years."

The proposed standard will be the subject of public hearings still to be scheduled.

U.S. Steel moves to cut 15,000 jobs opened up the opportunities for new construction and modernization," Williams said, pointing out that the installation of the new equipment at Fairfield would come "after considerable sacrifices in labor agreements" by USWA members there.

Although U.S. Steel had been pressuring workers at other facilities for additional concessions in the weeks preceding its announcement of the shutdowns, USWA members rejected any further cuts, particularly since they could obtain no guarantees that their plants would not eventually be closed anyway.

Williams noted in his statement that the refusal by the union to yield on benefit cuts to laid-off workers "has at least protected those of our members faced with this latest announcement by U.S. Steel."

USWA's master ageement with seven major steelmakers assures that laid-off workers will continue to get supplemental unemployment benefits based on years of service.

In another development, Williams said the union was pleased by U.S. Steel's announcement that it is dropping a planned joint venture with British Steel Corp. to import steel slabs for finishing in plants here. Both the USWA and British steelworkers' unions opposed the move, which would have cost jobs on both sides of the Atlantic.

Williams stressed that the Steelworkers would continue to be vigilant "toward future efforts to bring in offshore steel."

He said the USWA and its members deserve credit for "bringing this issue into the public sector and the legislative process," and stressed that decisions with such far-reaching consequences are "too important" to be left to private corporations alone.

While business analysts noted that U.S. Steel's decision to shut down six plants and trim operations at 23 others would be good for the company's profits picture, the union, social service agencies and churches in the steel communities were bracing for the cost in human terms.

In an interview that appeared in the New York Times, David Bensman, assistant professor of labor studies at Rutgers University, warned that some communities once dependent on steel could become "wastelands" unless the industry's decline is reversed or "new economic schemes" are put in place. Bensman is working on a study of the effects of the steel industry depression on southeast Chicago, which will be hard hit by the closings.

That area, he said, has already seen an increase in family problems, including divorces, as well as the closing of small businesses and the abandonment" of neighborhoods.

Machinists repel raid at Republic Air

The Machinists beat back an attempted raid of Republic Airlines mechanics by the unaffiliated Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Association. The vote was 1,076 to 893.

This was the third election since the airline was formed in 1979 from the merger of North Central Airlines, represented by the IAM and Southern Airways, whose mechanics were represented by the AMFA.

The following year Republic bought Hughes Airwest, where AMFA also represented the mechanics. In an election held then, IAM won by a vote of 1,175 to 1,037.

Three months ago, the AMFA challenged IAM's representation of the 2,500-member unit, gaining enough signed cards to petition the National Mediation Board for an election. The key issue, according to IAM's organizer, King McCullough, was the last contract negotiated with Republic, and approved by the members, which conceded a 15 percent pay cut through June 1, 1984, when the regular scale with increases will be reinstated.

Hardships grow for jobless when benefits end threat of foreclosure and coming to depend on social services," Koellein said, stressing that "what is worst of all is that they have little hope of being re-employed."

Koellein called the toll that long-term unemployment is taking on workers and their famiiles "a disgrace to our society." The solution, he asserted, "is to put people back to work."

Ruth Massinga, secretary of the Maryland Dept. of Human Resources, agreed that the study revealed "extensive gaps" in government assistance to the needy. She called on the Reagan Administration to see that the states get additional funds to run training programs for dislocated workers, and she said the Administration should revise eligibility requirements for federal welfare and medical programs so more jobless workers can qualify for them.

Laid-off Steelworkers pick up groceries at the USWA Local 2609 food bank in Baltimore.

Telephone survey

The study included a telephone survey of 504 jobless workers throughout the state whose unemployment benefits had run out, most about seven months ago.

Maryland law provides for 26 weeks of state benefits, and eight additional weeks are available in federal supplemental compensation.

About two-thirds of the workers who fit the pattern of exhausted benefits could not be contacted by telephone, and the results of the study point out that in many of these cases, workers and their families may have been forced to move or have had their phones shut off.

A key finding was that only about 28 percent of the workers were able to find new jobs, and half of those said they were earning less than in their previous jobs. More than half the households surveyed said their total income, including food stamps and wages of other family members still working, fell to less than $150 a week once benefits were cut off.

More than half said they had to borrow money to pay bills, and 59 percent withdrew savings to help make ends meet.

Of those interviewed, 69 percent said they cut back on the quality or quantity of food, and 30 percent said they had experienced an emergency need for food.

About 23 percent said they had applied for food stamps.

Over two-thirds of the families said they did without or delayed both medical and dental care. While 79 percent of those interviewed said they had had medical insurance while employed, 88 percent lost all or part of their coverage along with their jobs. Of those, 57 percent said they did not replace the lost coverage.

Utilities cut off

More than one of every five households had received a utility turnoff notice, and 10 percent actually had their utilities cut off. About 21 percent said they had experienced an emergency need for fuel.

In other findings, nearly a quarter of the families said they had let life insurance policies lapse, 5 percent had been evicted or had their mortgages foreclosed, 11 percent said they had defaulted on a personal loan, and 4 percent had a car or furniture repossessed.

Nearly 75 percent reported increased irritability with their family and friends, and 43 percent said they felt more withdrawn. Fifteen percent of the workers reported increased use of alcohol, and 14 percent of those with school-age children said they were having behavior or academic problems in school which the parents pegged directly to the family's economic straits.

The study results also showed that of the 28 percent who found new jobs, most found work within the first 12 weeks after exhausting their benefits. After that, the rate of re-employment dropped sharply.

Of those re-employed, 70 percent said they did not plan to remain at the new job, would continue to look for another job or planned to enroll in a training or education program.

About 80 percent of the workers said they were not optimistic about being recalled to their previous jobs.

One up, one down

Two separate federal court rulings in December involving employer attempts to duck out of obligations under union contracts produced contrasting results, one favoring labor and the other going against it.

In Waterloo, Iowa, a bankruptcy judge granted Rath Packing Co.'s request to abrogate a contract with its workers while undergoing reorganization under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code. Among other things, the judge's ruling calls for a $2.50 reduction in the hourly base wage and trims fringe benefits. The company is under a contract with Food & Commercial Workers Local 46.

But in Grand Rapids, Mich., another bankruptcy judge ordered Tucker Freight Lines, Inc., to honor its contract with the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Tucker, a debtor-in-possession also seeking reorganization under Chapter 11, had informed the union that it would unilaterally reduce wages 30 percent, or about $4 an hour. The firm argued that as a new entity, or successor employer, it was no longer subject to the union contract.

Judge Laurence E. Howard of the Western District of Michigan declared that the successor employer rationale "cannot justify Tucker Freight's unilateral change here." The court rejected the view that the purchase of Tucker Freight by another company, Central Transport, established a new entity free to set new terms of employment. "Insofar as the new entity theory is concerned, it doesn't hold water," Howard ruled.

Northrip succeeds Miechur as head of Cement Workers

Elk Grove Village, Ill. — Thomas F. Miechur, president of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers since 1971, will retire Jan. 8. The union's executive board elected Sec.-Treas. Richard A. Northrip, to succeed Miechur, and Vice President Henry W. Bechtholdt was elected the new secretary-treasurer. Their terms end Jan. 1, 1985.

The executive board also voted to schedule a special convention Mar. 14-16 in Las Vegas to act on a merger proposal with the Boilermakers. The Boilermakers convention earlier empowered its board to proceed with merger plans. The CLGW constitution requires a two-thirds vote of the delegates to approve the merger.

Miechur, 60, joined the CLGW in 1942 and served as recording secretary of CLGW Local 8 in Martins Creek, Pa., during the 1940s and '50s. In 1952, he served as an international representative and in 1957, he was elected a district representative. From 1959 to 1971, Miechur was administrative assistant to the CLGW president. He also served as a vice president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and the Maritime Trades Dept.

Northrip, 54, has been a CLGW member since 1953. From 1954 to 1957, he was president of Local 330 in Daytona Beach, Fla. After serving as the District 5 representative from 1957-59, Northrip became secretary-treasurer of the district, staying in that post until 1971, when he became director of District 5. In 1975, he was elected the union's secretary-treasurer.

Bechtholdt, 50, joined the CLGW in 1953 and was elected recording secretary of CLGW Local 190 in Ft. Collins, Colo., in 1955. He was president of the local from 1956 to 1965 when he became the District 1 and 2 representative. Bechtholdt was elected an international vice president in 1971. He also has served as vice president of CLGW District 2, president of District 1 and 2, and president of the Northern Colorado AFL-CIO.

New downturn called likely unless policy change occurs then declining gradually to 3.5 percent at the end of 1989. The Administration sees unemployment dropping from an average of 7.8 percent next year to 5.7 percent in 1989.

Of these rosy predictions, Schechter said in a separate comment that the Administration was engaging in "wishful, bizarre thinking."

"Extraordinarily large budget deficits to be financed, and a large and growing trade deficit hold promise for a combination of continued high levels of real interest rates, unemployment, and business failures which are a prelude to the next business cycle downturn.

"That is much more likely to come in one or two years than in six years," he said.

Schechter pointed to the millions of unemployed workers—officially, 9.4 million by the Labor Dept.'s reckoning, but more like 17 million when the count includes those who are working part-time because they cannot find full-time work and those too discouraged to look for work. He noted that even this unofficial figure may not present the true picture because of questions raised by a large discrepancy between two statistical series used by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to measure employment.

Trends that cast doubt on the durability of any economic upswing over time include a significant shift from reduction of business inventories, to a gradual buildup of inventories, Schechter said in his remarks to the Washington journalists.

Credit upsurge

"Inventory rebuilding is continuing and will require increased business credit to finance it. The current rise in consumer expenditures is matched by an upsurge in consumer credit, also," he told the conference.

Schechter pointed out, too, that increased defense spending under the Reagan budget—while not a direct cause of inflation at this time—could well boomerang in the years just ahead.

"Income generated from defense production increases consumer demand, creating upward pressures on prices of many goods and services," he said. "That may be a factor, along with the effect of the summer drought upon the food supply, in causing an accelerated upward movement of consumer prices."

Declines in interest rates in the second half of 1982 worked to pick up sales of housing and autos. Schechter noted, however, rates began to rise again during the late spring and early summer of 1983 and housing starts and domestic auto sales began to level off or decline. These markets could contract further unless interest rates come down, he warned.

Foreign money

High interest rates in the United States have attracted a heavy influx of investment money from overseas. The result has been a significant rise in the value of the U.S. dollar, putting American-made products at a price disadvantage in international trade, Schechter pointed out.

He termed the negative U.S. balance of merchandise trade—about $70 billion for 1983 and projected at $90-$100 billion in 1984—"a growing drag on the U.S. economy."

Another negative factor in the economic outlook is the size of the current and prospective federal deficit, Schechter warned. The deficit is expected to hover around $200 billion a year through 1988 and mushroom to $280 billion in 1989, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Huge tax cuts, primarily for corporations and wealthy individuals, plus military spending increases, have created a large "structural deficit" in the economy, Schechter noted.

"The outlook for the need to continually finance such large federal deficits contributes significantly to the maintenance of high level interest rates at this time," he said.

The outlook can be expected only to worsen when the Administration, as already indicated, asks for a sizable increase in defense expenditure when the fiscal 1985 budget is submitted to Congress in the next month or so, he said.

Support for Sakharov

A "read-in" by trade unionists, actors, artists and scientists calling for the release of the Nobel Peace Prize laureate Andrei Sakharov from forced internal exile in the Soviet Union draws supporters in New York's theater district. Theodore Bikel, former president of Actors' Equity, reads from Sakharov's writings during the demonstration sponsored by the AFL-CIO and scientific, academic and human rights organizations. Other speakers included Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin, Musical Artists President Nedda Casei, and A. Philip Randolph Institute Chairman Bayard Rustin.

American job losses mount as footwear imports surge

Surging imports of shoes from low-wage countries will cause the closings of 11 American shoe factories and put 3,000 more footwear workers in the jobless ranks, union and industry officials warned.

Five small plants have shut down recently, costing some 1,000 jobs at Melville Corp./Thom McAn. The company announced it will close six of its seven plants this year, costing another 2,000 jobs.

"Tens of thousands of U.S. workers have lost their jobs because their own government refuses to ensure that the domestic shoe industry is treated fairly in the world trading market," charged Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray Finley, Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn and President George Langstaff of the Footwear Industries of America in a joint statement.

Melville's closings, to take effect over the next nine months, "are a direct result of the unprecedented and uncontrolled flood of imported shoes into the U.S. market," they said. Plants will be closed in New Hampshire, North Carolina and Tennessee.

Imported shoes now account for nearly 66 percent of the U.S. market, up from just 21 percent in 1968.

In that year, the United States produced 640 million pairs of shoes and employed over 200,000 workers in direct manufacturing operations. Today, production levels are at the 300,000 million pairs mark and employment has dropped to 110,000. In the same period, imports have grown from 175 million pairs to 550 million pairs.

OSHA report on inspections called inflated

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration is continuing its "public relations ploy" of showing inflated numbers on worksite inspections when the true measure of the agency's effectiveness—the number of workers covered—has declined by 45 percent since fiscal year 1980, Margaret Seminario, the AFL-CIO's job safety specialist, charged.

In releasing preliminary data for fiscal 1983, OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter said his agency is "on track for making the American workplace even safer and more healthful in coming years. . . ." He pointed out that federal inspectors had visited 68,577 work sites in FY 1983 and 63,363 in FY 1980.

Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, noted that 10,368 of the worksite inspections really were "records" inspections. Thus, the actual inspection total is only 58,209, over 9 percent less than the FY 1980 figures.

"The Reagan Administration is grandstanding and cheerleading, when an honest review of the inspection numbers shows there is nothing to cheer about," Seminario said.

Counting contractors

While OSHA touted its increased emphasis on construction site inspections, Seminario said this "artificially skews" the inspection figures because of the way OSHA counts those inspections. Each contractor or subcontractor at a job site is counted as an individual inspection, meaning fewer job sites have to be visited to "artificially" increase the inspection total.

The key to the agency's effectiveness, Seminario declared, is the number of workers covered by its inspections. That number has dropped more than 45 percent from 3,699,862 workers in FY 1980 to 2,032,358 in FY 1983, she pointed out.

Nearly every figure relating to OSHA's inspection program has declined under the Reagan Administration. Manufacturing inspections are down 30 percent; maritime inspections, down 22 percent; follow-up inspections, down 86 percent, and worker complaints, down 51 percent, she noted.

Awards granted in labor journalism competition

Judges in the International Labor Communications Association's 1983 print and broadcast journalism contests presented a total of 107 awards to outstanding labor publications, films, television and radio programs entered in the two contests, which drew a total of 1,109 entries.

Judges for ILCA's print journalism competition praised labor journalism as "healthy and vigorous" and pointed to "increasing imagination and sophistication" in labor's use of many forms of media to communicate with members and the public.

ILCA is the new name of the International Labor Press Association, adopted at the organization's biennial convention last October.

Entries of publications showed "imagination and concern coupled with excellent writing and demonstrating a professionalism which compares quite favorably with some of the best commercial newspapers and magazines," the judges' report said.

Film, videotape, slide and radio broadcast entries indicated that labor organizations are growing "increasingly sure-handed in their use of electronic media to appeal to and inform not only their own members, but also to expand the public's perception about the role of unions in society," the judges observed.

The print journalism panel selected 73 award winners from 999 entries in the competition that judged labor papers on general excellence and achievement in special performance categories.

In ILCA's second film and broadcast competition, judges gave awards to 34 productions out of 110 entries. Categories in this contest included films or videotape programs, radio and television announcements and film strips and slide show.

Judges in the publications contest named Antonio Ramirez of the New York Teacher winner of the association's prestigious Max Steinbock Award. The prize, named for the late president of ILPA, recognizes "the best journalistic effort which exemplifies a humanistic spirit."

Ramirez won the award for a 10-article series, "Prisoners of Conscience," about 10 people, most of them teachers, who have been imprisoned in a number of nations for writings or activities on behalf of human rights. Background for the series was supplied by Amnesty International.

Issue-oriented radio announcements — "Employment Security Funding," New York State Public Employees Federation, SEIU.

Film strips and slide shows—"Building Union," Carpenters, and "Good Times, Bad Times," AFSCME Local 372, New York. The judges also awarded a special commendation to this production.

Ring in the New

NO MATTER how grim the year that was, it is basic human nature to approach the New Year with at least a touch of optimism.

In our imperfect society, there is still too much unemployment and injustice. But our political and economic system has given us the means to remedy this.

The American trade union movement, in its most successful manifestations, has been a healthy blend of pragmatism and idealism.

It has not been dazzled by the vision of a perfect society, a New Jerusalem to be achieved by following a rigid economic dogma as interpreted by some political guru. Unions, nevertheless, have had a vision of a more just society—in the workplace as well as in the larger community.

The tensions of the bargaining table and the confrontations of the picket line have narrowed the inequities of life and humanized the industrial age. As the past two years have made us grimly aware, there have been setbacks to this progress. But at its best, the collective bargaining process has opened the way to creative approaches to help both employers and workers keep afloat in hard times.

A DEMOCRATIC political process has given us laws intended to assure that workers have the right to collective bargaining and that they cannot be punished by their employers for exercising that right.

Other laws mandate safe and healthful workplaces, impose standards for government contractors, and set a floor under wages and a ceiling on hours.

The same democratic process has given us an Administration that has failed to enforce these protections and a President whose insistence on tax breaks for the wealthy has added to the burdens of the poor.

In the campaign leading up to the November presidential and congressional elections, the labor movement and other groups critical of this Administration will be making a strong case for a change in course and leadership.

Then the people will decide. And that's surely ground for optimism.

American Values

AS PRESIDENT, I will be a voice again for American values.

Advancing our values advances our interests. Injustice is the seedbed of revolution; justice is the soil of stability. Societies that begin by being careless about rights end by being casual about terror.

We must not ignore our other vital interests. Human rights is not the only dimension of our policy. But a President must know the strength that flows from our moral leadership. America must not only stand tall, it must stand for something.

But for the last three years, promoting American values has become a tactic and not a principle. When Mr. Reagan sends his Vice President to praise the Philippine dictator for his—quote—love of democracy, when he vetoes congressional efforts to curb Central American death squads, he encourages the extremes, drains our influence, and weakens our nation.

Our concern must run from the terror of the Russian Gulag to the jails of the Latin generals. The banning of South African blacks is no more acceptable than the silencing of Cuban poets. And as the newly elected leader in Buenos Aires has reminded us, the distinction between repressive totalitarians and repressive authoritarians is cold academic comfort to the mothers of the disappeared.

I will return America to principled leadership. We cannot always have our way, but we dare not lose our way.

—From an address by Walter F. Mondale, candidate for the Democratic nomination for President, to the National Press Club, Washington, D.C., Jan. 3, 1984.

Consumers to foot bill for breakup of Ma Bell

By Press Associates, Inc.

Consumers are likely to pay dearly for the breakup of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. unless Congress and state agencies come up with needed protections.

Instead of the one-stop shopping possible under Ma Bell before divestiture, telephone users now must deal with different companies for local service, equipment and long distance service.

More than $10 billion in rate increases have been requested by local operating companies in over half the states and more are expected.

In addition, the Federal Communications Commission has proposed levying "access charges" for long distance service on telephone users.

According to various studies, such increases could double, triple or even quadruple local phone service rates in many areas. This would threaten the federal policy of universal telephone service set by Congress in the 1934 Communications Act.

A CBS/New York Times poll found that 50 percent of Americans over 64 years of age and 72 percent of those with low incomes believe they could not afford a phone if the cost doubled.

Double-talk from Ma

The reasons behind local phone increases are shrouded in confusion. The most repeated explanations, emanating from AT&T's and Bell companies' multi-million dollar public relations and lobbying campaigns, include a loss of so-called subsidies for local operating companies from equipment and long distance.

Before divestiture, the annual $25 billion cost of maintaining wires, poles and other equipment was shared by local and long distance callers. Broken down, the cost is $6.5 billion previously paid by a transfer of AT&T interstate long distance revenue to local companies, $5.4 billion from intrastate long distance charges and $13.1 billion from local customers.

U.S. District Court Judge Harold Greene's divestiture decision intended long distance companies, including AT&T, to pay access charges to local operating companies for use of local loops. These payments would in turn be incorporated into long distance rates as a legitimate part of costs, but ultimately long distance rates would be driven down by competition.

Business burden transferred

But the FCC stepped in with its proposal for a flat transfer of access charges from long distance companies to all phone users, including those who never make long distance calls.

The FCC argued that long distance rate decreases would almost make up for the access charges. But Communications Workers President Glenn Watts warned that the "winners will be big business" while "residential subscribers will be losers."

According to CWA, 4 percent of long distance users, namely corporations, generate 60 percent of long distance billing. Other studies found 50 percent of residential telephone subscribers make only nominal use of long distance and 15 percent make no use of the service at all.

Fortunately for consumers, the House passed a bill which would block the FCC's access charge rule. The Senate is expected to take up the issue early this year.

But Congress can do little to stop other local rate increases, which rest with state rate commissions. As one consumer leader noted, Bell companies are seeking rate increases which contain "their entire list of accumulated fantasies."

Good news in education

An election night computer bank providing voting information to television stations and run by public high school students in Schenectady, N.Y., is featured in the January edition of "Inside Your Schools," a monthly television program produced by the Teachers. The presentation, which looked at positive developments in education, is the fifth in the AFT series. The programs are seen on the Learning Channel, carried by 500 cable systems nationally, as well as a number of Public Broadcasting stations.

Wage protection rule changes delayed pending court action

The Labor Dept. has temporarily pulled back controversial new regulations that organized labor charged will gut the Service Contract Act if they take effect.

The department's deferral of the effective date of the regulations from Dec. 27 to Jan. 27 came on the heels of a lawsuit filed by the AFL-CIO and eight affiliates to stop the Reagan Administration from putting the changes in place.

The delay is part of an agreement by the parties to the suit to aid in getting an expedited decision. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia will hear the case Jan. 13.

Joining the federation in the suit are the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., Machinists, Electrical Workers, Laborers, Service Employees, Transport Workers, Carpenters and Seafarers. Each of the unions has members employed by private firms that have government contracts to provide services to federal agencies.

The AFL-CIO's request for an injunction to block the rule changes asserts that the new regulations demanded by the Reagan Administration violate the intent of the Service Contract Act and go beyond the Secretary of Labor's authority to implement laws passed by Congress.

If the Reagan Administration has its way, a wide range of wage protections for service workers—many already low-paid—would be reduced or cut entirely, the AFL-CIO said.

Although the rule changes were first formally proposed last Oct. 27, the Reagan Administration had indicated it would seek to cut back the protections of the SCA as early as 1981.

The AFL-CIO called the proposed new rules "wage-busting," and said any savings to the government realized from making it easier for contractors to use cheap wages to compete for contracts would only come out of the pockets of workers.

Weakening measure

Among the key changes opposed by organized labor is a provision that would weaken existing "successorship" rules. Those rules now bar a new firm that wins a service contract bid from paying lower wages than the workers employed by the predecessor contractor would have received under an existing collective bargaining agreement. The proposed new rule maintains that protection only if the work is performed in the same locality.

Coverage also would be cut back by excluding services performed under a multipurpose contract where the provision of services is not the primary element of that contract.

The Reagan Administration rules also would exempt certain types of services from coverage, including overhaul and repair work and contracts for maintenance and repair of high technology equipment when the service is provided by a company that also sells such equipment.

In copper strike

House panel assails Phelps Dodge tactics

The chairman of a congressional panel investigating the circumstances surrounding the strike of 13 unions against the Phelps Dodge Corp. charged the firm with deliberately "provoking and prolonging" the walkout.

In a statement announcing the preliminary conclusions of a probe by the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.) accused the Arizona firm of engineering a strike that he said "has proven financially ruinous to the company and imposed unconscionable hardships on employees."

The strike by the union bargaining coalition began on July 1, 1983, and received national attention when Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt (D) called out the National Guard to escort scabs across picket lines.

Just before the expiration of the Phelps Dodge agreements with the 13 unions on June 30, the coalition had successfully negotiated new contracts with other copper firms. These called for a three-year freeze in wages while retaining cost-of-living adjustments and benefits.

Phelps Dodge, however, refused to go along with the industry pattern and insisted, instead, that in addition to the three-year wage freeze, the COL adjustment be eliminated, benefits cut, and a reduced salary structure be put in force for new hires. The panel observed:

"For a number of reasons, the terms put forward by Phelps Dodge were not ones that the unions could reasonably be expected to accept and Phelps Dodge's insistence upon those terms could not help but provoke a strike."

Unions in the coalition include the Steelworkers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Electrical Workers, Machinists, Operating Engineers, Painters, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Railway Carmen, United Transportation Union, the Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The Steelworkers, which leads the coalition bargaining, points out that the company has forced a strike in every round of contract negotiations since 1968.

No serious bargaining

Phelps Dodge has never seriously attempted to reach an agreement with the unions, the Clay subcommittee charged.

"One can only speculate as to whether the company's initial goal was to bust the unions. It is probable, however, that busting the unions is now the only objective that can justify the amount of money, energy and reputation, both personal and corporate, that has been expended in pursuit of the strike policy," it said.

As to why Phelps Dodge chose this time to challenge the unions, the subcommittee observed:

"The political climate, both nationally and locally, may have made it seem a propitious time to force a strike. President Reagan had recently not only successfully broken the air controllers' strike but also busted the union, and the chances of the Administration attempting to intercede on behalf of the workers were slim to none.

"Additionally, Arizona itself is a 'right-to-work' state, with a political atmosphere unlikely to be sympathetic to strikers."

Layoffs hurt

In addition to believing that the political climate was right, the subcommittee observed that the company had good reason to question the workers' financial ability to sustain a strike. Many of its workers had been on layoff status for lengthy periods and had accumulated debts.

After the strike began, Phelps Dodge began a rigid enforcement of credit and rent payment demands at company stores and company housing in the mining communities of Ajo and Morenci.

"Phelps Dodge, in attempting to force its will, has used its tremendous financial hold over the communities as a powerful weapon," the Clay panel observed.

that the Reagan Administration sought to reverse when it issued its watered-down hazard communication rule that specifically asserts pre-emption over the state laws.

While the pre-emption clause will reduce protections for workers in the 14 states with right-to-know laws, the federal rule as a whole would provide little protection to workers.

Margaret Seminario, AFL-CIO safety and health specialist, noted that more than 60 million workers would be denied the right to know what toxic chemicals or materials they are using on the job.

Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, scored the federal rule's protection of manufacturer's trade secrets at the expense of workers. Under the regulation, trade secret information could only be made available to medical personnel in an emergency—after a worker has been injured. And even then, there are a number of stipulations and regulations to which the medical personnel must adhere.

The hazard communication standard is scheduled to go into effect in November 1985.

Recovery pace flattens amid uncertain signals

Recovery from the Reagan Recession of 1981-82 remains spotty, and appears to have settled back to modest gains amid signs of uncertainty.

Interest rates remain high, as does unemployment. Early data on fourth-quarter 1983 economic growth show a slower pace than expected. The government's sensitive index of leading economic indicators fell in November for the first time in 15 months. And more banks failed last year than in over four decades.

Meanwhile, an unsettling report from the Labor Dept., showed an increase of 28,000, to 413,000, in the number of first-time claims for unemployment insurance benefits filed in the week just before Christmas.

It was the highest single-week filing total since the week ended Nov. 19, when 435,000 applications were placed.

The Commerce Dept. reported that its "flash," or early, estimate of real gross national product in the last three months of last year indicated a gain of 4.5 percent at an annual rate, well below the 6-7 percent growth predicted by government economists. Real, or inflation-adjusted, GNP grew at a 7.6 percent annual rate in the July-October quarter.

Deterioration of the nation's trade balance seems to have been the primary reason for the slower-than-expected growth.

Trade deficit

In a separate report, Commerce reported that the nation ran up another unusually high deficit in its foreign trade account in November—$7.4 billion. The month's red ink brought the United States trade deficit this year through November to a record $62.9 billion.

In releasing the November data, the department suggested that the U.S. trade deficit for the full year may top $70 billion. In 1982, the trade deficit was $42.7 billion.

Meanwhile, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., said that 48 banks failed last year—a half-dozen more than collapsed in the previous year and the highest rate since the Great Depression. The government agency attributed the high level of bank failures to sharply fluctuating interest rates in recent years and the 1981-82 recession.

The composite index of 10 leading economic indicators fell four-tenths of 1 percent during November, the first decline since August 1982.

The indicator that contributed most to the decline was vendor performance, which measures the percentage of purchasing agents reporting slower deliveries. More worrisome was a decline in plant and equipment contracts and orders.

Other negative indicators were the average workweek, average weekly initial claims for state unemployment insurance, net business formation, changes in sensitive materials prices, and stock prices.

Rising indicators were manufacturers' new orders for consumer goods and materials, building permits, and the money supply.

In other economic reports, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said that prices as measured by the agency's consumer price index rose a slight one-tenth of 1 percent in November as a result of lower energy and housing costs and stable food prices.

Even this slight rise in prices, however, when coupled with a reduction in average weekly hours and earnings, pushed down real wages by six-tenths of 1 percent. Real earnings over the year rose 2.8 percent.

Gasoline prices

Gasoline prices fell eight-tenths of 1 percent in November, the second monthly drop in a row, after rising sharply from April through September.

Home heating oil prices dropped eight-tenths of 1 percent over the month while natural gas prices fell 1 percent. Electricity prices were up sharply, however.

Grocery store food prices edged down one-tenth of 1 percent largely because of lower prices for fruits and vegetables, meats, poultry, fish and eggs.

Central America panel sets human rights goal

By James M. Shevis

Observance of human rights and democratic principles should be a condition of increased economic and military aid to Central America, including strife-ridden El Salvador, the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America declared.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, one of the 12 commission members, said the panel's recommendations have the federation's support. The recommendations offer "a practical, comprehensive program to bring security and economic progress to that important region," he said.

"Progress in human rights and democratization must be achieved as a condition for continued American assistance," Kirkland stressed.

The commission, headed by former Sec. of State Henry A. Kissinger, has worked since last July to reach basic agreement that expanded American assistance to the region must be accompanied by the development and strengthening of democratic institutions, Kirkland said.

Its proposals would amount to a "new deal" for Central America, Kirkland said. "The AFL-CIO will support the commission's program."

In a 132-page report, the commission called for free elections, free trade unions, strong and independent judicial systems, higher standards of living, and more equitable distribution of income and wealth—particularly the ownership of land—in the region.

The report, which went to President Reagan on Jan. 11, closely parallels American labor's recommendations for protection of workers' rights—as well as U.S. interests—in Central America.

Overall, the report recommends a five-year, $8-billion economic aid program to Central America, with one-fourth of the total aid to be channeled through a new Central American Development Organization (CADO).

Membership in CADO would be initially limited to the seven countries of Central America—Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama—and to the United States. The organization would be chaired by an American with an executive secretary from Central America.

CADO's operating body, in which each member country would be represented, would monitor progress made in each Central American country toward economic, political, and social objectives as well as make recommendations on the allocation of economic resources.

Largely a private sector undertaking,

Delegate selection

Members of AFL-CIO affiliates sign in at a Democratic Party caucus in Manchester, N.H., to elect labor delegates for Walter Mondale to the Democratic Convention in July. The caucuses were the first step in the state's delegate selection process, that will continue after its Feb. 28 primary. (Story, Page 5.)

Reagan budget ax sharpened for new slash at safety net

By David L. Perlman

The Reagan Administration is sharpening its budget ax for a new round of cuts in safety-net programs for the poor and will ask Congress to reshape the Medicare program so that most elderly Americans will pay a bigger share of their health care costs.

Preliminary budget documents that have circulated on Capitol Hill point in the same direction that President Reagan took in his three previous budget proposals. They look to further substantial increases in defense spending and a further shrinkage of social programs.

Under the most optimistic economic assumptions, Office of Management & Budget Director David Stockman has projected a $185 billion deficit for fiscal 1985, the budget year that will begin on Oct. 1, 1984. That's just about the same as the deficit anticipated for the current fiscal year.

With a less rosy projection of economic growth and interest rates, Stockman estimates that carrying out all of the Administration's proposals would bring the fiscal 1985 deficit close to $200 billion. And under both projections, the annual deficits will continue to climb over the next several years unless tax revenues are increased.

A pattern of huge deficits, consuming a gluttonous share of federal revenues merely to pay the interest, is the legacy of three successive years of tax cuts that have been heavily tilted to benefit corporations and wealthy individuals.

Chopping social programs

The tentative Reagan budget, which is subject to change before it is submitted to Congress at the end of January, projects an 11 percent cut from current services spending for Aid to Families with Dependent Children, the primary welfare program, and other "major social service programs."

Other cutback targets include maternal and child health care and job training. Some of the budget savings and revenue estimates are based on the assumption that Congress will adopt presidential proposals that it rejected or ignored last year.

One such repeat proposal would require workers to pay income tax on the value of employer-paid health insurance premiums above a specified level. That's supposed to "encourage" workers, employers and unions to look for cheaper health care options.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said both this proposal and the new Medicare revisions that will apparently be sought by the Administration seek to substitute cheaper "catastrophic insurance" for basic health care.

The Medicare shift would make the elderly pay more for health services in illnesses requiring less than two months of hospitalization. In return, they would be fully covered—at less total cost to the Medicare fund—for catastrophic illnesses of longer duration.

Seidman said the AFL-CIO will call on Congress to reject such a switch, which he said would distort the entire concept of Medicare.

The solution to rising health care costs is reform of the health delivery system, Seidman said, not a retreat to pre-Medicare days when health costs drained the modest incomes and savings of the elderly.

OCAW pacts set pattern in oil industry bargaining

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers reached tentative agreements with Gulf Oil Corp. and Ashland Oil Co., and continued negotiations with other major oil companies even though old contracts had expired.

The Gulf settlement was approved by the union's National Oil Bargaining Policy Committee on Jan. 10, and became the standard for a national pattern. The Gulf offer was matched later the same day by Ashland.

The union served notice it would strike Atlantic Richfield Co. after ARCO refused to apply the pattern pay increases to all job classifications. OCAW President Joseph Misbrener said ARCO had also insisted on unacceptable craft consolidation and flexibility revisions.

Misbrener, who has sole authority under the union's bargaining policy for calling a strike, said the walkout would begin at noon on Jan. 13, unless a settlement were reached beforehand.

The Gulf and Ashland agreements, which must receive formal approval by OCAW rank-and-file members, provide for wage increases of 20 cents an hour in the first year and 35 cents in the second.

Company contributions toward family health care coverage would raise by $15 over the contract term.

Half a dozen different companies have submitted offers but all have included unacceptable variations from the Gulf pattern, Misbrener said. Even though extended contracts have expired, workers will remain on the job without contracts while talks continue, he added.

The major issues in the industry negotiations are wages and health insurance. OCAW represents 50,000 oil company employees nationwide under 331 contracts with about 85 companies.

Children found chief victims of cut in programs

By Susan Dunlop

More American children are in poverty than ever before and the Children's Defense Fund lays the blame squarely on the doorstep of the Reagan Administration's budget cuts in human programs.

Its report, "American Children in Poverty," points out that 13.1 million children lived in poverty in 1982, or 31 percent more than in 1979, according to U.S. Census Bureau data.

Because of the economic recession and "unjust Reagan budget cuts and economic policies," CDF said, "American children are more likely today to suffer death and sickness, hunger and cold, abuse and neglect and to be left alone without adequate child care than three years ago."

They are also much less likely, CDF said, to be born with adequate prenatal care, to be immunized, to have access to preventive health and dental care or to be helped by special education aid for the disadvantaged.

The study found an "alarming nationwide erosion" in prenatal care for pregnant women, and pointed out that babies

Cleary heads New York fed, Corbett retires

New York — Raymond R. Corbett stepped down as president of the million-member New York State AFL-CIO, and the state federation's executive council elected Edward J. Cleary to serve out his term.

Corbett, 68, has been president of the state federation since 1962 and previously had served as its legislative chairman. A member of the Iron Workers since 1939, Corbett remains the secretary-treasurer and business manager of the union's Local 40 in New York City.

Over the years, Corbett has served on a number of public commissions and as a trustee of Cornell University.

Cleary, 53, is a member of the Electrical Workers and for the past 10 years has been secretary-treasurer of both the city and state Building & Construction Trades Councils. Before that, he had been president of IBEW Local 3.

Cleary, who was unopposed, will serve out a term that runs until the State AFL-CIO convention next August.

The executive council has designated Corbett president-emeritus and Sec.-Treas. E. Howard Molisani said in a tribute that Corbett had made "an indelible imprint" on the New York labor movement during his 21-year tenure.

Cleary said his goal is to fully unify private-sector and public-sector unions in the state so that labor will speak with one voice in dealings with the legislature and the governor.

An immediate priority, he said, will be registration and turnout of union members for the Apr. 3 presidential primary and for the election of the slate supporting Walter F. Mondale.

IAM, TWU ratify Eastern Airlines stock-for-pay pact

Miami — Members of the Machinists and Transport Workers voted overwhelmingly for a new contract with Eastern Airlines that will give employees ownership of 25 percent of the company in exchange for wage deferrals.

The 13,500 IAM mechanics, baggage handlers and other ground personnel voted by a 70 percent margin to ratify the agreement, and it was approved 2,410 to 320 by the flight attendants represented by TWU.

The Air Line Pilots, also a party to the tentative settlement reached last December, are expected to vote on the contract in late January.

Under the contract, the IAM and TWU members will forego 18 percent of their pay this year. The money will be put into an investment program to purchase 12 million shares of Eastern's common stock and about 3 million shares of a new issue of preferred stock to be credited to employees based on the amount of wages deferred. Eastern's 16,500 non-union employees agreed to a similar package, and the pilots' agreement calls for a 22 percent deferral.

Eastern, which has lost money for several years, sought new agreements with the unions on the grounds that it needed concessions to keep flying. The company had threatened to declare bankruptcy if workers did not agree to a deep wage cut, but later pulled back on its demands and began bargaining.

Other key features of the settlement give the unions a voice in Eastern's business planning, including two seats on the airline's 18-member board of directors. ALPA and the nonbargaining unit employees already hold one seat each on the board.

Although the wage deferral plan lasts for one year, the unions stressed that the board representation and participation in Eastern's planning and policy-making will be permanent.

Goin' union

Liberty, Tex.—Workers at the Golden Charm Nursing Center here voted 34 to 1 for representation by the Service Employees, marking the fifth time in less than three months employees of Texas nursing homes owned by Beverly Enterprises, Inc., have voted for the SEIU.

Beverly is the nation's largest owner and operator of nursing homes with over 800 facilities in 41 states.

The election on Jan. 4 came two weeks after employees at Beverly's Liberty Nursing Center voted by a 2-to-1 margin for the SEIU as their bargaining agent. Workers at three other Beverly facilities in Texas voted for SEIU representation in elections held last October and November.

Stuart Acuff, an SEIU organizer in Texas, said the election at the Golden Charm facility "is the largest winning margin of any union vote among Beverly employees anywhere in the country."

He pointed out that the five votes for SEIU in a row prove that workers at Beverly homes in the state will vote for union representation "which we believe the company did not think was likely."

A nationwide campaign to help employees at Beverly Enterprises facilities organize unions was launched jointly early in 1983 by the SEIU and the Food & Commercial Workers.

SEIU's organizing drive at Beverly homes in Texas is being aided by the AFL-CIO's Houston Organizing Project.

SEIU and the UFCW were victorious in 24 of 36 elections held in 1983 in their joint Beverly campaign.

USWA asks commitment to industry modernization

The Steelworkers called for a national steel policy based on an industry commitment to modernization.

USWA Acting President Lynn R. Williams, addressing the newly resurrected Steel Advisory Committee of which he is a member, cited aid to long-term jobless workers, enforcement of trade laws, new methods of generating investment capital and efforts to gain an enforceable global policy on steel production as keys to a responsible policy for the industry.

The USWA was critical of the long hatius between the report of the first Steel Tripartite Advisory Committee and the commencement of the second advisory group.

The committee "should not be convened just at the peaks of crises," the union said, adding there should be no "euphoria" about the so-called recovery, because "it has not come to the steel industry."

USWA noted that since President Reagan disbanded the first advisory committee, the industry and its workers have "sustained serious injury," with utilization of steel capacity dropping as low as 34 percent in December of 1982 and to about 55 percent for the first 10 months of 1983. More than 100,000 workers—one quarter of the industry—were reported by the government in November as still on layoff.

The union charged that the absence of an advisory committee during this period meant the industry and its workers were unable to present a coordinated response.

While government aided efforts to gain stability in steel imports from European and Japanese firms, the growth of imports from developing Third World nations jumped, Williams pointed out. As recently as 1981, Third World steel accounted for only 20 percent of all imported steel. Now that share is nearly 40 percent, he noted.

The tripartite, 24-member advisory committee is the "proper vehicle for evolving a national policy for steel," the USWA held. However, such a policy should be based on "a firm commitment by the industry to invest in the modernization of steel facilities. This linkage between policy and modernization must be the common bond upon which labor, management and government cooperation is based."

Trade laws

Williams urged the committee to set a short-term goal of government enforcement of trade laws and encouragement of import restraints "on the part of our steel trading partners." Long-term efforts should be geared to gaining "enforceable global rules governing international steel."

Financing for modernization "should include some socially responsible method for generating investment capital," Williams suggested, noting that while steel companies can generate some capital, supplemental sources of investment capital should be investigated by the committee including "further use of the tax code or some form of public financing, including proposals of an industrial development bank," a proposal which is on labor's priority list as part of a national reindustrialization package.

Tax reforms top proposals by Democrats

A national caucus of prominent Democrats has proposed a package of major tax reforms as an essential first step to reduce federal deficits and set the stage for a lasting economic recovery.

The 90-page package of recommendations, described as "a Democratic blueprint for our nation's future," calls for a four-year program of deficit reductions to achieve the goal of matching "government revenues when the economy is at full employment with government expenditures."

It asks a major restructuring and simplification of the tax system that would do away with many of the tax preferences and tax avoidance schemes which, the study concludes, "make no economic sense."

Beyond tax reforms, it proposes a careful trimming back of both defense spending and so-called "entitlement programs," citing the importance of putting available federal funds to the most productive use.

"Until real progress is made toward shrinking the deficit, we must not add to the outlays in one part of the federal budget without either subtracting from others or raising taxes to cover the new expenditures," the report urges.

New partnership

This fiscal responsibility theme is coupled with a call for "a new partnership for economic growth that enlists business, labor, government and the academic community" to make American industry more competitive.

"After plunging the nation into a deficit crisis, President Reagan refuses to take part in efforts to solve it," the report charges.

The report notes that the Democratic-controlled House and the Republican-controlled Senate had reached a budget compromise last year that, while not fully satisfactory, "did begin the process of reducing the deficit."

But the agreement, which called for new sources of tax revenue, was never implemented because "the President refused to enter into the compromise."

The report suggested Reagan "begin serious negotiations" with Congress on "a bipartisan plan to reduce the massive and dangerous federal deficits we face."

Sponsoring the task forces that drew up the various sections of the report was the National House Democratic Caucus. It is composed of 73 House members chosen to make up an ideological and geographical cross-section and 80 private members with a broad range of expertise and interests. The co-chairmen are Rep. Gillis W. Long (D-La.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, and Robert S. Strauss, a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Joblessness dips but has 'a way to go'

The nation's jobless rate fell two-tenths of 1 percent to 8.2 percent last month, but for millions of Americans unemployment was a stark reality.

While the decline was seen by the AFL-CIO as "a welcome sign," the federation noted that joblessness remained widespread.

The government's official unemployment count does not factor in "discouraged" workers—those who have given up looking for nonexistent jobs—nor those who are working part-time because they cannot find full-time employment.

Federation economists pointed out that if the 1.5 million discouraged workers and half the 5.7 million part-time workers were counted, the jobless rate would be 12 percent, or 13.6 million people out of work.

"There is still a long way to go to reduce unemployment to the 5.8 percent level of 1979," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald stressed.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the average rate of unemployment in 1983 was almost as high as in 1982—9.6 percent as compared with 9.7 percent. Both rates were substantially higher than those for 1981 and 1980 when they were 7.6 and 7.1 percent, respectively.

While the past year's improvement in the job situation was good news, Oswald noted that there is a big difference in the two Labor Dept. sampling surveys.

Conflicting surveys

As measured by the monthly survey of households, civilian employment rose by 335,000 people to 102.9 million in December. A separate survey of nonfarm payrolls showed an employment increase of 231,000 over the month, significantly less than the household survey.

Over the past 12 months, the household survey has shown employment up by 4 million, while the establishment survey has shown an increase of only 3 million. The difference amounts to almost a percentage point variation in the jobless rate, Oswald observed.

The bad news in the government's report on unemployment was that joblessness among black workers hit 17.8 percent, up from 17.7 percent in November.

The December drop in the jobless rate was the result of the gain in employment and relatively sluggish growth in the labor force. The labor force, which includes all those who are working or seeking work, grew by only 104,000 to 113.8 million, BLS said.

Except for black workers, unemployment improved in December for all groups of workers. The jobless rate for adult men dropped from 7.8 percent to 7.4 percent, a substantial improvement from the 10 percent unemployment rate of a year ago. The rate for teenagers, at 20.1 percent last month, was down from 24.3 percent a year earlier.

The 8.2 percent jobless rate was the best since December 1981, but still a full percentage point higher than the 7.2 percent of July 1981 when the Reagan Recession got under way.

Central America panel sets rights goal

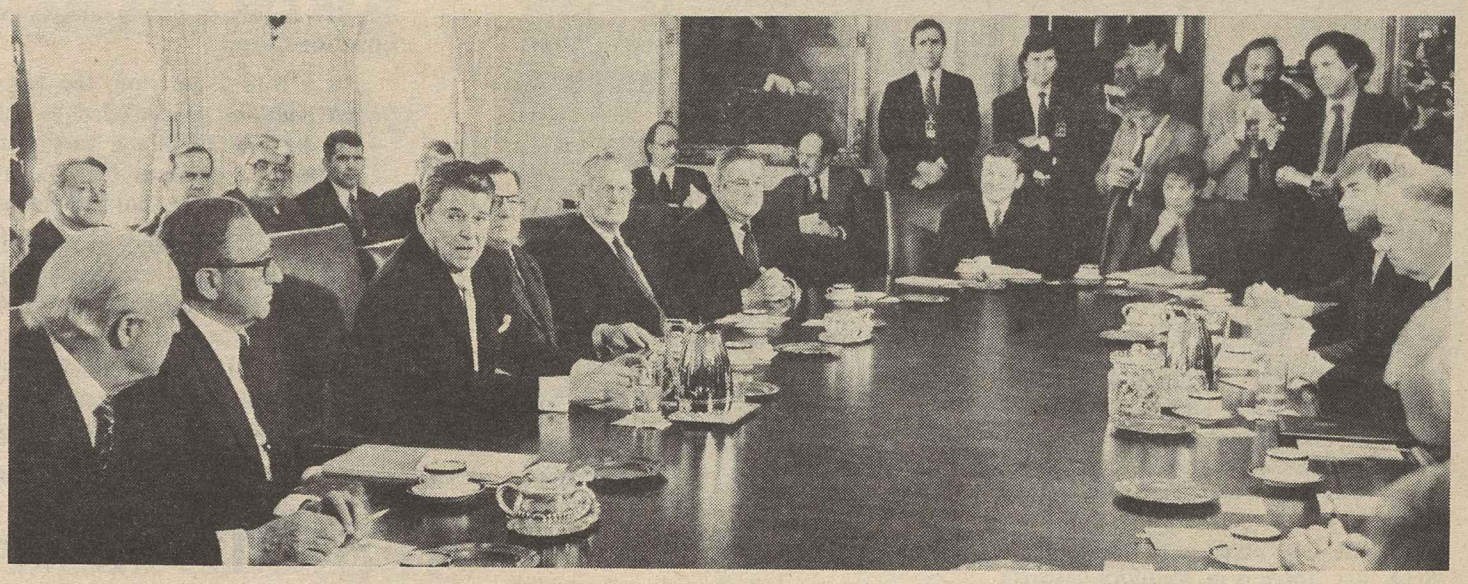
CADO would be structured along the tripartite pattern of the International Labor Organization. Each country's delegation would include representatives of a democratic trade union movement, the business community and/or the government.

The organization's task would be to promote establishment of a Central American common market and to encourage assistance to the region from West European nations, Canada, Japan and other Latin American countries in much the same way the foreign ministers of the so-called Contadora group of nations—Venezuela, Mexico, Panama and Colombia—have sought solutions to the region's problems over the past year, the report said.

CADO would be formally established at a summit meeting of the leaders of the participating countries, with the signing of a charter embodying a commitment to political pluralism, free elections, mutual security, human resource development, preservation of peace, and establishment and maintenance of sound economic growth policies.



President Reagan confers with the commission on Central America at White House.

Kirkland's key role

Press reports of the commission's deliberations cited Kirkland's significant contribution. The Wall Street Journal said "several members say Mr. Kirkland played a central role" because of the respect other members had for him, and Newsweek magazine summed it up from an unnamed commission member: "Kirkland was like E. F. Hutton. When he talked, people listened."

Among its other major recommendations, the Kissinger commission provides a clear role for the region's free trade unions in the development of democratic institutions and processes.

"The importance of unions, which represent millions of rural and urban workers, has been firmly established," the commission's report observes.

"They have been not only an economic force, but a political one as well, opposing arbitrary rule and promoting democratic values. Labor unions will continue to have an important part to play in political development, as well as in improving the social and economic well-being of working men and women.

"Assuring an equitable distribution of economic benefits will require both job-oriented development strategies and trade unions to protect workers' rights."

On El Salvador, where two AFL-CIO staff members were killed by right-wing death squads three years ago, the commission recommended more military aid to the Magana government to combat leftist guerrillas.

"Were military aid to be cut off, it would open the way for the triumph of the guerrillas, an eventuality that no one concerned about the well-being of the Salvadoran people can accept with equanimity," the commission said. "Such a development would be unacceptable from the standpoint of both human rights and security."

But the commission made it clear that further military aid to that country would be contingent on basic social, political, and judicial reforms as well as observance of fundamental human rights and the nurturing of other democratic ideals.

"The United States has a right to demand certain minimum standards of respect for human rights as a condition for providing military aid to any country," the commission added.

"With respect to El Salvador, military aid should, through legislation requiring periodic reports, be made contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections, freedom of association, the establishment of the rule of law and an effective judicial system, and the termination of the activities of the so-called death squads, as well as vigorous action against those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders. These conditions should be seriously enforced."

The commission held the same policy should apply to Guatemala, where the existing human rights situation is "unacceptable" and the security situation is potentially "critical."

Prosecutions pressed

The commission called for prosecution of past offenders in El Salvador, where Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development were murderd in 1981. They were assigned to El Salvador to assist in carrying out the government's land distribution program. Their killers have been identified but not brought to justice because of El Salvador's cumbersome and corrupt judicial system.

AIFLD Exec. Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., said that tieing aid to prosecution of the killers was crucial. He praised the panel for insisting on the conditionality.

In accepting the commission's report, Reagan thanked Kirkland for his participation.

"We have a consensus recognition of the urgent nature and complexity of the crisis in Central America. . . . It is time for us to go to work and set forward a program that will achieve the goals that members of this commission have set forth," Reagan said.

Divided NLRB revamps rule on 'work time' soliciting ban

In a ruling fraught with verbal murkiness and semantic ambiguity, a divided National Labor Relations Board held that employer bans on solicitation—including union organizing efforts—during "working time" are valid but that bans on solicitation during "working hours" are invalid.

What it all comes down to is the difference in the two phrases, "working time" and "working hours."

In a 1981 decision, the NLRB ruled that both terms are equally ambiguous and that their use in employer work rules on solicitation and distribution—without further clarification that employees are free to solicit during breaktime and other nonworking time—were presumptively invalid.

The new ruling by Chairman Donald L. Dotson and Members Robert P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis overturns the 1981 decision.

Majority opinion

"We are merely returning to the long-held standard that rules banning solicitation during working time state with sufficient clarity that employees may solicit on their own time," the NLRB majority contended.

However, the consequences of the latest decision are likely to obfuscate further—rather than clarify—just when union organizers may solicit and distribute authorization cards among workers at a workplace. As Member Don A. Zimmerman put it in a dissenting opinion, ambiquity is likely to remain in the minds of workers and to interfere with and restrict the full exercise of their rights to form unions under federal labor law.

The case was initiated in 1980 by the Firemen & Oilers against Our Way, Inc., of Atlanta. The union had charged that the firm's work rule banning "soliciting, collecting or selling for any purpose during the working time of the soliciting employee or the working time of the employee being solicited" violated the 1981 decision.

An NLRB administrative law judge ruled in the union's favor, relying on the standard set in 1981.

In rejecting its administrative law judge's finding that Our Way's no-solicitation rule, as written, was unlawful, the board said that the 1981 decision "was an unnecessary departure from longstanding precedent and has served primarily to cause unjustified confusion and a string of nonproductive litigation."

Ambiguous rules

In his dissent, Zimmerman emphasized that "The only issue in dispute between the majority and me is whether respondent's rules, as published, are so broad and ambiguous that they fail to convey to employees the periods during the workday when they may legitimately engage in solicitation and distribution activities, or indeed that they improperly convey to employees that they are not permitted to engage in such activities during certain nonwork periods of the workday."

While overturning the 1981 decision, the board majority agreed with the administrative law judge and with Zimmerman that Our Way violated federal labor law in enforcing its no-solicitation rule, and applying it to workers' free time as well as work time and to ban only union solicitation.

The board found that the firm violated federal law by firing employee Betty Skidmore in August 1980 for distributing union authorization cards during breaktime. It ordered the employer to offer her job reinstatement, and to pay her back pay with interest.

Budget ax poised for new cutback

Catastrophic insurance should supplement, not replace, basic health coverage, he stressed.

The Reagan budget also projects further cuts in Medicaid coverage for low-income households, continuing the pattern of recent years. Many of the working poor, families hovering near the poverty level despite having jobs, have been cut from the eligibility rolls.

During the first two years of the Reagan Administration, Congress came close to rubber-stamping Administration budget proposals. This year, after Democratic election gains in the House, Congress took a more independent course in shaping its budget ceilings, holding military spending increases below the President's request and providing somewhat more adequately for the domestic sector.

Supreme Court hears case involving dues rebate claim

A "right-to-work" challenge to enforcement of an agency shop agreement negotiated under the Railway Labor Act was argued before the Supreme Court in a case involving conflicting interpretations of earlier high court decisions.

At issue is the magnitude of the rebate that can be claimed by a worker who is obligated to pay union dues or the equivalent agency shop fee under a union security agreement authorized by Congress for the railroad and airline industries or by comparable state laws covering groups of public sector workers.

As union attorneys read the Supreme Court precedents, a rebate may be claimed only for the portion of a dues payment that is used to further political or ideological purposes to which the employee objects and which are not related to the union's representation role.

In the case that reached the Supreme Court, a group of Western Airlines employees who then were represented by the Railway & Airline Clerks claimed that the refund right should cover all union expenditures not directly applied to the cost of negotiations and contract administration within the bargaining unit.

Their lawsuit was funded by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, an arm of the employer-aided organization that seeks to outlaw all forms of union security.

In the Supreme Court oral argument and in a legal brief for BRAC, labor attorney Laurence Gold backed the position taken by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals—that the union expenditures challenged in the suit were "germane to the union's work in the realm of collective bargaining."

Rebate reasoning

The "right-to-work" suit had sought rebates for such diverse union functions as the cost of the union's national convention, BRAC publications, organizing expenses and even such items as coffee and doughnuts served at union meetings. Nonunion members shouldn't have to help pay the cost of union efforts to organize other workers, the attorney for the plaintiffs argued.

In a brief supporting BRAC's position, the AFL-CIO noted that Congress had given full consideration to the rights of workers who would be covered by the Railway Labor Act's union security authorization to assure that their basic First Amendment rights of free speech are protected.

But the industrial peace objective of the law could not be achieved, the federation contended, if workers covered by the union shop could choose not to pay their share of the bulk of expenses incurred by the union.

Employer immunity

OSHA scored on plan to abolish inspections

By Arlee Green

The AFL-CIO and several affiliates charged that a proposed federal job safety regulation that would exempt employers from general schedule inspections because of their participation in state consultation programs is illegal.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration proposal is based on an experimental program conducted in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Texas since July 1982.

The AFL-CIO noted in its comments to OSHA that "there is no statutory basis for the proposed regulation to exempt employers" from inspections for their participation in the consultation program.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, pointed out that when Congress set up the consultation program in 1974, it specified that the consultations could complement, but not replace, inspections.

The AFL-CIO charged that the proposed revisions "flout Congress's intent." Congress has "repeatedly shown its recognition that categorical exemption of employers from inspections under the Act must be accomplished, if at all, by legislative action," the federation said.

Under the proposal, OSHA would not inspect employers who "receive a comprehensive consultative visit, correct all serious hazards identified, post a notice to employees of hazards corrected, and establish an effective safety and health program."

The Paperworkers, Steelworkers and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers expressed misgivings about the lack of participation permitted for workers or their representatives.

Seminario, in underscoring labor's concern, said full worker participation "must be provided by the regulations for any consultative visits conducted under the Act to be meaningful."

Noting that employers only have to abate "serious" violations in order to qualify for exemption, Seminario urged the same requirements be placed on those in the consultative program as those under enforcement inspections—abatement of all violations.

She also called for upgrading qualifications for state consultants in the program, pointing out that "consultants in many states are inexperienced and have no background or training in occupational safety and health."

Authority lacking

Suzanne J. Kossan, industrial hygienist for the unaffiliated Teamsters, stressed that OSHA has "no authority" under the act to grant immunity from a regularly scheduled inspection to employers participating in the consultative program.

She cited the union's experience with the experimental exemption program in Florida, where Tropicana Products, Inc., was granted an inspection exemption last September two days after a worker was killed on the job.

An OSHA inspection revealed "several violative conditions" for which the company was cited and fined. Kossan pointed out the nature of these conditions were such "that they should have been found by state consultants."

Kossan questioned the granting of an exemption to an employer who had just experienced a work-related fatality for which the employer was deemed responsible, an employer whose lost workdays due to injury rate is nearly double the national average and whose occupational fatality rate is 20 times that of other businesses in their high hazard industry classification.

Court voids ban on sale, closing of Chrysler units

Hartford, Wis.—The jobs of 300 Allied Industrial Workers at two Chrysler Marine Division plants have been jeopardized by a federal court ruling upholding union-busting tactics in the sale of the facilities.

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago overturned an injunction handed down by a Wisconsin federal district court that would have stopped Chrysler Corp. from selling its outboard motor plants here and in Beaver Dam, Wis., to Bayliner Marine Corp. of Arlington, Wash., a non-union company. Bayliner's deal with Chrysler required both plants to be shut down and all employees fired.

Bayliner said it planned to re-open the plants later with new employees, but refused to guarantee jobs to present workers.

AIW Local 879 asked the court to block the sale, pointing out that its contract with Chrysler required at least six months notice of plant closings.

But the higher court disagreed that the shut down would cause "irreparable harm" to workers and said that other legal means —such as arbitration—could be used by the workers to settle grievances if harm was done.

At a rally in Hartford to draw public attention to what was being done to the workers, AIW Region 9 Director Robert Johnson, branded the company's move "morally wrong."

He noted that the average seniority of the workers at the Chrysler plants was 20 years, and called it "ridiculous" for Bayliner to contend that it needed new workers to produce the motors.

Silkwood award restored

The Supreme Court reinstated a $10 million negligence award won by the family of union safety representative Karen Silkwood against Kerr-McGee Corp.

In a 5-to-4 decision, the high court ruled that Silkwood's three teenaged children are entitled to the punitive damages awarded to them in 1979 by an Oklahoma jury, but later overturned by a federal appeals court on the grounds that the award interfered with the federal government's authority to control the nuclear power industry.

Silkwood, a member of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, was killed in 1974 in a suspicious auto crash on her way to give evidence of Kerr-McGee safety violations to an OCAW representative and a New York Times reporter. Nine days before her death, Silkwood had been severely contaminated by exposure to plutonium.

A feature film about her life and the circumstances of her death opened in major theaters in January. Silkwood is played by Meryl Streep.

AFSCME instructs women on spotting sexual wage bias

The State, County & Municipal Employees launched a nationwide educational campaign to alert working women to their legal right to fight sex-based wage discrimination.

As part of the program, AFSCME released a new pamphlet containing a checklist women can use to determine if their employers are practicing wage bias, or if they are paying men and women equally for jobs of comparable worth.

AFSCME's booklet, titled "You've Come a Long Way—Maybe: A Working Woman's Guide to Pay Equity," outlines methods workers can use to do pay equity studies of their own workplaces. The guide also suggests strategies workers can follow to correct inequities, and it stresses that a top priority should be joining a union.

The union said a key part of the program is alerting workers to the implications of the landmark pay equity suit AFSCME won last year in Washington state.

In that case, a federal judge ruled that the state had violated the Civil Rights Act by setting pay for jobs traditionally held mostly by women lower than rates paid in predominantly male jobs, even though the work required comparable levels of skill and experience. AFSCME, which filed the suit on behalf of some 15,000 state employees — 95 percent of them women—said the workers stand to receive more than $500 million in back pay as a result of the decision.

Court victory

Diana Rock, AFSCME's director of women's activities, said the case is important to working women because "now that the federal courts have ruled that comparable worth is not just a legal theory, but a workplace reality, women are going to be demanding equal pay for comparable worth."

Rock noted that the union has also filed suits or charges with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission against Philadelphia, Chicago and Los Angeles; Connecticut, Wisconsin and Hawaii; Nassau County, N.Y., and the Reading, Pa., school district.

She stressed that pay equity and comparable worth "are the women's rights issues of the 1980s" and 1984 could see a "large-scale continuation" of legal actions against employers charged with wage discrimination.

In its own statement hailing the Washington state decision, the labor-supported National Committee on Pay Equity called the ruling a "crack in the dam" of sex discrimination. The committee predicted an "outpouring" of lawsuits "if employers do not move voluntarily to implement nondiscriminatory wage scales."

The group also criticized the federal government for "not performing its role to eliminate discrimination" by enforcing federal civil rights laws.

AFSCME said it is making its pay equity guide available to the union's 400,000 women members and to 30 major women's organizations.

Other materials on pay equity have also been produced by the Coalition of Labor Union Women and the AFL-CIO's Labor Institute of Public Affairs which produced a half-hour television documentary on the issue as part of its 1983 season of "America Works," the AFL-CIO's weekly television public affairs broadcast.

Joint panel set up to study Litton's labor practices

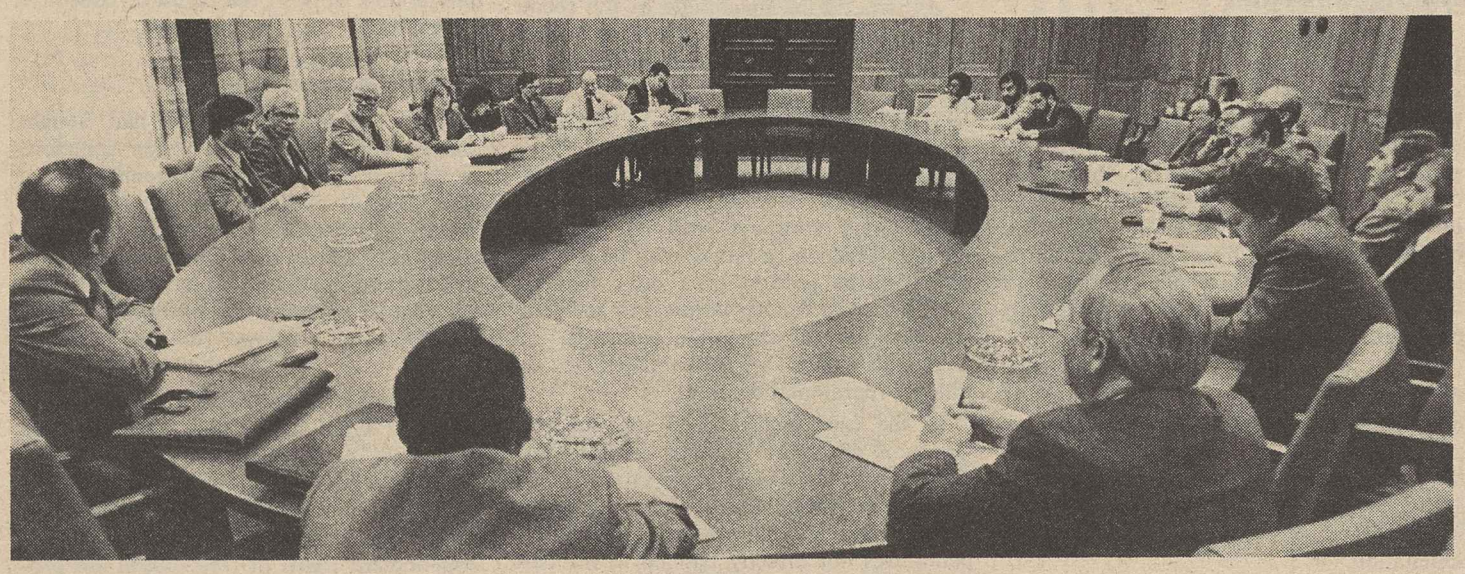
The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Litton Industries, Inc. announced formation of a committee to study and report on the corporation's labor relations practices.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel, who heads labor's National Litton Campaign, and Litton Chairman Fred W. O'Green each named two members to the panel which will be presided over by a neutral chairman.

The committee, which will hold its first meeting later this month, was proposed by O'Green in December during the company's stockholders' meeting in Los Angeles. He made the suggestion following demonstrations by the 12 labor groups in the coalition outside the meeting and the presentation by labor representatives at the meeting of a resolution calling for an examination of anti-labor practices at Litton subsidiaries.

The panel will report to O'Green on charges of a corporate-wide policy of union-busting and labor law violations at Litton-owned companies.

IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak and Electronic Workers Sec.-Treas. Edward Fire were named by the unions to the panel. Litton representatives will be Mathias J. Diedrich, vice president and director of industrial relations, and Jerry St. Pe, vice president and director of industrial relations for Litton's Ingalls Shipping Division.



Labor's safety agenda

Legislative and policy issues were discussed at this meeting of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health in the federation's Executive Council room. AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner is chairman of the committee. Its agenda included reports on OSHA developments and interference by the White House budget office in the federal standard setting process for worker protections against job hazards.

Reagan's budget cuts blamed for dumping children into poverty

born to women receiving late or no prenatal care are three times more likely to die in infancy as those who have received early care.

As a result of the current trend, the children's advocacy organization warned, infant mortality is likely to increase in the United States. The study pointed out that mortality rates for all infants increased in 11 states between 1981 and 1982. Mortality for white infants increased in nine states and for black infants in 13 states.

CDF President Marian Wright Edelman said that these "and other dangerous trends compelled us to issue this special report on American children before the President's budget, to warn him, the Congress and the American people that misguided federal priorities are hurting children and increasing long-term public costs. They must not be allowed to continue."

Edelman also charged that in a time of economic recession, with millions of women and children falling below the poverty line, "the last place a humane, sensible and fair Administration would cut" are programs providing maternal and child health care and other aid to the poor, "yet that is precisely what the Reagan Administration has done without concern for the consequences that are now appearing."

CDF's research showed that 3.1 million children, a rate of about 3,000 children a day, have fallen below the poverty line since 1979, the sharpest increase in child poverty since records have been kept.

Overall about 34.4 million Americans—about 15 percent of the population—now live below the poverty threshold according to the Census Bureau. The agency defines the poverty line as a $9,862 a year income for a family of four. Last year the bureau reported that the U.S. poverty rate for 1982 was the highest since 1965.

The report said that budget cuts have directly resulted in reductions in health care, hunger, child care and education aid to poor families and their children.

Aid plummets

It said the Reagan cuts dropped 700,000 children from the Medicaid and Aid to Families with Dependent Children programs between 1981 and 1982. The percentage of poor children helped by AFDC plummeted from 71.7 percent in 1979 to 52.5 percent in 1982.

Reagan Administration budget cuts have also sharply eroded programs offering child care to working parents and education services to disadvantaged children, the report pointed out.

CDF contended that cuts in children's programs are not "cost effective," but may only represent small, short-term savings "that will be more than offset by the long-term costs of children who grow up to be chronically ill adults, or inadequately educated and trained workers, or juvenile delinquents in trouble with the law.

"Our society will pay now or pay later," and paying later will cost much more, CDF said.

The report also underscored a correlation between unemployment rate increases and increased reporting of incidents of child abuse and neglect in nearly every state.

CDF found that of the 12 million American children who live in families headed by women, 56.6 percent are poor. In black families headed by women, 70.7 percent are poor, and in Hispanic families headed by women, 71.8 percent are poor.

There were 7 million children with at least one parent unemployed as of March 1983, CDF found. One million had family incomes under $5,000 and another 1.3 million were in families with incomes of $5,000-$10,000.

Programs serving poor children and and families did not cause and will not cure growing federal deficits, and economic recovery "does not depend on hurting children and neglecting their needs," Edelman said.

Analyzing bankruptcy law

Key issues for organized labor in bankruptcy law are discussed live via television satellite during the first video-conference held by the AFL-CIO Lawyers Coordinating Committee. The three-hour program Dec. 16 was produced by the AFL-CIO Labor Institute of Public Affairs. LIPA's Gwenn Kelly, left, moderates the conference with AFL-CIO General Counsel J. Albert Woll. Analyses of bankruptcy issues were given by panelists, from left, Bruce Simon, Leon Marcus and Claude Montgomery. The conference originated in Washington studios of the State, County & Municipal Employees and was beamed by satellite to New York, Chicago, San Francisco and an additional site in Washington. Some 100 labor lawyers at the four receiving sites participated.

New NLRB policy reduces job protection for workers

A lone worker fired for protesting unsafe working conditions can no longer count on the National Labor Relations Board to order his reinstatement.

The new NLRB majority—the three members appointed by President Reagan—voted to scrap a 1975 precedent that viewed a good-faith protest against unsafe working conditions as an activity protected under federal labor law even if the worker acted on his or her own initiative.

Don A. Zimmerman, the lone NLRB holdover from the Carter Administration, vigorously dissented the policy switch.

He accused his colleagues of distorting the intent of the National Labor Relations Act by giving an artificially narrow reading to its protection for "concerted" actions by workers for their mutual protection.

The case that led to the policy reversal did not involve any union or a union organizing effort. The truck driver whose firing led to the NLRB complaint acted on his own to protest faulty truck and trailer equipment, including seriously malfunctioning brakes.

Another employee also protested the unsafe equipment but the NLRB held that this didn't make the protest "concerted" activity since there was no indication that the two acted together on the issue.

After an accident caused by the malfunctioning brakes, the driver refused to drive the rig back and arranged for a state inspection at the site which resulted in a citation putting the unit out of service. When a company-hired mechanic couldn't repair it, the trailer was scrapped. But the driver was fired because "we can't have you calling the cops like this all the time."

An NLRB administrative law judge ordered the driver reinstated, based on the 1975 policy precedent which held that activity was protected if it involved an issue that was of group concern.

The three-member majority of the labor board—Chairman Donald L. Dotson, Robers P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis—said the precedent was overly broad and reversed it.

They said the driver's actions would have been protected if taken to enforce a provision of an existing collective bargaining agreement. But in the absence of such an agreement, the employer didn't violate federal labor law by firing the driver even though it was a shabby thing to do. But "we are not empowered to correct all immorality."

Zimmerman saw it differently. The board majority, he suggested, was imposing unrealistic obligations on a worker resting a firm that was "willing to endanger its employees" by forcing them to use unsafe equipment. The NLRB action "goes against the history and spirit of federal labor laws," he charged.

ITU board holds election invalid, orders a rerun

Colorado Springs, Colo.—The Typographical Union's canvassing board has invalidated the union's election for president and ordered that a rerun election be held "shortly after March 31, 1984."

The board, which said it acted at the advice of its attorneys, invalidated the presidential contest, won by ITU First Vice President Robert McMichen over incumbent Joe Bingel. It based its action on the contention that some ITU locals used membership dues to aid McMichen's campaign.

The five-member board also ruled on the results of all the other elections and a referendum, except for two of the vice presidential races. The elections were held last Nov. 16.

The board approved the election of Sec.-Treas. Thomas W. Kopeck over Robert E. Petersen by a tally of 30,387 to 17,815. Allan J. Heritage was elected to a vice president post, running unopposed, with a vote of 32,448.

The board also held that the referendum to create a $400,000 organizing fund with a $1 per member monthly dues increase automatically triggered when the fund falls below $100,000 was approved by a vote of 24,364 to 23,049.

The canvassing board is scheduled to meet Jan. 18 to decide the outcome of the two other vice presidential races. McMichen had filed protests to all three vice presidential elections, and Billy J. Austin of the Denver local protested his apparent loss in the race against incumbent Vice President Robert L. Wartinger. Austin received 19,933 votes to Wartinger's 25,345.

ITU Rep. Ray Brown overcame an early lead by Bill Boarman, president of Local 101 in the third contest, receiving 23,724 votes to Boarman's 21,644.

The controversy over the results of the presidential contest centers on the use of union newspapers, stationery and letters in support of McMichen's campaign.

Bingel, who will remain in office until the new election, contended the use of union funds to support McMichen violated federal law. McMichen's protest about the nullification of the result challenged the authority of the canvassing board to rule on possible federal law violations.

Unionists top New Hampshire slate

Manchester, N.H.—In the first step of New Hampshire's Democratic presidential primary, a large and enthusiastic turn out of AFL-CIO union members at local caucuses helped elect seven unionists to a slate of 12 delegates that could potentially support Walter Mondale at the Democratic National Convention.

The effort, coordinated by the state labor federation, also marks the first time the AFL-CIO has rallied organized participation of union members behind a particular candidate in a primary. The move was made possible by the endorsement of Mondale at the federation's national convention last October.

Under the state's rules for selecting delegates to the national convention in July, caucuses for each declared candidate were held in both of the state's two congressional districts on Jan. 8. Of 380 voters in the First District Mondale caucus here, at least 125 were AFL-CIO union members, and at the Second District caucus in Concord—which covered a larger geographical area—about 75 of the 310 voters were AFL-CIO union members.

New Hampshire AFL-CIO President Harland Eaton, who was among those elected as a potential Mondale delegate, called the turn out "very impressive," and he credited the state's local unions and political action coordinators with "an all-out effort that really produced."

Turning out the vote

Eaton stressed that the next step that will send the AFL-CIO union members to the convention as Mondale delegates depends on "keeping the momentum going to turn out the vote" among union households for the primary itself on Feb. 28.

The state Democratic Party will proportion the number of elected delegates who attend the national convention among the candidates based on their share of the popular vote. The candidate who wins the primary will also have greater say in selection of delegates to fill 10 at-large seats that will round out New Hampshire's delegation to the party convention in July.

Eaton said the state federation, in cooperation with national COPE, has begun operating phone banks to reach union homes and plans a wide range of other get-out-the-vote activities around the state, staffed by volunteers from affiliated local unions.

In a separate event, Mondale met informally with union members and their families on Jan. 12 at the Shoeworkers Hall in Manchester. The "Evening with Mondale" was coordinated by the state AFL-CIO and sponsored by the Manchester Central Labor Council.

AFL-CIO union members elected as Mondale delegates, in addition to Eaton, include Mark Mackenzie, executive vice president of the state AFL-CIO and a member of the Fire Fighters, Harriett Casey of the State, County & Municipal Employees, Barbara Stott of the Teachers, Earl Bourdon of the Steelworkers, Michael Grieco of the Communications Workers and Linda Dann of AFSCME.

ILO presses worker rights in hotel, restaurant industry

Geneva — An International Labor Organization conference here called for concerted action to insure that workers in the hotel and restaurant industry enjoy the right to be represented by "freely elected, independent and democratic unions of their own choosing."

The worker, employer and government delegates of 27 countries unanimously adopted a resolution urging the ILO to prepare a report on the obstacles impeding observance of this principle of freedom of association in the industry.

Sponsored by the worker delegates, the resolution addressed to the ILO Governing Body also requested that the report be accompanied by proposals on measures for correcting a situation that "often remains unsatisfactory."

Rhonda Allgaier, a vice president of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, hailed adoption of the resolution as one of the key developments at the 10-day session.

"We have had much difficulty in the United States to get employers to recognize the right to organize even though the law provides for it," she said. "For this reason it was very important to get the principle reinforced here with the employers joining in an agreement that was unanimous."

Elected by the worker delegates to head their group, Allgaier told the conference that the "first step toward the destruction of democracy is taken when freedom of association and trade union rights are abolished."

Vincent J. Sirabella, HERE's director of organization, assailed the union-busting role of many of the industry's multinational corporations.

Sirabella warned the developing countries that only free and democratic unions, backed by sympathetic governments, could force the multinationals to "change their anti-worker, anti-union programs anywhere in this world."

In assessing the results of the session, the two trade unionists on the U.S. delegation said the conference provided a rare opportunity for workers, employers and government officials from all parts of the world to exchange experiences and views.

Positive action

"That rarely happens in our industry," Allgaier said. "And to produce something positive at such a meeting is even rarer," she added with reference to the resolutions calling for further ILO action on trade rights, minimum wage and working conditions and other standards for the industry's workers.

Sirabella termed "particularly significant" an ILO decision to establish a regular ILO industrial committee covering the hotel, restaurant and tourism trade.

"This is giving us a new status equal to other industries which have traditionally enjoyed greater attention in the ILO," he said. "We will be able to meet more frequently and go into our problems in greater depth than was possible in the past."

In a report on social and employment problems the conference denounced the excessive use of overtime work during high unemployment in most countries.

"Excessive overtime should not be worked at the expense of the creation of additional employment," it said.

The conference also called for the ILO to establish an international documentation center to collect, analyze and disseminate information on training programs for employment at all levels of the hotel and restaurant industry.

Catherine Peters dies, garment union official

Michigan City, Ind.—Catherine C. Peters, retired secretary-treasurer of the United Garment Workers, died here Jan. 5. She was 71.

Peters was first elected secretary-treasurer of the union in 1962 and was re-elected to three more terms before retiring in 1978.

She joined Michigan City Local 215 in 1941 and was elected local president a year later. In 1943, Peters was named an international representative and served in that post until being named assistant to the international secretary-treasurer in 1981.

Hunger not too hard to find, Reagan panel told

Organized labor teamed up with anti-poverty groups and religious organizations criticizing a presidential study commission's findings on hunger in America.

In its final report to President Reagan, the Task Force on Food Assistance said the "sad truth" is that "there is hunger in America" but that there is no way to measure its extent.

"We cannot understand how Reagan's task force on hunger can acknowledge the existence of the problem, and quibble about how widespread it is," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said.

High unemployment, cutbacks in programs to relieve poverty, grossly inadequate unemployment compensation and reductions in food stamps, school lunches and breakfasts, and other nutrition programs have meant that millions of Americans, old and young, have felt the pangs of hunger, he observed.

"We know there's hunger out there," said Seidman. "Union locals have set up food banks in communities all over the country because their unemployed members and families could obtain food in no other way."

He called the existence of hunger "a national shame" that can only be eliminated by federal action.

Earlier, the panel's recommendations were sharply criticized by a coalition of church, senior citizen, civil rights, and labor groups, which said it was "disappointed and dismayed" at the report.

"After working for four months and spending the taxpayers' money, the task force tells us little more than that hunger exists," the coalition said. "And then it proposes recommendations that would, on balance, make this tragic problem yet worse."

The 43 organizations issuing the statement leveled their strongest criticism at a task force proposal to replace federal nutrition programs with block grants.

"We regard the proposal to authorize the replacement of school lunch and other child nutrition programs, food stamps, and maternal and infant nutrition programs, with state block grants as nothing short of a disaster for the nation's poor," the organizations said.

The groups charged that the block grant proposal would "lead to significant benefit reductions during recessions in states where unemployment rises rapidly because the states would not receive the funding needed on a timely basis to meet the additional needs."

They also warned that in some states the task force's state grant proposal "would likely result in benefit reductions for certain types of poor families who have little or no political leverage—especially poor women and children, many of whom are members of minority groups."

A Worldwide Message

IT'S NOT ENOUGH to be anti-communist. Repressive governments of any political coloration are repugnant. Dictators and ruling cliques denying basic freedoms and trampling on human rights should not expect to be propped up by U.S. economic or military aid.

That's been the policy advocated by this country's labor movement over the many years the AFL-CIO and its predecessor federations have been involved in international affairs.

It is now a welcome and inseparable element of the report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America.

"The United States has a right to demand certain minimum standards of respect for human rights as a condition for providing military aid to any country," the commission said.

It urged military aid to El Salvador, "contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections; freedom of association; the establishment of the rule of law" and vigorous action against the right-wing death squads.

GUNS ALONE will not defeat communist-backed insurgency. A more equitable distribution of wealth and land is needed to dry up its roots. That's what the AIFLD workers slain by the death squads were trying to achieve in El Salvador.

The commission dealt with the danger spots of the Caribbean, where proximity adds to this country's concern. But the basic principle of progress toward human rights is as valid in more distant regions as well. And the right of workers to join in free unions, like the right of people to peacefully change their government leaders, is as good a rule of thumb as has yet been devised.

Farewell, Silicon Valley

THE ADJOINING Washington Window column pricks the myth that the drainage of industrial jobs from the United States will be offset by this generation's growth industries—the "high tech" companies set up to exploit the miracle of the microchip.

Its message is reinforced by a news item from San Jose, Calif., where some 600 employees of the Qume Corp. have just been given abrupt notice that they will be out of jobs as of Feb. 3.

The company, an ITT subsidiary, is closing down its operations in California's Silicon Valley. The explanation for this business decision is a familiar one.

A typical worker at the San Jose plant, it seems, earns $8 an hour—hardly a munificent sum these days. With other employer-paid benefits, the total compensation package comes to about $10.50 an hour.

But in Taiwan, where Qume will expand its operations, wages and benefits amount to a mere $1.50 an hour.

NOW AMERICAN industry is often lectured on the need to become more technologically efficient to compete on the world market, and indeed some of our older smokestack industries have lagged dangerously in recognizing the need.

But it is certainly not lagging technology that makes it increasingly difficult to shop for American-made apparel or to find an American-built television set. Nor was lagging technology the impetus for a multinational company to gravitate to the lowest available wage base.

The need to stay competitive has been the employer excuse—sometimes justified, often not—for wage freezes and rollbacks. But there is obviously no way American workers can or should compete with $1.50 an hour payroll costs. That isn't free trade. That's national suicide.

Those who choose to bemoan the high cost of what they call "protectionism" should at least balance the scales honestly. Add to the equation the true cost of unemployment—to the community, to the tax structure, to the nation's fragile economic recovery. Consider the workers whose jobs would be wiped out. And then try to put a price tag also on the broken lives and families. It's a price we can't afford.

High tech won't counteract job loss in basic industry

By Press Associates, Inc.

"High tech," a term which crept into popular usage rather recently, sometimes takes on almost magical qualities as an economic cure-all.

Don't worry too much about the decline of the nation's basic industries, because high technology industries will fill the void, some say.

Don't be too concerned about the millions of jobs which have been or will be lost in the old smokestack industries—high tech will provide plenty of jobs for displaced workers.

Don't get too upset about the decaying communities and regions which some label the "Rustbelt"—one can always move to the Silicon Valley in California or somewhere else in the Sunbelt.

Such myths about high tech are dispelled by three Labor Dept. economists in a recent study reported in the department's Monthly Labor Review. The carefully researched report is titled, "High Technology Today and Tomorrow: A Small Slice of the Employment Pie."

The report reached these conclusions:

● High tech industries, even if broadly defined, will account for only a small proportion of new jobs through the year 1995.

Small portion

More than 1.5 million technology-oriented jobs —computer specialists, science technicians, engineers and the like—are expected to be created between 1983 and 1995. However, this represents just 6 percent of all new jobs in the economy, roughly the same proportion as in the 1970s.

● Most high tech industries will grow at a slower rate over the 1983-1995 period than during the 1972-1982 period. But their growth will still be above the average for all industries.

● Since the great majority of new jobs will be in industries other than high technology, displaced and other jobless workers shouldn't be too optimistic about employment in this area. Local government and community organizations seeking to attract jobs to their regions would be well-advised not to limit their search to high tech industries.

● The skills and experience of displaced blue-collar workers are very different from most high tech jobs. For many high tech workers, such as scientists, engineers and math specialists, specialized higher education or advanced degrees are required.

● High tech has had a big employment impact only on a few areas, including California's Silicon Valley in the San Jose area and the Route 128 area in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. The concentration of high tech employment in the largest states doesn't appear to be increasing.

Not the answer

In sum, the study's authors conclude that "high technology employment is not expected to take up the slack in job generation caused by the long-term decline in heavy durable goods industries."

An AFL-CIO study on "The Future of Work" concluded that "high technology is an oversold promise to a nation suffering serious declines" in its basic industries.

That study noted that high tech industries often employ low-paid assembly workers—many of them women, minorities and young people—whose jobs can be automated or shipped abroad.

For example, early in 1983 the Atari company, a subsidiary of Warner Communications which manufactures video games and home computers, announced it was firing much of its U.S. workforce and shifting production to Asia.

To prevent a large and growing labor surplus—what the AFL-CIO study called a permanent underclass of 4 to 6 million jobless workers—a balanced industrial policy and large-scale job creation, job training and education programs are needed. Further, as the federation study urged, a shorter workweek and higher overtime penalties are needed to fight chronic unemployment in the world's richest nation.

Reaganism: A Price Too High

THE STATISTICS OF PAIN

The statistics on this page sum up—but by no means tell the whole story of—the cost in pain of the Reagan Recession and the Reagan cuts in important people-helping programs. It is a cost not nearly offset by the present period of partial recovery—a recovery which many economists fear might collapse in early 1985 under the weight of record-high Reagan deficits.

Millions of working and needy Americans have paid and are still paying a staggering price for Reaganism: In jobs lost, in health care withheld, in nutrition denied, in higher education forestalled or abandoned, in job training aborted, in homes foreclosed.

Their story—by the numbers—follows. (Figures from AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research, Congressional Budget Office, Children's Defense Fund, U.S. agencies.)

Workers . . . Victimized

- Number of individual workers suffering one or more episodes of unemployment 1981 through 1983: 30 million (minimum figure).
- Number of individual workers suffering joblessness by year: 1981, 23 million; 1982, 27 million; 1983, 27 million.
- Average mean duration of unemployment, 1981-83 respectively: 14 weeks, 16 weeks, 20 weeks.
- Average gross weekly earnings lost per year by jobless workers: 1981, $3,315; 1982, $4,005; 1983, $5,620.
- Over-all gross weekly earnings of workers lost per year through unemployment: 1981 loss $76.2 billion; 1982 loss $108.1 billion; 1983 loss $151.7 billion.
- Total gross weekly earnings lost through unemployment 1981 through 1983: $336.1 billion.
- Value of lost production 1981-83 respectively (as result of unemployment above 1979 level): $180 billion, $390 billion, $380 billion.
- Total value lost production 1981-83: $950 billion.
- Loss to U.S. Treasury through unemployment, 1981-1983 (over 1979) respectively: $54 billion, $117 billion, $114 billion.
- Total loss to Treasury through unemployment 1981-83: $285 billion (enough to substantially reduce record Reagan deficits).
- Number of persons losing some or all health coverage as result of unemployment: 10.7 million.
- Mortgage foreclosures during Reagan Recession (actual or in foreclosure process): 116,000 in 1981; 160,000 in 1982; 178,000 in 1983 (highest levels since tracking of statistic started in 1953).
- Business failures during Reagan Recession: 16,794 in 1981; 25,364 in 1982; 30,794 in 1983 (highest since 31,822 in 1931 and four times 1970 rate of 7,564). Total business failures 1981-83: 72,934.
- Rate of business failure: In 1979, 28 per 10,000; in 1982, 89 per 10,000.

The Needy . . . Needier

- Needy persons losing all food stamp aid: 1 million.
- Number of working poor, others, losing some food stamp aid: 4 million.
- Increase in number Americans living in poverty: 6 million (1981-82 alone). Rate of poverty now highest in 17 years—15% of all Americans.
- Cuts in Aid to Families with Dependent Children program (AFDC): $4.8 billion (13 %); 725,000 families affected, 1.5 million children.
- Children of needy families losing Medicaid protection: 700,000 (1982 alone).
- Children of needy families losing services at community health centers: 290,000.
- Cuts in child nutrition programs: 28 %.
- Number of children from low-income homes losing free or reduced-price school lunches: 1.1 million.
- Number of children from low-income homes losing free or reduced-price school breakfasts: 900,000.
- Cutback in higher education loan program: 27%.
- Number of young persons affected by cutbacks in low-interest loans for higher education: 700,000-plus.
- Cuts in other student financial aid programs: 13%.
- Medicaid/Medicare cuts: 5%.
- Other health program cuts: 22%.
- Cuts in job-training for disadvantaged: 35% ($7.4 billion).
- Funds cut from retirement programs over-all—social security, civil service pensions, veterans' benefits: $26 billion.
- Funds cut from income security programs over-all—food stamps, unemployment insurance, housing aid, AFDC: $27 billion.
- Funds cut from health programs over-all: $18.5 billion.
- Funds cut from education and social service programs over-all: $13.7 billion.
- Funds cut from employment and training programs over-all: $25 billion.

- Total funds cut from people-helping programs under Reagan (1981-84): $110.2 billion.

NOTE: The $110.2 billion cuts in people-helping programs represents only that portion of Reagan-proposed slashes that Congress agreed to. They were not really deep enough for his taste. Had all Reagan cuts been adopted as proposed, the $110.2 billion figure would balloon to the $140-$150 billion range over the same time period.

A REPORT ON CONGRESS

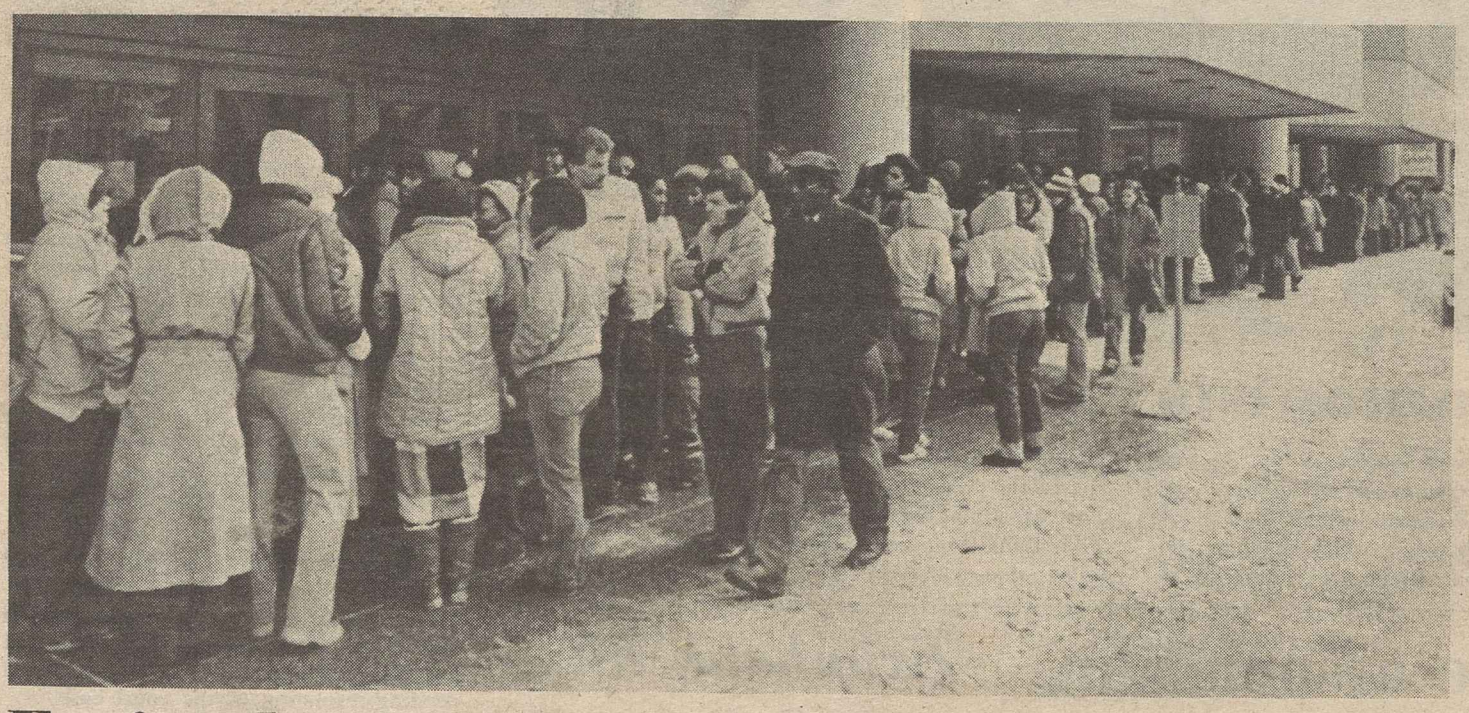
Industrial policy plan spurred



Facing long odds

Thousands of job seekers line up to apply for the 400 openings at Buffalo's new Hyatt Regency Hotel. Nearly 10,000 job applications were filled out over three days. Buffalo's unemployment rate is still in the double digits. Similar scenes occurred in Chicago where 50,000 applied for 300 mail handler jobs with the U.S. Postal Service.

Panel backs action to stem jobs decline

By David L. Perlman

A diverse group of prominent Americans—including persons who have been adversaries at the bargaining table—has called for an unprecedented degree of labor, management and government cooperation to shape industrial policy and strengthen the economy.

Its proposals seek to make U.S. goods more competitive in the world market and to break the cycle of ever-worsening recessions followed by incomplete recoveries that leave unemployment at increasingly high plateaus.

To that end, the Industry Policy Study Group has suggested a mechanism to achieve private-sector and public-sector cooperation in setting policies, and the commitment of both private and public resources to implement them.

The concept has had strong labor support, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland took an active part in the year-long search for a consensus. The study was sponsored by the Center for National Policy, a research institute headed by former Sec. of State Cyrus Vance. Taking part in the study were industrialists and union presidents, bankers and economists, present and past office holders.

Kirkland was one of three co-chairmen. The others were Felix G. Rohatyn, senior partner in the investment banking firm of Lazard Freres & Co. and chairman of the New York State Municipal Assistance Corp., and Irving Shapiro, former chairman of E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.

Deepening problem

The panel members stressed in their report that "even as the nation recovers from recession, we are far from satisfied with our economic performance." Structural problems remain and "if recent patterns hold, the next downturn will cut even more deeply and leave more permanent marks."

At a Washington news conference, the three co-chairmen rejected criticism that formulating an industrial policy would require an unacceptable degree of government involvement in the marketplace and the picking of "winners" and "losers' among industries seeking government aid.

Kirkland, Shapiro and Rohatyn pointed to the concept of voluntary cooperation in the public good as the framework for the

Salvador rights theme parallels labor's stand

By James M. Shevis

Recommendations of the Kissinger commission line up "foursquare" with the AFL-CIO position that military aid to El Salvador should be withheld until satisfactory progress toward basic reforms is made in that troubled Latin American country, Federation President Lane Kirkland stressed.

Kirkland, who was one of 12 members of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America headed by former Sec. of State Henry Kissinger, said the panel's stand on military aid and a resolution adopted at the AFL-CIO convention last October are consistent and virtually the same.

The two are "almost identical," Kirkland said in an interview. "They stress that military aid must be contingent on demonstrated progress in specific areas with periodic evaluations.

"The specific areas are progress toward free elections, freedom of association, establishment of the rule of law, reform of the judicial system, termination of the activities of the death squads, prosecution of the guilty, and proceeding against those who are residing in this country who are aiding and abetting those death squads."

Labor's position

As matters now stand, the AFL-CIO does not support military aid to El Salvador at this time, Kirkland pointed out.

The pertinent section of the convention resolution states:

"The AFL-CIO reiterates its insistence that aid to the government of El Salvador be contingent upon its progress in implementing the land reform program, protecting trade union rights, establishing a just judicial system, and bringing the right-wing 'death squads' under control. Until we are satisfied that progress is being made in these areas, the AFL-CIO will not support military aid to the government of El Salvador."

Jobless figures swing upward for 29 states

By Susan Dunlop

Unemployment increased in 29 states in November and declined in only 17 states and the District of Columbia. It remained unchanged in four states and Puerto Rico, the Labor Dept. reported.

Bureau of Labor Statistics figures issued this week showed that joblessness rose in two-thirds of the jurisdictions surveyed from October to November, even though the nation's overall unemployment rate of 8.4 percent for November 1983 compares favorably with the 10.7 percent rate in the same month a year earlier, a post-Depression high.

Over the year ended in November, however, unemployment rates were down in 49 states.

Even so, 11 states, Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia had double-digit employment in November—four more states than the month before. Alaska, Oregon, Indiana and Washington were added to that roster that included Alabama, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Ohio and West Virginia.

West Virginia's jobless rate of 15 percent, the highest among the 50 states, was

Gains posted in state legislatures

Public employee bargaining laws in Ohio and Illinois were highlights of state labor legislation enacted during 1983.

So were the "right-to-know" laws adopted by seven states to assure that employees are fully informed about any toxic chemicals they may encounter in the workplace—filling a gap caused by federal inaction.

For the most part, anti-labor legislation was rebuffed and in areas of union concerns, the state scorecard was more favorable than in most recent years.

In a relatively new area, there was growing interest in applying comparable worth standards to the classification and pay of state government jobs.

Changes in state unemployment compensation and workers' compensation laws will be covered in a separate survey. This roundup is based on data compiled by the Labor Dept. and the Bureau of National Affairs, supplemented by reports from AFL-CIO state federations.

State by state

These were among the highlights:

Alaska—Newly enacted right-to-know law includes a requirement that employers conduct a safety education program before workers undertake any assignment that could expose them to toxic substances.

Arkansas—Minimum wage raised from $2.95 to $3.05 as of Jan. 1, 1984, and will go to $3.15 next year. State employees given two additional paid holidays.

California—Mandatory retirement age abolished for most state and local government workers. Exceptions include public safety personnel and tenured college professors.

Colorado—Minimum wage coverage expanded, pay floor raised from $1.90 to

Evening with unionists

New Hampshire union families braved a foot of fresh snow and near-zero temperatures for an informal get-together with former Vice President Walter F. Mondale in Manchester Jan. 12. The event, which drew a near-capacity crowd, gave union members a chance to exchange views with the labor-endorsed candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. Latest statewide polls show Mondale holding a strong lead over the other seven Democratic contenders in the Feb. 28 first-in-the-nation primary election.

California state association moves to affiliate with SEIU

Sacramento, Calif.—By a unanimous vote, a special committee of the California State Employees Association recommended affiliation of their 97,000-member union with the Service Employees.

SEIU and CSEA officers said they expect to complete negotiations on an agreement in time for it to be ratified by CSEA's full board of directors early next month.

The pending affiliation will boost SEIU's membership in California to 242,000. Up to now, CSEA had been the largest unaffiliated union of state workers. The union represents workers in civil service jobs and in the state's university system.

SEIU said the affiliation will increase its total membership to 847,000.

President John J. Sweeney of the Service Employees said the union was "honored that the CSEA had decided to come into the AFL-CIO by affiliating with our union."

He praised CSEA as "a model labor organization which brings additional character as well as strength" to SEIU, and he stressed that all SEIU members in California will benefit by the affiliation.

CSEA President Leo E. Mayer, who headed the 10-member committee recommending the affiliation, said the decision "brings our union into the recognized mainstream of the American labor movement."

He stressed that the combined "skills, experience, facilities and resources of CSEA and SEIU will greatly enhance our union's representation of California state workers."

Discussions concluded

The committee's recommendation concludes several months of discussions between CSEA and five AFL-CIO unions. The CSEA board set up the special committee last November to decide whether to seek affiliation with the SEIU, the State, County & Municipal Employees, Communications Workers, Operating Engineers or the Auto Workers.

Mayer called the final choice "a very difficult one" from among "five of the finest unions in the country."

He said major factors in the decision to affiliate with the Service Employees were its already large public sector representation in California as well as "its strong capabilities in public sector research and collective bargaining support."

Mayer also noted that CSEA's affiliation with an AFL-CIO union would bring the state employee organization under the provisions of Article XX, the "no-raiding provisions of the AFL-CIO constitution, enabling CSEA to concentrate its resources "entirely where they belong—representing our people in the most effective way possible."

OCAW negotiates pattern pacts with 12 oil companies

Lakewood, Colo.—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers reached agreements with 12 oil companies, covering 19,000 workers, in the current round of industry-wide bargaining.

Contracts for the union's 50,000 oil workers expired Jan. 7. Bargaining continued without a strike and a settlement was reached Jan. 10 with Gulf Oil Corp. which set the pattern for the industry. The accord provides increases of 20 cents per hour the first year and 35 cents per hour the second year, company contributions toward family health care coverage rising by $15 per month.

OCAW has strikes in progress at Cenex Refinery in Laurel, Mont., and at Union Oil of California refineries in Wilmington and Rodeo, Calif., involving 785 workers.

Negotiations are continuing at those locations and the possibility of strikes of other companies still exists, OCAW said.

Thus far, OCAW has reached agreements with Gulf, Ashland Oil, Tosco Oil Co., Atlas Processing, Edgington Oil, Atlantic-Richfield, Charter International, American Oil Co., Mobil Oil Corp., Marathon Oil, Golden West Refining Co., and two refineries of Union Oil in Illinois.

J.P. Ricciarelli dies at 60, headed Granite Cutters

Weymouth, Mass.—Joseph P. Ricciarelli, former president of the Granite Cutters, died Jan. 1 after a heart attack. He was 60.

Ricciarelli was president of the Granite Cutters from 1967 until the merger with Tile, Marble & Terrazzo Finishers in 1980. At the time of his death, Ricciarelli was granite cutters director of the merged union.

He is survived by his wife, Jean, and five children.

Eximbank hit on U.S. financing of Korean steel

A decision by the U.S. Export-Import Bank to guarantee commercial export loans of more than $30 million for a South Korean steel complex flies in the face of reason, the AFL-CIO charged.

"We are disappointed by this decision," Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

The agency's loan agreement represents a compromise. The Reagan Administration had wanted the bank, a federal entity, to lend government money to South Korea outright at subsidized interest rates. The AFL-CIO had opposed any kind of aid for the South Korean mill, charging that any additional world production would further harm the U.S. steel industry.

"We don't view the compromise as being an appropriate one," Oswald said. "Any participation by the U.S. government in increasing steelmaking production capacity is potentially harmful to American workers."

In a letter to Eximbank President William H. Draper, Oswald earlier had noted that existing worldwide steel capacity already far exceeds demand.

Message to Japanese labor cites free trade union goals

Tokyo—In seeking solutions to unemployment, inflation and sluggish economic growth, free trade unions must continue to advance and defend the universal principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a message to the 20th annual convention of the Japanese Confederation of Labor—Domei.

"There cannot be real progress, nor can we benefit from the new advances in science and technology unless we maintain the social criteria in the development of all economic programs, whether on a national or an international basis," Kirkland declared. His statement was delivered by Federation Vice President Albert Shanker.

The free trade union movement of the world must rededicate itself to support such efforts in all intergovernmental bodies, primarily in the International Labor Organization, Kirkland said.

These efforts must be especially strengthened in those areas where economic and trade issues vitally affecting trade unions are being handled, he said. Labor must have a more effective role in the decision-making processes of the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT) and bodies of the United Nations, Kirkland added.

Along with the struggle for free trade unionism on the economic front, Kirkland said, Domei and the AFL-CIO must redouble their efforts to reject attempts by totalitarian powers to dismantle the supervisory machinery of the ILO dealing with international labor conventions and their implementation.

Kirkland thanked Domei for its boycott of Continental Airlines in support of U.S. unions on strike against Continental Airlines.

He also congratulated Domei's Tadanobu Usami on his recent election as president of the Asian Regional Organization of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Also attending the three-day meeting was Morris Paladino, executive director of the AFL-CIO's Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

OSHA panel asks tougher asbestos rule

An Occupational Safety & Health Administration advisory committee on construction rejected the agency's draft proposal on worker exposure to asbestos as not addressing specific concerns of the construction industry.

The 15-member panel, noting some 75 percent of asbestos exposure occurs in the construction industry, requested OSHA to develop a separate asbestos proposal for the building trades.

Two key committee proposals call for reducing a worker's permissible exposure to 100,000 fibers per cubic meter of air and requiring engineering controls and work practices take priority in controlling workplace asbestos levels over the use of respirators.

Other committee proposals would require employers to provide shower rooms and changing rooms for workers on job sites, annual medical examinations and "a zero-fiber action level"—triggering full protective measures when workers encounter the presence of asbestos on the job.

OSHA issued an emergency standard on asbestos last November limiting exposure levels to 500,000 fibers. But an industry group challenged the action, and implementation of the measure was stayed pending resolution of the court case.

OSHA's draft proposal for a permanent standard, which the committee reviewed, sets the same exposure level of 500,000 fibers, down from the current limit of 2 million fibers.

Lower ceiling

The advisory committee said the 500,000-fiber level is too high and called for the 100,000-fiber ceiling. OSHA in the past has questioned accurate measurement of such levels; however, a representative of the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health assured the committee the 100,000-fiber level is now well within the realm of accurate measurement.

The committee also rejected OSHA's proposal to allow for the removal of a worker from an asbestos-related job based on a check of either his medical records or medical condition.

It suggested that removal be based on annual exposure. If a worker's exposure exceeds the limit allowed for a one-year period, the worker could be removed to another job on the work site, the committee said.

The tripartite panel is comprised of five representatives each from labor, employers and the public.

Industrial policy report backs plan to mobilize public, private sectors

panel's recommendations. The ingredients include:

- A relatively small Industrial Development Board made up of an equal number of high-level labor, business and government members. The board would seek to form a consensus on strategies to promote industrial growth and submit recommendations to the President. It would strive to ensure that government efforts do not work at cross-purposes with private efforts.

Project financing

- An Industrial Finance Administration that would further the goals set by the development board through commitments of loans and loan guarantees. But at least half of the funding for any project receiving government assistance would have to come from the private sector.

- An expanded commitment to technological research and development, with the jury still out as to whether to achieve this through expansion of existing government programs or through the creation of a separate agency.

The report noted that "America's trading partners have long employed industrial policies, including trade and financial subsidies, to promote their products." The procedures the United States can use to guard against unfair trade practices are "inadequate in the face of the new activism in the economic role of other governments," the report said.

It pointed out that the U.S. industrial decline hasn't been confined to steel and automobiles. "It afflicts machine tools, aerospace, construction equipment and farm machinery as well." It embraces "the high technology areas of video recorders, memory chips, telecommunications and robotics."

Permanent job loss

While much of the double-digit unemployment the nation suffered under could be traced to the recession, "thousands of automobile, steel and other basic manufacturing employees who have been laid off will not be recalled," the report observed.

At the news conference, Kirkland noted that the United States has long had an agricultural policy and overseas banking and monetary policy through the Federal Reserve System and a network of other bodies. In effect, he suggested, it has used tax policy—although unwisely—for a declared goal of encouraging corporate investment. But that path resulted in a wasteful drain of tax revenues that funded nonproductive corporate takeovers and mergers, Kirkland noted.

The panel's leaders did not shrink from the term "social contract" when a suggestion was made at the news conference that this was the direction in which their recommendations pointed. But they emphasized that the proposals were for a framework that could lead to a greater degree of labor-management cooperation, not to a specific course of action.

The report noted the precedent of the Labor-Management Group in the Ford Administration as an informal mechanism for high-level labor-management interchange. And the panel itself was one of several ad hoc groups formed in recent years to seek a consensus that would bridge bargaining table divisions.

Last fall, a comparable Labor-Management Group coordinated by former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop voiced concern at the deterioration of the nation's infrastructure and proposed a 15-year program of repair and upgrading of highways, bridges, water supply systems and waste treatment facilities.

Group membership

The Industry Policy Study Group included, besides the three co-chairmen: W. Michael Blumenthal, chairman of Burroughs Corp. and former Secretary of the Treasury; Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.), Stuart Eizenstat, formerly President Carter's domestic affairs assistant; Auto Workers President-emeritus Douglas Fraser; Northwest Industries President Ben W. Heineman; Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca; Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.); Iron Workers President John H. Lyons; Robert MacNamara, former World Bank president; Morton H. Meyerson, president of Electronic Data Systems Corp.; Eleanor Holmes Norton, former chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission; Yale University Prof. Merton J. Peck; Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel; Loral Corp. Chairman Bernard Schwartz; MIT Prof. Lester Thurow; Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts; attorney Frank Weil and former Sec. of State Vance.

While they all joined in shaping the report, not every member agreed with every aspect. Columbia Law School Prof. Lewis B. Kaden was the project director.

At news conference, AFL-CIO President Kirkland and other authors of Industry Policy Study Group's report respond to questions.

U.S., world unions support Continental Airlines strike

Support for striking Continental Airlines employees grew at home and abroad as free world unions pledged solidarity, and American labor planned a coordinated show of backing in a dozen major locations.

On the domestic front, the AFL-CIO joined with the Air Line Pilots and the Machinists in plans for demonstrations at major cities serviced by Continental.

The rallies, which are scheduled for the Jan. 27-29 weekend with repeat demonstrations on the following weekend, will challenge the carrier's perversion of federal bankruptcy laws to unilaterally abrogate union contracts.

The rally sites are Chicago, Denver, Houston, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, St. Paul, New York, San Francisco, Seattle, Honolulu, Washington, D.C., and Agana, the capital of Guam.

The Seattle rally will coincide with the Jan. 27 AFL-CIO regional conference in that city, and Federation President Lane Kirkland will lead conference participants as they join the demonstration.

Eight unions took part in a mass rally at Tulsa's airport this week, and airline employees had scheduled protests at Washington's National Airport and at Dulles International Airport in Virginia on Jan. 20.

Meanwhile, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels, "deeply concerned by the attitude of the U.S. airline," announced its full support of demands by the Machinists and the Air Line Pilots for immediate, good-faith negotiations with Continental.

Domei, the Japanese Confederation of Labor, responded to the American unions' call for support with a boycott of the airline and called on travel agents not to issue Continental tickets.

The Australian Council of Trade Unions voted a ban on Continental flights, but delayed implementing the action pending the outcome of mediation between the airline and the striking Air Line Pilots.

ALPA said it planned to appeal a ruling by a bankruptcy judge in Houston rejecting its claim that Continental's bankruptcy-law filing was an anti-labor tactic designed to bust the union.

ALPA, the Machinists, and the unaffiliated Union of Flight Attendants had charged that Continental was using bankruptcy proceedings as a device to void labor contracts.

Continental, once the nation's eighth largest carrier, filed for protection under Chapter 11 of the federal Bankruptcy Code on Sept. 24. Three days later, the carrier resumed about half its flights, using one-third of its 12,000 workers and imposing severe wage cuts.

Frontier Airlines spinoff branded anti-union tactic

A coalition of airline unions has set up picket lines at terminals used by a new airline—Frontier Horizon—to alert passengers that the carrier is taking off with non-union crews.

The Machinists, Air Line Pilots, Flight Attendants, Transport Workers and Air Line Employees are protesting creation of the new non-union carrier by its parent company, Frontier Airlines. Although the unions attempted to block its certification by the Civil Aeronautics Board, Frontier Horizon began service Jan. 9 between Denver and Washington, D.C., Chicago and San Francisco.

The unions charged that Frontier Horizon is a runaway operation intended to let the company duck its collective bargaining agreement. The next step will be the siphoning off of their jobs to the lower-wage carrier, they stressed.

The coalition charged that the move by Frontier follows a pattern set in 1980 by Texas International Airlines when its holding company spun off New York Air as a non-union subsidiary.

New legal challenges to the company's action are also being considered by the unions. They contend that Horizon is a successor carrier to Frontier—making it in fact the same airline—and its 275 air and ground employees should be covered by the same agreements already in place with the parent company.

The Air Line Pilots, Flight Attendants and Air Line Employees are also bargaining with Frontier over their contracts.

The AFA and ALEA, which are both affiliates of the ALPA, said Frontier has asked for stiff concessions, but has refused to discuss the new carrier.

Foreign aid panel stresses rights role

A high-level government commission weighing the adequacy and effectiveness of U.S. foreign aid programs has put heavy stress on progress of recipient nations in the area of human rights.

The Commission on Security & Economic Assistance said in its report to Secretary of State George P. Shultz that foreign assistance programs must not only be effective and efficient, "but must also make Americans proud of their role in the international community." AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was a member of the panel.

Guiding principles

To secure the support of the American people, the commission said that the following principles must guide U.S. aid programs:

- Respect for individual liberty and the security of the individual.

- Commitment to fairness in economic and social opportunity.

- Pursuit of economic growth and productivity.

- Desire to maintain U.S. national security and to promote world peace.

In its assessment of U.S. aid programs, the commission said assistance activities—security and economic, bilateral and multilateral—are "potent and essential tools that advance our interests," and called for increased levels of aid.

The panel concluded that economic and military assistance must be closely integrated.

Chaired by President Frank C. Carlucci of Sears World Trade, the commission was funded by the Agency for International Development, the Defense Dept., and private contributions. Kirkland served as a co-chairman.

The 123-page report is a comprehensive review of current aid programs and the outlook for future assistance. The last such review and assessment of U.S. foreign aid programs was in 1970.

American labor's viewpoints receive prominent attention in the report. Stressing the development of the private sectors of recipient countries, the recommendations include the following:

"The strengthening of free trade unions and the promotion of employment-oriented development strategies, in an environment conducive to free enterprise, are integral to sound long-term growth and security."

A major recommendation of the report is that recipient countries should adhere to conventions of the International Labor Organization, particularly those relating to freedom of association, discrimination, and forced labor.

Much of the focus of the report is on the Caribbean Basin and Africa.

"The first is an immediate security challenge with an important economic dimension, while the second is a situation of economic crisis that may well heighten security concerns," the panel said.

Concessional financing

Many developing countries, where incomes are low, will remain largely dependent on concessional financing, the commission said. It cited sub-Saharan Africa to illustrate how some of the most intractable problems interact.

Finding that the U.S. foreign cooperation program currently is inadequately funded, the commission called for "significant increases in real levels of assistance" to meet U.S. short- and long-term foreign policy objectives and to fund new initiatives in the Caribbean Basin and Africa.

"Given the nature of the problems the United States will face in the less-developed world during the coming decade, either lesser objectives or more resources will be called for," the commission observed.

State legislatures act on labor issues

$2.50 last July and will move to $3 on July 1, 1984. Regulation of private employment agencies was tightened.

Connecticut—Breaking new ground, employers of 100 or more who close or relocate their establishments must pay for continuation of existing group health insurance for workers and their dependents for 90 days. Thereafter, for 39 weeks, displaced workers can buy a continuation of their insurance at group rates.

District of Columbia—New wage order raised minimum pay for clerical and semi-technical occupations from $2.90 to $3.90; the minimum for laundry, dry cleaning and shoe repair employees was increased from $3 to $3.70, with a $3 rate for learners with less than 60 days of experience.

Delaware—Minimum wage raised from $2 to $3. Also, the tip credit allowance was reduced from 50 percent of the required minimum wage to one-third. Ban on sex discrimination in pay was strengthened.

Idaho—In a now-familiar pattern, the Republican legislature voted to repeal the "little Davis-Bacon Act" prevailing wage requirement for state construction, but failed to override the veto by Democratic Gov. John V. Evans.

Illinois—A major advance was enactment of a law granting collective bargaining rights for most public employees, including the right to strike unless public health or safety is endangered. Teachers were covered by a separate, comparable law. Police and firefighters were excluded and are seeking legislation that includes binding arbitration of their contract disputes. The law allows contracts covering public workers to require "fair share" agency shop payments from non-members to cover non-political union expenses.

Other new legislation included a three-step raise in the minimum wage, to reach the $3.35 federal level on Jan. 1, 1986; right-to-know law allows an employee to refuse to work with a toxic substance if the employer has refused to provide information about its hazards.

The state's prevailing wage requirements were strengthened and state and local agencies are required to buy American-made steel products. Workers throughout the state are guaranteed access to personnel records, with the right of response, and a new law declares it public policy to prevent sexual harassment in employment.

Sanitation standards were set for farms using migrant workers.

Iowa—A new law that will take effect July 1 establishes a policy that state employees will receive equal pay for jobs of comparable worth. It will be preceded by a job evaluation study that will focus on predominantly male and female job categories.

In another area, the legislature barred employers from requiring an employee or an applicant for a job to take a polygraph examination as a condition of employment.

Maine—Legislature adopted, subject to referendum approval, an equal rights amendment to the state constitution. A new law bars use of state payments to health care institutions for hiring of any person whose services result in committing an unfair labor practice under federal or state law.

Maryland—Coverage of the prevailing wage law was extended to include local contracts involving at least 50 percent state funding (75 percent for school construction). Previously local government contracts were covered only if 100 percent state-funded.

Massachusetts—Right-to-know law was enacted requiring employer to provide both information and safety training on hazardous substances.

Minnesota—Right-to-know law was enacted on final day of session, including a training requirement. Employers who provide maternity or paternity leave to biological parents are required to allow leave under the same conditions to adoptive parents.

Nevada—Prevailing wage law was enacted to apply only construction contracts over $20,000; the previous floor was $4,000.

New Hampshire—State right-to-know law enacted, including right to refuse to work with toxic substances if employer has refused information. Existing law allowing 75 percent of minimum wage to be paid to persons 18 or under amended to apply only to persons 17 or under. New law gives workers right to inspect personnel files and have their response made a part of the record.

New Jersey—Strong right-to-know law was enacted despite opposition from the state's many chemical manufacturing concerns.

New Mexico—Minimum wage for workers receiving tips increased from $1.60 to $2.01.

New York—Minimum wage for farmworkers was raised from $2 to $2.75 an hour as of Feb. 4, 1984, and will rise to the $3.35 level guaranteed other workers on July 1, 1984. Prevailing wage law was amended to set the collective bargaining rate as the pay level provided it is received by at least 30 percent of the workers in a locality.

North Carolina—"Anti-slavery" law was enacted to spur prosecution of farm labor contractors who trap workers into perpetual debt to keep them in virtual bondage.

North Dakota—Human rights law was enacted banning discrimination in employment and housing, including job discrimination because of age for persons 40 to 70. Physical or mental handicaps are covered. Discrimination based on sex is defined to include sexual harassment.

Ohio—Landmark bargaining law was enacted for state and local employees, with procedures to adjudicate unfair labor practice charges and right to negotiate an agency shop. If mediation fails, most employees will have a right to strike if they reject a fact-finding panel's recommendations by a three-fifths vote of the bargaining unit. Binding arbitration is provided for disputes involving police and firefighters. A 1947 law barring public employee strikes and setting stiff penalties was repealed. Democratic victories in the 1982 legislative and gubernatorial elections set the stage.

Oklahoma—The minimum wage, previously $3.10, was raised to the federal level of $3.35 for employers of 10 or more. Most such employers are already covered by federal law. In smaller establishments, the minimum was raised from $1 to $2.

Pennsylvania—The ban on age discrimination under state law was amended to protect persons up to age 70, instead of 62.

Oregon—A new law set up a task force to seek a sexually neutral job and pay classification system for state employees.

Rhode Island—Right-to-know legislation was enacted, and a survey of sex-based pay inequities in state job classifications was ordered.

Texas—State's first equal employment law was enacted, covering only establishments with 15 or more workers.

Utah—Work in excess of eight hours a day will no longer be unlawful in smelters and underground mines if state industrial commission certifies it is not harmful to a worker's health, safety or welfare. Public employees now may serve as delegates to a political convention or serve on a party committee.

Vermont—Establishments can now operate on Sundays and holidays.

Washington—The legislature voted to set up a 10-year phase-in of comparable worth pay for state employees, but a federal court upheld a suit brought by the State, County & Municipal Employees and ordered that the state complete the job within two years—with back pay rights dating back to 1979.

Thanks from United Way

Under a negotiated payroll plan, New York's Carpenters contributed more than $300,000 to the city's United Way campaign over a two-year period. James Viggiano, left, vice president of the Carpenters district council, accepts a plaque of appreciation from Louis L. Levine, former state labor commissioner. Thomas Theobald, center, is chairman of the city's United Way campaign.

Copyright law change urged in wake of TV taping decision

A Supreme Court ruling that home video taping of television broadcasts doesn't violate copyright laws makes it necessary for Congress to assure that creative artists and performers are fairly compensated for their work, the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees urged.

DPE Director Jack Golodner said after the high court's Jan. 17 decision that it is now "up to Congress to see to it that performing artists and supporting personnel in television, film and record production are compensated for copyrighted material." The court's 5-4 decision allowing home taping goes "against their interests," he asserted.

Golodner said AFL-CIO unions representing workers in the entertainment industry and performing arts are "greatly disappointed" with the court's conclusion. But he pointed out that the court's opinion did acknowledge that Congress has the responsibility and the power for making laws that will ensure "that America's creative and intellectual talents receive a fair share of the fruits of their labors."

The high court decision reversed a lower court ruling that the copying of programs and the sale of video recorders were illegal without some form of compensation to the copyright owners and the entertainment industry. The justices said that taping in the home strictly for limited, noncommercial use is not a violation of the existing copyright statute.

Golodner noted that Sen. Charles M. Mathias (R-Md.) and Rep. Don Edwards (D-Calif.) have introduced legislation in both houses of Congress that would "fairly and sensibly" compensate performers and the industry.

The proposed legislation would provide for royalties to be paid by the manufacturers of blank tapes and recording equipment. The proceeds would be pooled and divided among the copyright owners.

Golodner stressed that manufacturers of sound and video recording devices and blank tapes should "contribute a small part of their profits to those who create the material which makes recording equipment a very popular, marketable item."

Without compensation for the loss of control of their products and for the profits lost because of copying, the quality and quantity of sound, film and videotaped performances is likely to diminish, Golodner warned.

Indicators signal slowdown in recovery

Unemployment may remain painfully high this year and economic growth may be less than the Administration's forecast, several indicators suggest.

The Commerce Dept. reported that housing starts and building permits both fell last month from November levels. Also disquieting to some forecasters was the department's report that retail sales, adjusted for seasonal factors, rose only one-tenth of 1 percent from November. It was the smallest rise in four months.

Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve Board said that the output of the nation's factories rose five-tenths of 1 percent in December, the smallest monthly gain in almost a year.

These reports indicated that recovery from the long Reagan Recession was slowing while joblessness remained high.

The report on housing starts and building permits was significant since the two indicators generally foreshadow where the economy may be heading. Both have been edging downward since last summer.

Cold weather contributed to the December decline in starts of new housing. The month's decline compared with a 5.5 percent increase in November. The December setback occurred entirely in single-family home construction, down 11.4 percent.

Domestic retail sales in December were up only one-tenth of 1 percent from November, although for the year they were up 9.1 percent from 1982. A far sharper increase had been expected.

The late December cold wave also was expected to figure in higher heating oil bills for homeowners. After the cold spell crippled the refineries, major home-heating oil suppliers raised wholesale prices by between 5 and 8 cents to the 90-cent-a-gallon range.

Reflecting a slower rate of expansion in the fourth quarter, the rate of factory capacity utilization among U.S. industries posted only a three-tenths of 1 percent increase in December. Although the improvement over the month was less rapid than gains earlier in the year, it brought the pace of industry to its busiest since September 1981, 79.4 percent.

The rise of five-tenths of 1 percent in industrial production last month followed a jump of seven-tenths of 1 percent in November and a rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent in October. It was the smallest increase since a five-tenths of 1 percent increase posted last February.

A REPORT ON CONGRESS

By Lane Kirkland

Each year the AFL-CIO evaluates the voting performance of every member of Congress on matters that touch the lives of American working men and women. This Report on Congress is the result of that analysis. It provides a representative number of votes by each Senator and Representative which clearly indicate a concern—or a lack thereof—for America's working people on issues of jobs, health care, unemployment, retirement and the quality of life.

The mid-term election of November 1982 saw a shift away from a Congress dominated by those who had rubber-stamped the disastrous Reagan economic policies. Many disciples of Reaganomics were defeated in the House; unfortunately, the Senate remained in control of the Reaganites. In January 1983 a new Congress convened, which clearly had lost its stomach for further dismantling of the federal system by the Reagan administration. Whether damage could be repaired was a question.

The House of Representatives with its Democratic majority pushed forward with legislation to ease the recession, to put people back to work, to provide assistance to the unemployed, and those who had lost their health care coverage. But at virtually every turn this progress was thwarted by the Senate and by the threat of Reagan vetoes.

The conflict between the House where Democrats had a working majority and the Senate/White House majority often produced stalemate. The House's improved margin of new Democrats in 1983 provided the margin of success for much legislation. There were losses—such as the passage of the job-destroying Caribbean Basin Initiative—which tells us we have more work to do in improving the make-up of the House.

• The House took the lead in passing legislation to put Americans back to work. But only one jobs bill achieved final passage during the Reagan recession, and Republican House leaders tried to whittle it down to a mere token. The House voted to provide more jobs in projects such as highway and transit repair, improvements of veterans' hospitals and other public facilities. Later in the year, as unemployment levels remained excessive, the House passed a second jobs bill to employ people on local projects. The Senate has not passed this bill, and President Reagan is expected to veto whatever is produced.

• The Democratic-controlled House passed the domestic content bill, which would restore up to a million jobs in auto production and supplier industries. Once again, the Senate has failed to act and the President has declared his opposition.

• The House passed legislation to help the jobless maintain health insurance for their families. Because many of the unemployed are not eligible for Medicaid, this legislation is literally a life-and-death matter. So far the Senate has failed to pass a bill; the White House has threatened another veto.

• The House approved a bill to provide short-term loans to unemployed homeowners who are threatened with foreclosure on their mortgages. The program was tightly restricted to minimize any cost or waste, but it was unacceptable to Senators.

• The House passed a tax-fairness bill that would have placed a $700 "cap" on the amount of tax reduction any individual could receive from the 1983 tax cut. The proposal guaranteed a full tax cut to all who earn up to $45,000 per year (which would be less than $700) and $700 for those who earn more. The Republican majority in the Senate voted against this fair tax reform and deficit-reduction measure. The result was that the very wealthy will receive $20 billion over the next few years.

• In votes on unemployment compensation, Trade Adjustment Assistance, job creation and job training, fairness in government and fairness in taxes, the basic issue remains the same: Good legislation passed the House but has been trampled by Republicans in the Senate and the Reagan White House.

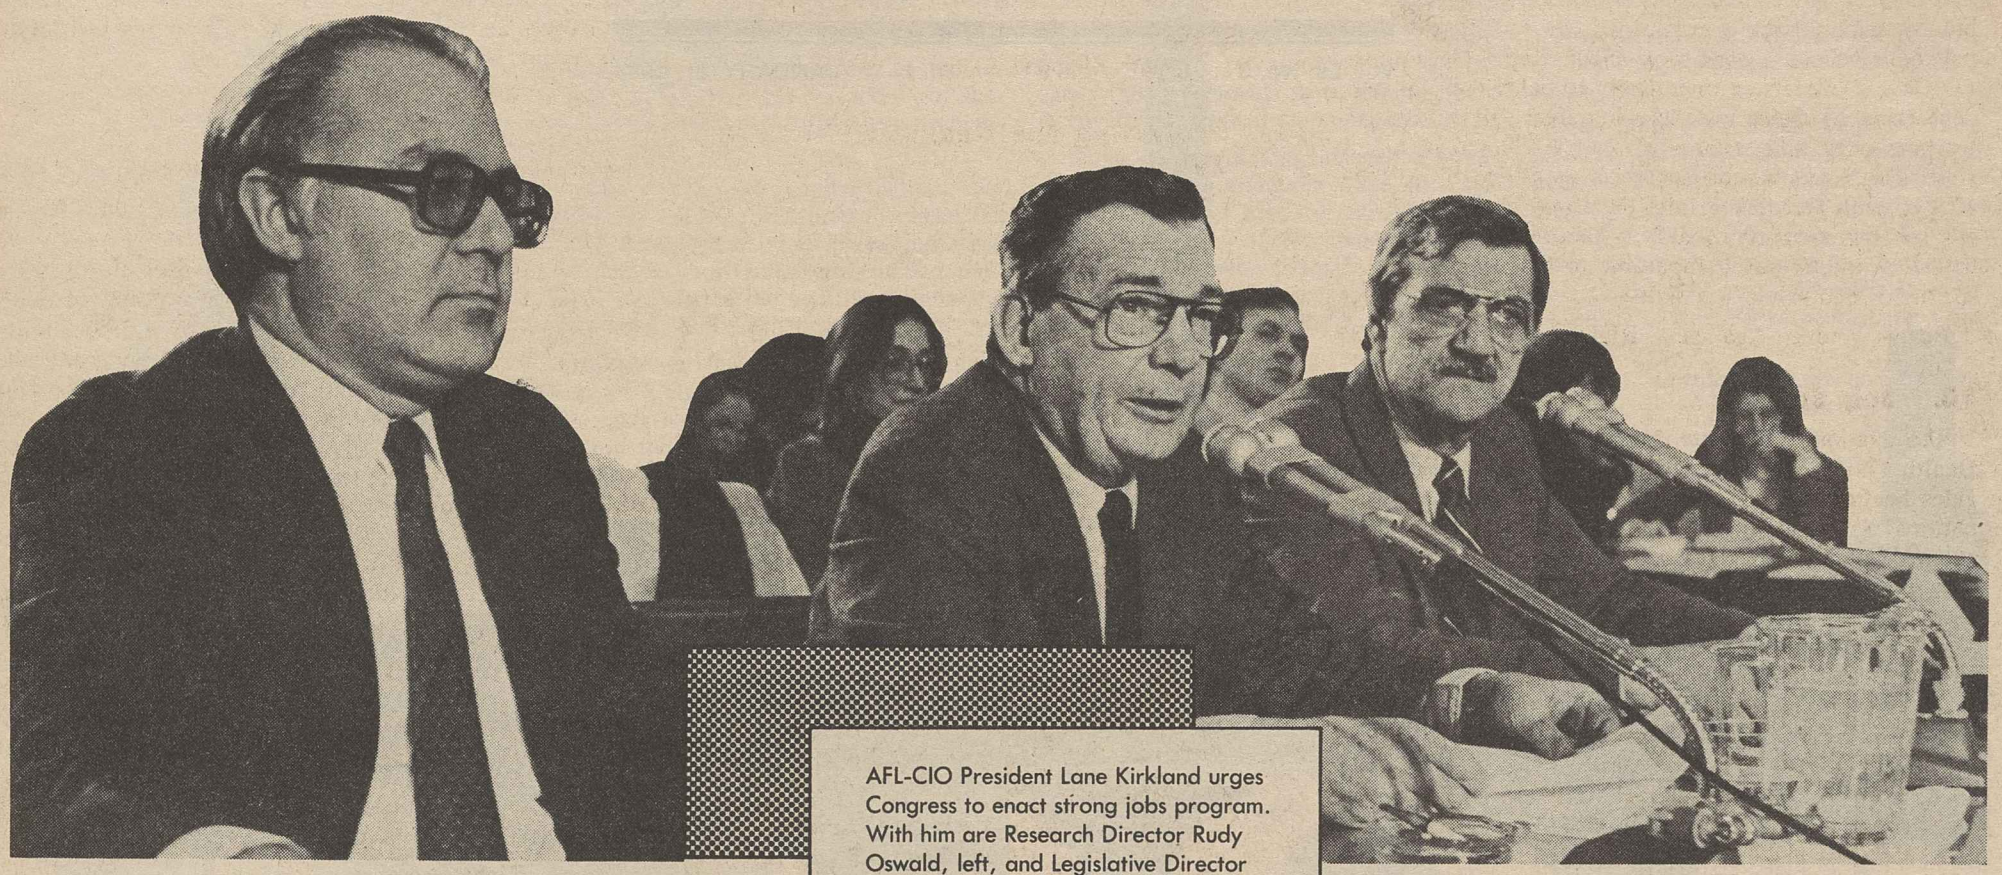
This special section carries labor's 1983 report card on Congress tabulating the votes on major issues of concern to the AFL-CIO in the first session of the 98th Congress. Congressmen and Senators have been judged on 17 key issues—"R-right" or "W-wrong" on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation. The tables also include the cumulative voting record and cumulative "right" percentage of each member since election to the House or Senate. With the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and its importance to the labor movement and the nation. Issues of prime importance to labor are the first 10 votes in the House and the first 7 votes in the Senate. In the tabulations they are the votes listed to the left of the rules.

Labor's Stand on Major Issues in the House



AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urges Congress to enact strong jobs program. With him are Research Director Rudy Oswald, left, and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

1. Jobs I: Public Works Job Creation and Recession Relief

With the nation in the depths of the worst postwar recession, Congress in March passed a $4.9 billion job-creation and humanitarian aid bill. This was the only anti-recession bill to survive the threat of a Reagan veto and a Republican-dominated Senate. It included funds for a variety of job-creating projects including highway and mass transit improvements, repair of schools, veterans' hospitals and other public buildings, water and sewer improvements, weatherization of homes, day care, Head Start and other social services, and special jobs programs for youths and the elderly. The legislation provides for temporary employment of nearly one million Americans.

A key vote came on a motion by Rep. Silvio Conte (R-Mass.) to recommit the bill to committee in order to cut funding for construction projects by $423 million. The AFL-CIO, urging Congress to approve the strongest possible jobs package, worked to defeat the Conte motion, which was rejected 158-256 on Mar. 3.

For recommittal — Wrong. Against recommittal — Right.

2. Jobs II: Preventing Export of Jobs

In 1983 the Reagan Administration once again pushed its so-called Caribbean Basin Initiative, a package of tax and trade privileges that would wipe out all tariffs and protections, thus stimulating Caribbean imports into the United States and further wiping out U.S. jobs. President Reagan claimed his bill was designed to boost the economies of friendly Caribbean nations. A close reading of the legislation, however, revealed that once again the Reagan Administration was pushing welfare for multinational corporations, not the needy workers of the Caribbean nations. For example, under the Reagan bill only 20 percent of a product need be made in a Caribbean nation, the remainder could come from factories elsewhere, including the Far East. All would be duty-free.

The AFL-CIO endorsed an alternative bill designed to provide real help to Caribbean nations while preventing export of U.S. jobs. But the job-saving alternative did not receive consideration because 131 House Republicans, with the help of 81 Democrats, blocked its consideration by narrowly passing a debate rule that allowed only the Reagan bill to come to a vote, with no chance for job-saving amendments. The "closed" rule was approved by a 212-204 vote on July 13.

For the rule — Wrong. Against the rule — Right.

3. Jobs III: Local Public Service Jobs

As the Reagan recession continued to take its toll through the fall of 1983, tht AFL-CIO continued to urge Congress to approve jobs legislation to help the 18.2 million unemployed or underemployed Americans. The House responded by passing a $3.5 billion jobs bill designed to improve community services such as health care and immunization, nutrition for the elderly and handicapped, emergency food and shelter for the unemployed and homeless, and day care for children of working parents. The bill sponsored by Rep. Gus Hawkins (D-Calif.) also includes funds for repair of public streets, bridges, public buildings, and water systems. Priority for jobs would go to those who had exhausted unemployment compensation. The community jobs bill was approved 246-178 on Sept. 21. The Republican controlled Senate has stalled this important employment relief measure.

4. Jobs IV: Domestic Content Legislation

The flood of imported goods has caused the decline of major U.S. industries and the loss of millions of American jobs. While our toughest trade competitors such as Japan vigorously promote and subsidize their industries and restrict imports, the Reagan Administration and its conservative allies in Congress insist on keeping the U.S. wide open to imported goods. Often U.S. products must compete with foreign goods produced with heavy government aid under low-wage conditions. In 1983 these one-way trade policies generated the worst trade deficit in manufactured goods in U.S. history, exploding to nearly 70 billion—double that of 1982. Every billion dollars in deficit translates into 25,000 to 50,000 lost job opportunities.

To help reverse industrial decline, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates worked hard to achieve passage of the domestic auto content bill, which would require foreign auto and truck manufacturers with large sales volume in the United States to produce increasing portions of their vehicles here, using American labor and materials. This legislation would restore an estimated one million jobs in auto production and its supplier industries of steel, glass, electronics, rubber, textiles, plastics, etc. In a major victory for labor, the House approved the content bill by a 219-199 vote on Nov. 3. The legisiation faces an uncertain future in the Senate where conservative Republicans are in control, and President Reagan has declared his opposition to the measure.

5. Davis-Bacon: Fair Wages for Construction Workers

The 1931 Davis-Bacon Act insures that workers on federally financed construction projects will be paid at wage rates that prevail in their area of the country. For over 50 years it has assured local contractors who uphold community labor standards a fair chance to compete for government projects without being undercut by outside firms using cut-rate labor. It has also protected the government and taxpayers from fly-by-night operators seeking to win federal contracts by paying wages too low to attract competent craftsmen.

In 1983, House conservatives led by Rep. Robert Walker (R-Pa.) renewed their piecemeal attack on the law by trying to remove Davis-Bacon protections from local construction projects under the Economic Development Act. The Walker amendment was overwhelmingly rejected 148-270 on July 12.

6. Health Care for the Unemployed

Most people receive their health insurance through their jobs. If they are laid off, they lose these benefits and usually find that they are not eligible for federal Medicaid assistance. The jobless and their families are then forced to do without health care or buy expensive private insurance at a time when their major source of income has been cut off.

To remedy this, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to pass a program of humanitarian relief providing health care for the jobless. In August, the House approved a $4 billion health care bill to provide minimum family health insurance protection. The key vote came on a recommittal motion by Rep. Tom Tauke (R-Iowa) to gut the bill by removing most of its funding. The Tauke motion was rejected 246-178 on Aug. 3. The bill faces an uncertain future in the GOP-controlled Senate.

For recommittal — Wrong. Against recommittal — Right.

7. Trade Adjustment Benefits for the Unemployed

In 1962 Congress created Trade Adjustment Assistance—a special program of unemployment compensation and job retraining assistance for those made jobless in industries hurt by imports. The 1981-82 Reagan Administration budget cuts nearly eliminated TAA. In 1983 Congress reversed gears and began to restore funding for the program.

In September the House passed legislation to continue the TAA program through 1985. The bill added more funds for the program and extended its benefits to workers displaced in industries that supply the primary manufacturers. Conservatives led by Rep. Bill Frenzel (R-Minn.) tried to recommit the bill in order to cut funding and restrict eligibility for TAA benefits. Frenzel's motion was rejected 194-218 on Sept. 15.

For recommittal — Wrong. Against recommittal — Right.

8. Unemployment Compensation

The Reagan recession caused the layoff of millions of Americans who had never been unemployed before, it also worsened the severity of their joblessness. The average duration of unemployment jumped from 13 weeks in January 1982 to 20 weeks in August 1983. Budget cuts in federal unemployment compensation left less than 35 percent of the currently unemployed receiving benefits.

For many of the longest-term unemployed, federal supplemental unemployment benefits—available after regular state jobless compensation is exhausted—protect against eviction from homes, hunger, and even the break-up of families. In September 1983 this supplemental federal UI program came up for renewal. Conservative Republicans led the fight against extending coverage to those unemployed the longest. A key vote came on Rep. Carroll Campbell's (R-S.C.) motion to recommit the bill in order to cut the maximum benefit from 16 weeks to only 12 weeks. The Campbell motion was rejected by the House by a lopsided 141-278 vote on Sept. 29.

For recommittal — Wrong. Against recommittal — Right.

9. Federal Workers' Pay

The unfairness of Reaganomics became apparent again in late 1983 when Congress considered a 4 percent pay raise that had been promised to federal civilian and military personnel. The Reagan tax cuts for the wealthy had pushed the budget deficit to $200 billion, and conservatives in Congress moved to reduce that deficit—not by restoring fair taxes on the wealthy, but by taking back a portion of the federal workers' pay raise before it even took effect. Rep. James Jones (D-Okla.) offered an amendment to delay the four percent raise by three months—in effect, giving federal workers only nine months of a raise instead of a full year. The Jones amendment was approved by a 245-176 vote on Oct. 25 despite the Presidential pay panel's recommendation of a 21.5 percent raise to make federal workers' pay comparable to that in the private sector for equivalent job skills.

10. Job Safety

The National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) is the government agency that provides health-related technical information to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA) and to the Mine Safety & Health Administration (MSHA). For example, NIOSH recommends acceptable standards on workplace chemicals and tests and certifies protective equipment; OSHA and MSHA then set the standards and enforce them.

Early in the Reagan Administration, Congress transferred NIOSH from Washington, D.C., to the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control. This was seen as an attempt to undercut NIOSH's mission by placing it at a geographical distance from OSHA and MSHA. In 1983 Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) offered an amendment to bring NIOSH under the jurisdiction of the Washington-based National Institutes of Health. The AFL-CIO argued that this would improve the efficiency of NIOSH and urged the House to approve the Dingell amendment. The proposal was defeated 186-206 on Nov. 17.

11. Slashing Social Security Benefits

Early in 1983 Congress passed a package of amendments to Social Security designed to improve the long-term health of the nation's No. 1 retirement plan. Most of the changes had been recommended by a bipartisan commission that included AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. The commission proposal was later packaged in an omnibus Social Security bill and sent to the House floor. During debate conservative Republicans and "boll weevil" Democrats succeeded in a major future weakening of the program. Rep. Jake Pickle (D-Tex.) offered an amendment to raise the retirement age from 65 to 67, starting in the year 2009 and phasing in by 2027. All workers who are now younger than 40 would be adversely affected by the amendment. It also increased from 20 percent to 30 percent the benefit reduction penalty for those retiring before age 67.

Progressive Democrats backed by the AFL-CIO countered with an alternative amendment offered by Rep. Claude Pepper. But the House rejected the alternative and approved the Pickle amendment by a 228-202 vote on Mar. 9.

12. Fairness in Federal Programs

In 1981 and to a lesser extent in 1982, Congressional Republicans joined by "boll weevil" Democrats approved federal budgets with drastic cuts in programs for working people and the poor along with tax cuts for the wealthy. After the 1982 elections, however, Congress viewed the results of the Reagan experiment and did not like what it saw: unemployment, soup lines and enormous budget deficits. In March 1983 the House approved an AFL-CIO-backed budget that began to restore funding of jobs, training, unemployment benefits, education, and other programs. This budget, while not as comprehensive as what the AFL-CIO had proposed, stopped the Reagan Administration slashing of programs and began the turnaround of budget priorities. The AFL-CIO-backed budget was approved 229-196 on Mar. 23.

13. Protecting the Unemployed from Eviction

With 9.4 million Americans out of work and fewer than 35 percent of them receiving unemployment benefits, the House passed a recession relief program of emergency loans to help unemployed homeowners avoid foreclosure and loss of their homes. The House-passed legislation was modest and well-crafted; it would authorize $760 million in emergency loans to jobless homeowners considered good risks to repay the loan when economic conditions improve and they find work again. This bill also provided emergency shelter for the homeless. The House passed the mortgage foreclosure relief bill 216-196 on May 11 despite opposition by the Reagan White House and House Republicans. The AFL-CIO continues to urge action in the Senate where conservative Republicans have stalled the measure.

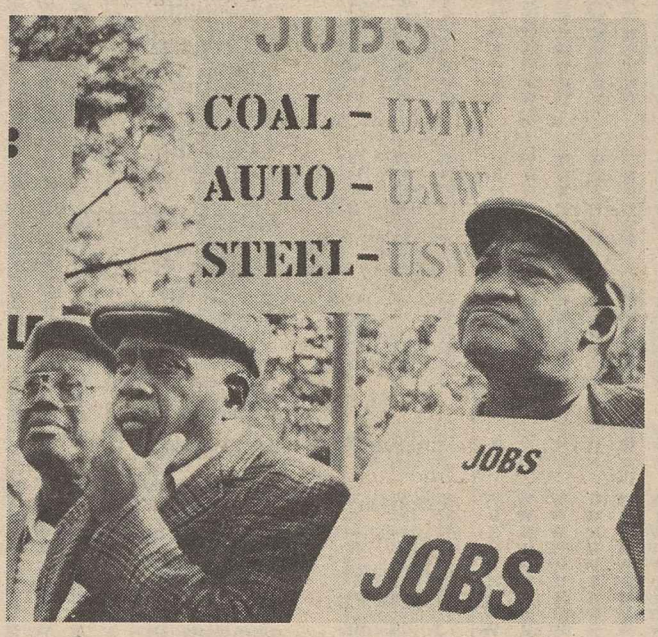
14. Affordable Telephone Service for All Consumers

Under a federal court order, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. was broken up on Jan. 1, 1984, into seven regional companies that provide local service. A new AT&T keeps long-distance lines and other operations. The shake-up of the nation's telephone system threatens to double or even triple phone rates for basic residential service. While proposed local rate increases are state regulatory matters that Congress cannot prevent, proposals for nationwide rate increases did come under congressional scrutiny in 1983.

These were the proposed "access charges" that the pro-business Federal Communications Commission (FCC) sought to allow AT&T to impose for access to long-distance lines. Residential consumers would be hit with extra charges beginning at $2 per month in 1984 and increasing to as much as $10 per month in 1990—even if the consumer made no long-distance calls. And this would be on top of state-approved rate increases. Most of this money would be soaked up by AT&T as extra profits.

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to prohibit the access charge, warning that a combination of rate increases could make basic telephone service unaffordable for many Americans, especially the poor and elderly on fixed incomes. The House passed legislation to ban the access charges, with a key vote coming on an amendment by Rep. Tom Tauke (R-Iowa) which would have merely delayed the charges until a later date. The Tauke amendment was rejected 142-264 on Nov. 10. President Reagan has indicated he opposes legislation to prevent the unfair access charges.

For — Wrong. Against — Right.



15. Equal Rights Amendment

The AFL-CIO has long supported the Equal Rights Amendment, which states simply that "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." The American public supports ERA by a 2-to-1 margin, but it has become the target of right-wing extremists. Although ERA passed the Congress in 1972 and was subsequently ratified by 35 states, right-wing efforts were successful in blocking ratification by the three additional state legislatures needed to make it part of the U.S. Constitution by the June 1982 deadline.

In 1983, the AFL-CIO joined with women's and civil rights organizations in a new campaign to gain adoption of ERA. Although approved quickly by House committee, the amendment temporarily ran aground during a procedural squabble in the House. By a close 278-147 House vote on Nov. 15, the House failed to approve ERA. This was six votes short of the two-thirds majority needed to pass a Constitutional amendment under the expedited debate procedure backed by ERA proponents. House Floor action on ERA is expected again in 1984.

16. Tax Fairness I

In 1983, Congress continued its struggle to restore an element of fairness in taxes, after it had approved in 1981 the largest tax giveaway in the nation's history. After extended discussions and maneuvering, the House fashioned a compromise tax bill which would have raised $8 billion in new revenues over three years through a variety of carefully constructed tax reforms. This bill would have closed some of the 1981 Reagan tax loopholes and solved a number of other longstanding problems in the tax code. The bill also contained a prohibition against taxation of employee fringe benefits—a new tax on working people that President Reagan had been pushing.

Unfortunately, many of the same representatives who voted for the irresponsible Reagan tax windfalls voted to kill this tax reform bill by defeating the debate rule for consideration of the bill. The rule failed to achieve passage by a 204-214 vote on Nov. 17, thus preventing action on the tax bill.

17. Tax Fairness II

In 1981 Congress approved a three-year package of Reagan "supply side" tax cuts, ignoring the AFL-CIO's warning that the bill gave the bulk of its benefits to the wealthy. By 1983 the AFL-CIO's prediction came true. Working people had received a paltry $5 or $10 per week in Reagan tax cuts, an amount erased by higher state and local taxes. The wealthy, meanwhile, enjoyed huge windfalls. The President himself, with an income of $750,000 in 1982, received $91,619 that year in tax benefits from his own legislation.

To restore an element of fairness, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to "cap" the 1983 tax savings at $720 per taxpayer, thus maintaining full tax cuts for families with incomes of $45,000 or less, but stopping the enormous windfalls for those who don't need extra tax cuts. The House passed this tax-fairness legislation 229-191 on June 23. Unfortunately, the Republican-controlled Senate later killed the bill.

Labor's Stand on Major Issues in the Senate

Above: Workers at Government Printing Office fight back against attack by Reagan Administration on pay, working conditions.

1. Jobs I: Creating New Jobs and Providing Recession Relief

During consideration of the only job-creation bill passed by Congress during the Reagan recession, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) made an attempt to increase the scope of the program to provide more meaningful relief to the 13.2 million Americans suffering from joblessness. Levin's amendment would have added $1.6 billion in funds for community jobs programs and recession relief such as health care, food and emergency shelter for the homeless. But a majority in the GOP-controlled Senate turned their backs on the unemployed and voted 53-34 on Mar. 11 to reject the Levin amendment. At a time of depression-level unemployment, Republicans argued that the cost was too great even though it amounted to only $126 in job-creation funds for each unemployed American.

2. Jobs II: Preventing Job Exports

Senate action on President Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative bill (see House Vote 2 for details) moved forward when the Senate Finance Committee packaged several bills, including CBI, with legislation that repealed a key 1982 tax compliance reform (see Senate Vote 8 for details). Sen. Russell Long (D-La.) offered a tabling motion to kill the entire labor-opposed package including CBI. But the President's conservative allies rallied to defeat the Long motion 46-51 on June 16. This vote paved the way for eventual enactment into law of the job-destroying CBI program.

3. Jobs III: "Buy American"

Late in 1982 Congress passed a highway improvements job-creation bill to help bring the nation out of the Reagan recession. This legislation is providing up to 400,000 man-years of work on much needed rehabilitation of highways and other public works. To make sure the funds would create the maximum number of jobs, Congress included strict "Buy American" provisions to guarantee use of American steel and other materials, not Japanese or other foreign products.

In 1983 the Senate considered new legislation that would have weakened these Buy American protections, providing exemptions for contracts of less than $500,000 and reducing the Buy American requirement to only 51 percent of the cost of the project. These changes, for example, would have allowed the use of more than 550,000 tons of foreign steel, costing 3,700 jobs in the U.S. steel industry alone.

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) offered an amendment to stop the weakening of the Buy American policy, but his amendment was killed by Sen. John Chafee's (R-R.I.) tabling motion, 55-35, on Oct. 25. Fortunately, the bill later failed to achieve final enactment, and the Buy American provisions of the highway jobs bill were left intact.

4. Unemployment Benefits I

In September 1983 the federal program of supplemental unemployment compensation came up for renewal in the Congress. Republicans fought efforts to extend and strengthen the program's benefits to help the long-term jobless. The key fight in the Senate was whether the legislation should include up to eight weeks of benefits for those unemployed who had exhausted all compensation and were no longer receiving UI checks. Democrats in the House included this provision in the bill over strong Republican opposition (see House Vote 8). Under increasing pressure from President Reagan, the Republican-controlled Senate rejected an amendment by Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) to add this "reachback" benefit to the bill. The Byrd amendment went down 37-54 on Sept. 30. Fortunately, later in conference the benefits were added to the final bill.

For — Right. Against — Wrong.

5. Unemployment Benefits II

Following rejection of the Byrd amendment (see Senate Vote 4) Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) offered an amendment to add up to 10 weeks of benefits for jobless workers in states with the highest unemployment rates, and lesser amounts for those in states with lower jobless rates. Again Republicans objected to helping the jobless, and the Levin amendment was rejected 26-64 on Sept. 30.

6. Health Care for the Jobless

One of the humanitarian recession-relief programs pushed by the AFL-CIO was health care benefits for the unemployed. When workers are jobless they usually lose health care insurance. Since most jobless workers are unable to pay for private insurance and are not eligible for Medicaid, they and their families must do without basic medical care.

As unemployment hovered at 9 percent, the House was the first to approve a health care program (see House Vote 6). The Senate in its budget bill included a low level of funding for a watered-down program. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) tried to bring the Senate bill in line with the funding levels of the House version, but again Republicans balked. The Senate rejected Kennedy's amendment 36-63 on May 5. Later in the year, arch-conservatives led by Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.) stopped action even on a modest version of the health care bill.

7. Maintaining Federal Employees' Health Benefits

Since 1981 federal government employees have been targeted by the Reagan Administration for massive layoffs, arbitrary cuts in pay, and reduction in job-related benefits. In 1983 conservatives in Congress found a new way to attack federal workers' collectively bargained job benefits: through legislation prohibiting use of federal funds on any health insurance program that includes abortion coverage.

The AFL-CIO has taken no position on the issue of abortion; however, to the federation the key issue in this case was not abortion but whether Congress could disregard the limited collective bargaining rights of federal workers by terminating certain health benefits which they had won and which are available to private-sector employees.

Arch-conservative Sen. Jeremiah Denton (R-Ala.) led the charge against federal employees with an amendment which would have stopped funding for federal workers' health insurance. Sen. Lowell Weicker (R-Conn.) moved to kill the Denton amendment, but failed in a 44-51 vote on Nov. 9.

8. Fair Taxes I

Searching for ways to reduce President Reagan's monstrous $200-billion-per-year budget deficits, Congress in 1982 enacted a tax reform to require that taxes on sizeable stock dividends and savings account interest payments be withheld at time of payment. This so-called withholding tax reform was not a tax increase, but only a better means of collecting taxes that were due but were going unpaid. The reform would raise $13 billion in three years by stopping tax-cheating. The AFL-CIO, noting that taxes are withheld from workers' paychecks, saw no reason why taxes should not be withheld from unearned income, and had long advocated enactment of this tax reform.

In 1983 the banking lobby went on the offensive to repeal the tax withholding reform before it was scheduled to take effect. The key vote in the Senate came on an amendment by Sen. John Melcher (D-Mont.) to delay the tax reform for six months, opening the door toward eventual repeal. Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) moved to kill the Melcher amendment, by tabling it, and succeeded by a 54-43 vote on Mar. 22. But the Congress, overwhelmed by the bankers' postcard lobbying blitz, later repealed the tax withholding reform.

9. Fair Taxes II

A major AFL-CIO initiative to restore an element of fairness to the Reagan supply-side tax program was legislation to impose a $700 "cap" on the 1983 tax cut (see House Vote 17 for details). The tax cap would retain the full tax break for wage earners earning $45,000 or less per year but limit the tax windfall for the rich to $700. It would also raise $6 billion in lost revenues at a time of record-high $200 billion budget deficits. The tax cap passed the House, but the Republican-controlled Senate, bowing to President Reagan's pressure, rejected it by a 45-55 vote on June 29.

For — Right. Against — Wrong.

10. Slashing Social Security Benefits

Conservatives who have long sought to weaken the social security program finally got their chance under Ronald Reagan in 1983. Taking advantage of the need to stabilize the financing of social security, conservatives pushed through an increase in the retirement age for full social security benefits from 65 to 66. This step backward was coupled with another regressive provision imposing a 30 percent benefit reduction penalty for those who must retire before age 66. The AFL-CIO strongly opposed these changes noting that many workers who retire before age 65 do so for reasons of poor health. Unable to defeat this provision, Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) offered a compromise amendment to provide for improved disability benefits for those who are unable to work until age 66. Again conservatives led the charge against the Bradley amendment, which was rejected 30-61 on Mar. 21.

For — Right. Against — Wrong.

11. Cutting Medicare for the Elderly

Medical care costs have increased at three times the general rate of inflation over the last decade. The AFL-CIO has offered several proposals to limit profiteering by physicians and hospitals while guaranteeing health care coverage. The Reagan Administration, on the other hand, has pushed a "Robin Hood in reverse" health care program. The Reagan premise is that the more people have to pay for health care, the less they will use health care services.

In 1981 the first Reagan budget cuts reduced Medicare funding by $3 billion over three years. Eighty percent of these cuts have been absorbed not by hospitals or doctors but by elderly patients. In 1983 the President asked for another $1.8 billion cut in Medicare. The Senate rejected this request but did pass an $800 million cut, thus forcing the elderly to reach deeper in their pockets to make up the difference. A key vote came on an amendment by Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) to restore $400 million for Medicare. But a majority of Senators bought the Reagan program of making the sick pay for their misfortune, and rejected the Baucus amendment 45-50 on May 4.

For — Right. Against — Wrong.

12. Federal Aid to Education

President Reagan's budget cuts in federal aid to public schools have worsened education problems by forcing the cancellation of special teaching programs and by tightening the squeeze on local school districts. Many teaching posts are unfilled, particularly in math and the sciences, because school districts cannot afford to pay competitive salaries to their staffs. Meanwhile America's international competitors, such as Japan, attribute their successes to a firm commitment to education.

During debate on the federal budget, Sen. Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.) offered an amendment to add $1.5 billion in education funds. This included $200 million for a new math and science program, as well as basic grants to elementary and secondary schools. The Hollings amendment also provided help for 600,000 additional needy students to meet tuition payments. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), acting as President Reagan's point man, moved to kill the Hollings amendment. But supporters of education prevailed as Domenici's tabling motion failed 46-48 on May 5, paving the way for adoption of a compromise education funding amendment.

13. Fairness in Federal Programs

In 1981 and 1982, President Reagan used the federal budget process to force big cuts in most programs while allowing huge tax cuts for the wealthy. But by 1983 the results of these policies—deep recession, double-digit unemployment and record budget deficits—were casting doubt on Reaganomics even among members of Congress who had voted for the Reagan program. In May 1983, debate about the economy focused on the new federal budget. The AFL-CIO urged that programs such as job-creation, education and training be restored and that tax loopholes be closed to get the budget under control.

The President, however, refused to budge from his disastrous course. In the Senate, Majority Leader Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) and Budget Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) offered a budget that essentially maintained Reaganomics by providing for a new round of program cuts with no room for tax reform such as the AFL-CIO-backed $700 tax cap (see Senate Vote 9). Sen. Lawton Chiles (D-Fla.) moved to kill this unfair budget and the Senate agreed 52-48 on May 12.

For — Right. Against — Wrong.

14. Helping the Unemployed Avoid Mortgage Foreclosure and Eviction

The Reagan recession brought with it not only the national misery of high unemployment but also soup lines, bankruptcies, foreclosures and evictions in record numbers. The AFL-CIO asked Congress to approve legislation that would provide emergency loans to unemployed homeowners threatened with foreclosure until economic conditions improved and the jobless could find work. Again, the Reagan White House opposed this temporary relief program. Over Republican opposition, the House passed a home mortgage foreclosure relief bill (see House Vote 13). In the Senate, Sen. Don Riegle (D-Mich.) and moderate Republican Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) offered a simillar bill. Once again, Reagan-led conservatives blocked action and approved a tabling motion by Sen. Jake Garn (R-Utah) to kill the program. The vote was 55-39 on June 21.

15. Community Recession-Relief Programs

Federal revenue sharing, first enacted in 1972, provides grants to local governments for use on locally controlled programs, based on local priorities. These grants have been used in a wide variety of projects ranging from pothole repair on local streets to health screening and immunization. Revenue sharing has provided jobs and helped soften the blow of recession in many communities.

In 1983 Congress passed a three-year extension of revenue sharing. The level of funding in the House version was $450 million higher than the Senate's. Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) offered an amendment to compromise by adding $225 million to the Senate bill, but with President Reagan staunchly opposed, conservative Senators closed their eyes to the hardship of recession and rejected the Bradley amendment 36-58 on Sept. 21.

For — Right. Against — Wrong.

16. Preventing Further Hikes in Home Heating Bills

President Reagan signaled his national energy policy shortly after his inauguration when he removed all remaining federal price controls on domestically produced oil. As a result the pump price of gasoline, an oil by-product, immediately jumped 8-10 cents per gallon. Since then Reagan has tried to remove the remaining price controls on natural gas prices. Since Congress partially deregulated natural gas in 1978, prices have skyrocketed. During the 1982-83 winter alone, residential price increases averaged 25 percent across the country, with some regions facing boosts as large as 60 percent. More than 300,000 families spent last winter without heat because they couldn't afford to pay sky-high fuel bills.

In the Senate, conservatives led the fight for the big companies. Sen. James McClure (R-Ida.) offered legislation to give the oil companies who control natural gas production another $40 billion windfall in higher gas prices. Fortunately, most Senators realized that Americans are fed up with oil company rip-offs, and rejected the McClure amendment 28-67 on Nov. 15.

For — Wrong. Against — Right.

17. Maintaining a Strong Public School System

Reagan Administration cuts in federal funds for education have forced local school districts to eliminate many worthwhile teaching programs. Despite this, the President led the charge in 1983 for special tax credits for those who send their children to private schools. The AFL-CIO opposes tuition tax credits on the grounds that they would weaken the nation's public school system. Furthermore, the Reagan-backed legislation would cost the Treasury close to $800 million per year, increasing pressure to cut programs in public education.

Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kans.) offered the Reagan tuition tax credit scheme on Nov. 16. The Senate responded to the Administration's proposal for an additional tax loss in a time of $200 billion budget deficits and killed the Dole amendment 59-38.

High court unanimous

Record checks upheld under wage-hour law

The Supreme Court ruled that the Labor Dept. has the right to order employers to produce wage and hour records for inspection without obtaining a search warrant.

In a unanimous decision, the court said that the section of the Fair Labor Standards Act authorizing the Secretary of Labor to subpoena witnesses or documents related to an investigation is constitutional. The ruling overturned a lower court determination that enforcement of the administrative subpoena power violated Fourth Amendment prohibitions against unreasonable search and seizure.

But the high court's opinion, delivered by Justice William Rehnquist, said that issuing a subpoena—or sending a compliance officer to the public areas of an employer's place of business to deliver it—was not unlawful entry or inspection.

The court said the administrative subpoena only orders the employer to produce wage and hour records, and since no entry to closed or non-public areas is demanded, a judicial search warrant isn't necessary.

The justices also pointed out that a subpoenaed employer has ample opportunity to challenge the subpoena in federal district court before suffering any penalties for refusing to comply with it.

The case stemmed from the Labor Dept.'s attempt to inspect the payroll records of the Lone Steer Motel and Restaurant in Steele, N.D.

After the owner refused to let two compliance officers see the documents, the Labor Dept. issued an administrative subpoena requiring the employer to bring payroll records to the department's regional office in Bismarck. The subpoena was served on a Lone Steer employee in the motel's lobby.

The federal court in North Dakota had ruled that although the Labor Dept. had complied with FLSA provisions in issuing the subpoena, enforcement of it would have violated the Fourth Amendment because no search warrant was obtained in advance from a judge.

But the Supreme Court disagreed, pointing out that "an entry into the public lobby of a motel and restaurant is scarcely the sort of governmental act which is forbidden by the Fourth Amendment."

The subpoena itself did not authorize either entry or inspection of the employer's premises or seizure of the records, it only ordered the motel's owner or agent to produce the appropriate records at a Labor Dept. office, the court said.

The justices said that the lower court's ruling was improperly based on earlier cases decided on different grounds, including the high court's ruling that bars Occupational Safety & Health Administration inspectors from entering an employer's non-public areas without a judicial warrant, or the employer's consent.

The decision pointed out that the court had already held that the subpoena power given to the Secretary of Labor by FLSA is constitutional provided that the subpoena itself is "sufficiently limited in scope, relevant in purpose, and specific in directive so that compliance will not be unreasonably burdensome."

USWA, industry file steel dumping suit against Spain

The Steelworkers joined nine specialty steel companies in a suit against a Spanish producer of stainless steel sheets and strip products, charging it with "flagrantly dumping" goods in the United States.

The industry-labor coalition accused the firm of frustrating U.S. efforts to preserve one of the most critical U.S. industries from the onslaught of dumped and subsidized specialty steel imports.

The Spanish company, Acerinox, is 71-percent owned by a Spanish bank. Another 25 percent of the firm is owned by Japanese interests, including Nisshin Steel.

Richard P. Simmons, chairman of the Specialty Steel Industry panel, said the decision to file the antidumping action with the Commerce Dept. and the International Trade Commission was made because Acerinox is continuing to dump stainless sheets and strip in the United States despite an additional 10-percent tariff placed on these products by the U.S. government.

Simmons said the industry is continuing its investigations of dumping and other unfair trade practices by other countries.

Passing the torch

New president of the New York State AFL-CIO, Edward J. Cleary, left, is congratulated by Raymond J. Corbett, who stepped down after 21 years in the office. Cleary, a member of the Electrical Workers, has been secretary-treasurer of both the New York city and state Building & Construction Trades Councils.

unchanged from October. New Hampshire had the lowest jobless rate at 4.4 percent, but that was up from 3.9 percent in October. Of all 52 jurisdictions, Puerto Rico topped the list with 22.1 percent in November, matching the jobless rate of a month earlier.

The BLS survey showed that the number of workers on non-farm payrolls rose in 24 states, from October to November, but declined in 19 states and was unchanged in seven.

However, the count of the total civilian labor force showed declines in 26 states and Puerto Rico and improvement in 22 states and the District. Two states had no changes.

In a separate report, the BLS reported that first-time claims for state unemployment insurance benefits increased by 8,000 to 421,000, seasonally adjusted, for the week ended Dec. 31, 1983. Without the seasonal adjustment, which takes into account factors such as weather, vacations and school closings, the actual number of initial claims for state benefits totaled 558,000 for the week. BLS said this was an increase of 62,000 from the week before, but still a better mark than the 745,100 initial claims filed during the same week in 1982.

However, the seasonally adjusted rate for initial claims has hovered near 400,000 a week since June, BLS said.

Of the 20 states with jobless rate increases, the biggest jumps were in Alaska, where the rate rose from 8.4 to 10 percent, and in North Dakota, where the increase was from 3.8 to 5.4 percent. In Oregon, the rate rose from 9.1 to 10.4 percent.

Unwanted honor

A BLS survey of metropolitan areas showed that Laredo, Tex., had the nation's highest jobless rate in November at 21.2 percent, down slightly from 21.8 percent in October. Second highest was the McAllen-Pharr-Edinburg area of Texas where the jobless rate was 18.4 percent, down from 19.7 percent.

At the other end of the scale, Bryan-College Station, Tex., had a jobless rate of 2.9 percent in November, down from 3.2 percent the month before. Nashua, N.H., and Stamford, Conn., tied for second at 3.3 percent, although both rates were up slightly from October.

Other metropolitan areas with extremely high rates were Modesto, Calif., 16.7 percent; Huntington, W.Va., and Ashland, Ky., 16.6 percent; Duluth-Superior, Wis., 16 percent, Stockton, Calif., Wheeling, W.Va., and Johnstown, Pa., 15.3 percent; Lake Charles, La., 14.9 percent, and Gary-Hammond-East Chicago, Ind., and the Brownsville, Harlingen-San Benito, Tex., area at 14.5 percent.

Aid to Salvador linked to reforms

In comparison, a section of the Kissinger commission's report states:

"With respect to El Salvador, military aid should, through legislation requiring periodic reports, be made contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections; freedom of association; the establishment of the rule of law and an effective judicial system; and the termination of the activities of the so-called death squads, as well as vigorous action against those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders. These conditions should be seriously enforced."

Kirkland said the commission had expressed this opposition to military aid "on the grounds there had not been sufficient progress on human rights." He said the panel will be watching "what actual progress there is with regard to future proposals for military aid."

Kirkland's comparison of the AFL-CIO convention resolution and the Kissinger commission report came as the Reagan Administration acknowledged the need for substantial human rights progress in El Salvador, but nevertheless called for a major boost in U.S. aid.

Besides the military aid issue, a number of other parallels were cited between the AFL-CIO convention resolution and the Kissinger commission report.

For example, the convention stressed that "the deep-seated social and economic problems in the region cannot be solved by military means alone," while the commission report observed that "until rapid progress can be made on the political, economic and social fronts, peace on the military front will be elusive and fragile. . . ."

On the issue of self-determination, the convention resolution said: "The working people of Central America desire democracy based on political and economic freedom, which can only come about with a change of the old unjust order."

Self-determination

The comparable section of the commission report states:

"We have a humanitarian interest in alleviating misery and helping the people of Central America meet their social and economic needs. . . . Three principles should, in the commission's view, guide hemispheric relations; we have sought to apply them to our considerations of Central America.

"The first principle is democratic self-determination. . . .

"The second principle is encouragement of economic and social development that fairly benefits all. . . .

"There must be an end to the callous proposition that some groups will be 'have-nots' forever. . . ."

In another development, the Salvadoran Army high command ordered a captain linked by subordinates to the 1981 murders of two AFL-CIO advisers to remain jailed. The order followed protests by American labor and government officials over reported plans to release Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila on Jan. 19.

Two former National Guard corporals confessed to assassinating Michael P. Hammer and Mark D. Pearlman, land-reform advisers for the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, and Jose Rodolfo Viera, director of the Salvadoran Institute of Agrarian Transformation. The killings occurred three years ago this month.

The former Guardsmen testified that Avila and Lt. Isidrio Lopez Sibrian provided them with the weapons and ordered them to kill the three men.

Under Salvadoran law, the corporals' testimony cannot be used against others involved in the crime, and this has obstructed further convictions in the case.

In a meeting of top Army officers at the Salvadoran Defense Ministry, it was decided to continue Avila's detention to give local courts and prosecutors an opportunity to question him about the killings.

Avila was being held originally for leaving the country without the high command's permission. He will remain in custody for "an undetermined period of time," the police said.

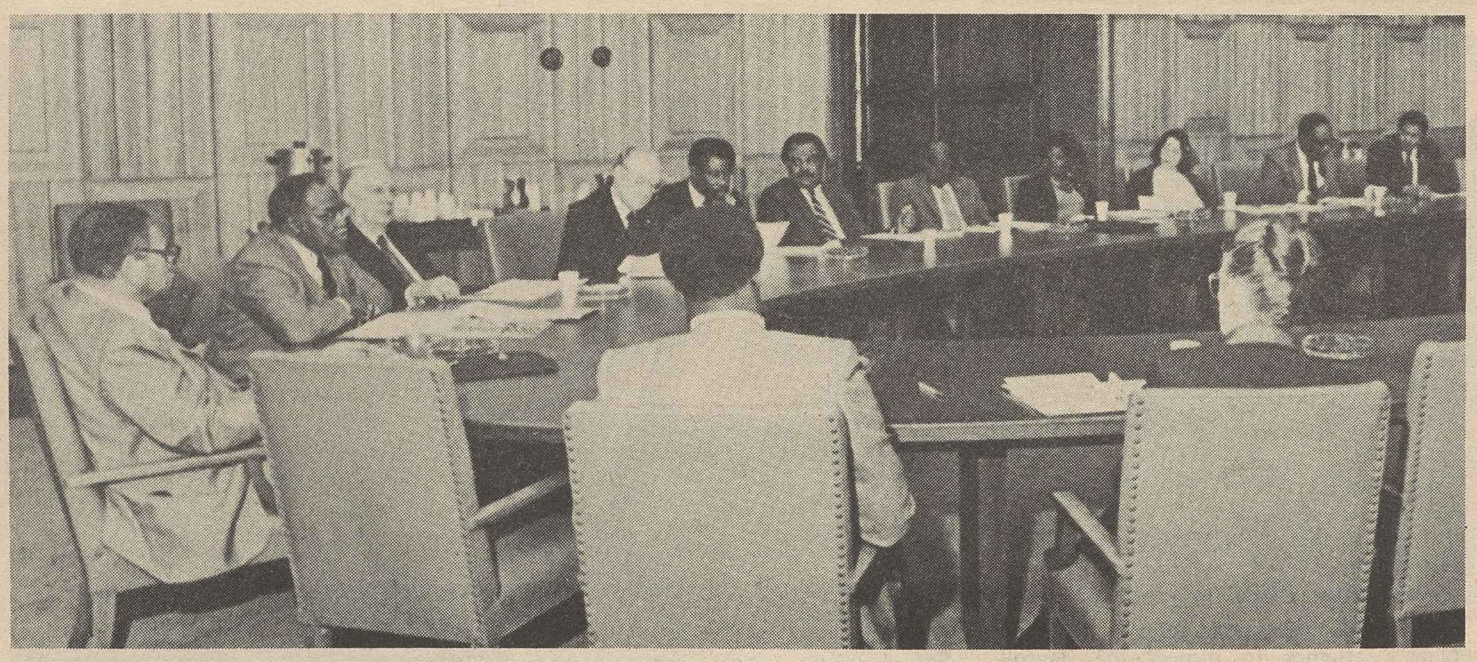
New pamphlet focuses on open shop campaign

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet details the "open shop" crusades of the past 80 years and exposes the narrow-based support of the National Right to Work Committee.

The pamphlet, "The Open Shop Movement: Thriving Through Failure," notes that only three states adopted RTW laws in the past 28 years and only one of those was by popular vote—the remainder by state legislative action.

The pamphlet is made up of articles that appeared originally in the AFL-CIO News on the "Memo from COPE" page.

Copies are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Single copies are free and bulk orders are $25 per 100 copies.



Civil rights reversal scored

Backward steps taken by the Reagan-dominated U.S. Civil Rights Commission were decried by AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, left, chairman of the federation's Civil Rights Committee. The panel at its semi-annual meeting also heard reports on the legislative outlook in the new session of Congress.

Davis-Bacon rules change cleared as Supreme Court denies review

The Supreme Court's refusal to review a lower court decision clears the way for the Reagan Administration to go ahead with damaging changes in Davis-Bacon Act rules—and that could mean lower wages for workers on federal construction projects.

Organized labor had asked the high court to review an apellate court decision approving Labor Dept. changes in regulations for administering the 53-year old prevailing wage law. Building trade unions called the rule changes "radical," and charged that they amounted to "wage-busting" and "forbidden administrative law-making" by the Secretary of Labor.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the federation went to court to block the revisions when they were first proposed in 1982, but the Supreme Court's Jan. 16 refusal to hear the case let stand an appeals court opinion allowing most of the changes. The Labor Dept. said it expects to have the new regulations in place in about a month.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine said the court's decision to deny a review was "no surprise," and he stressed that building trades unions "will be exerting our best efforts and doing whatever we can to see that wages will be protected under the new regulations DOL is going to implement—and to see that workers continue to be protected."

Basically, the new regulations will let Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan change the formula for defining the prevailing wage in an area, permit greater use of lower-paid "helpers," restrict the use of existing Davis-Bacon wage scales in an area in prevailing rate determinations for future projects, restrict the geographic area used for determining wage rates, and loosen some contractor compliance requirements.

New abuses feared

Georgine warned that "there is a good chance that there will be 'open shop' contractor associations who will try to get the rules—especially those on helpers—to mean many other things than they really mean." He pledged that unions will "be vigilant" to make sure workers' rights will not be abused.

Building trades unions charged that the Reagan Administration's interest in changing the Davis-Bacon regulations is an attempt to undercut prevailing wage protections by making revisions even though Congress had not amended the law.

The Davis-Bacon Act, passed in 1931, requires construction contractors doing work for the federal government to pay workers in various classifications the prevailing wage for that work in their geographic area. The law, passed with bipartisan support and signed by a Republican president, was intended to prevent cut-throat competition based on wages among contractors and to protect reputable, established area contractors from unfair competition from fly-by-night, out-of-state operations who snared government contracts by low-balling wage costs in bids.

However, the Reagan Administration in 1982 proposed major changes in the rules for enforcing the law on the grounds that depressing wages on federally funded job sites would be "cost-effective" and save money in the federal budget.

The unions countered that the law was intended to ensure fair wages and working conditions on federal projects, not to save the government money at the expense of workers.

In a July 1982 decision, U.S. District Court Judge Harold H. Greene agreed and issued an injunction blocking the Labor Dept. from going ahead with all the proposed changes except one that allows Donovan to set the prevailing rate based on that paid to 50 percent instead of 30 percent of the workers in a classification.

The Labor Dept. appealed that decision in 1983, and won, but the appellate court ruled that some of the proposed changes must be modified, including those permitting the increased use of helpers and a plan to let contractors "self-certify" that they were in compliance with the law.

The court said the Labor Dept. must recognize "prevailing local practices" regarding the use of helpers, and it rejected the department's plan to let contractors submit compliance statements without any form of wage documentation. Although the new rules will let contractors submit "individualized wage information for each covered employee," weekly payroll records will no longer be mandatory.

'Radical changes'

In asking the high court to review the case, the unions pointed out that the new rules would amount to "radical changes in long-standing regulations," many of which were issued at the same time the law was passed, and many which had been reviewed and reapproved since.

They said the reasons given by the Reagan Administration for fiddling with the regulations were "plainly insufficient," and stressed the way they would lower wage rates in contrast to the purpose of Davis-Bacon which is to ensure fair wages.

The changes, the unions said, were not an effort by Donovan to carry out the original mandate of the law, "but rather an attempt to change that mandate to fit the Secretary's own view of what the statutory purpose should be."

Union coalition urges funding of theater network

New York—A coalition led by entertainment industry unions launched a drive for a federally funded national theater to improve the access of all Americans to the arts and to create jobs.

The National Theater Coalition was formed here during a meeting sponsored by Actors' Equity attended by more than 70 representatives of unions and professional associations, as well as community, civic and service organizations.

The group is urging creation of a network of theaters in cities across the country to make theatrical production accessible to every citizen. At the same time, the group pointed out, thousands of jobs will be available to theater workers.

At its initial meeting, the coalition discussed the Equity's long-standing plan for a national theater. The union's own committee is chaired by President Ellen Burstyn. The national coalition will hold its next meeting in late January to discuss expansion of the plan to all the arts, fund-raising and methods for gaining Congressional support.

Organizations represented at the founding conference were: the Theatrical Stage Employees, Screen Actors, Television & Radio Artists, Theatre Guild, Writers Guild, Labor Theater, International Agency for Minority Artist Affairs, Americans for Democratic Action, the Society of Stage Directors & Choreographers and the National Coalition of 100 Black Women.

Auto Workers ratify Dana contract

Westlake, Ohio — Auto Workers employed by Dana Corp. ratified a new three-year contract that covers more than 7,000 workers at 15 facilities in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Pennsylvania.

UAW Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus, who heads the union's Dana Dept., said the settlement "retains the basic economic principles of our contract and provides greatly improved benefits, wages and job security" to Dana employees.

The new pact provides for an immediate across-the-board increase of 13 cents an hour to cover cost-of-living adjustments due since last September. Wage hikes of 3 percent each year are slated for December 1984 and December 1985. The agreement retains the COL formula at 1 cent for each .26 increase in the government's consumer price index, adjusted quarterly.

Improvements were also posted in pensions for current and future retirees, and in group life and disability programs. A key feature of the contract, the UAW said, is a substantially strengthened job security clause.

Reagan choice shifts balance on OSHA unit

E. Ross Buckley, sworn in as a member of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission less than a week after his recess appointment by President Reagan, will be the swing vote on the three-member panel in decisions that could be detrimental to labor's interests, the AFL-CIO warned.

The nomination of Buckley was opposed by the federation, and the Senate declined to confirm Buckley's nomination in its last session.

Rarely used process

In a rarely used appointment process, Reagan placed Buckley on the commission, marking the first time that method has been used to fill a commission vacancy. Buckley's appointment will end at the adjournment of the next Senate session unless his nomination is confirmed this year.

The President has authority to make recess appointments to fill certain vacancies when Congress is not in session.

Buckley is filling the vacancy created when the term of commissioner Bertram Cottrine ended in April 1983. In opposing Buckley's nomination, Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, questioned whether he had the qualifications to judge technical health and safety issues. Buckley previously was director of the Justice Dept.'s Information & Privacy Act unit before joining OSHRC as general counsel in 1982.

Seminario called Buckley the "swing vote" on the commission, adding labor will closely watch the commission's decisions to see whether the reservations about Buckley "are borne out."

The commission, which reviews cases brought by employers cited for violating OSHA standards, has a growing backlog of cases due to the frequent deadlocks between the other two commissioners—Chairman Robert A. Rowland, a Reagan appointee, and Timothy F. Cleary, who was appointed during the Carter Administration.

Common Market assailed for steel retaliation threat

The Steelworkers and industry officials assailed the European Economic Community's proposal to institute retaliatory trade measures against the United States for its import restraints on specialty steel.

A joint statement by the USWA and the U.S. Specialty Steel Industry termed the EEC action as "simply outrageous."

Last July, the U.S. government granted the import-battered American specialty steel industry and its workers "relief" in the form of quotas and tariffs because of heavy subsidies by EEC nations.

Tariffs and quotas

Instead of restraining subsidies, the EEC said it would increase tariffs on methanol, vinyl acetate and burglar and fire alarm systems, and place quotas on styrene, polyethylene and some sporting goods. The measure is for four years beginning Mar. 1.

The union-industry group outlined a long list of anti-dumping and countervailing-duty cases under the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade involving "flagrant dumping and subsidies by the Europeans." It noted that no denial of subsidies was issued by the EEC.

Citing a projected $100 billion U.S. trade deficit for 1984 and the loss of 2 million American jobs, the coalition said: "It is time we give the highest priority to defending the trade interests of the United States. We urge our government to defend American industries by vigorously opposing the outrageous actions proposed by the EEC."

Industrial Sense

ONLY IN AMERICA is the concept of a national industrial policy controversial. And that, perhaps, goes a long way to explaining why the United States has been losing jobs and world markets.

Other industrialized nations, no less committed to free enterprise, have readily acknowledged a national interest in the continued health of the goods-producing sector of their economies.

It doesn't require an advanced academic degree to realize that the United States cannot long prosper as a mere consumer of goods.

The newly issued report of the Industry Policy Study Group is most welcome, even though it doesn't really break new ground. Its recommendations are similar in approach, if not in detail, to the proposals that have been made by the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept., and members of Congress.

It is welcome as a sign of the important and essentially nonpartisan consensus on the need for a national industrial policy—a consensus that includes business leaders as well as union leaders.

And it is welcome because it firmly rejects the premise that the issue is no longer pressing because the economy is on an upswing. As the report makes very clear, many of the workers in basic industries will never be recalled, and the pattern of recent years has been an increasingly high plateau of unemployment after a limited recovery from recession.

THE REPORT doesn't propose to guarantee the preservation of any industry or any job. It merely seeks a framework that will enable responsible persons from government, business and labor to consider what is best for the country and to seek practical means to achieve it.

Any government investment would be at least matched by private-sector investment. Because assistance would be carefully targeted to the need, it would be enormously more cost-efficient than the wholesale tax cuts that provided funds for cannibalistic corporate takeovers that provided no new jobs instead of financing modernization and expansion.

The concept makes enormous good sense. And no one yet has come up with a better idea.

The Civil Rights Retreat

LET THERE BE no mistake or misunderstanding. The AFL-CIO, along with other groups that make up the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, deplores the Reagan Administration's takeover of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and opposes the backward steps taken by the commission's newly appointed majority.

The delegates to the AFL-CIO convention last October had just that threat in mind when they adopted the resolution on civil rights which included this unequivocal language:

"We demand that the Reagan Administration desist from policies designed to sap the effectiveness of civil rights agencies by failing to enforce existing laws and regulations, budget cuts, politicalization of agencies, appointments of persons who do not believe in the mission of the agencies. . . .

"We strongly advocate that the federal government abandon its retreat from affirmative action efforts and vigorous enforcement of equal opportunity legislation and regulations."

In a related area, the convention resolutions further distanced labor from the Reagan Administration by calling on the trade union movement for "a strong, consistent lobbying effort" to pass the Equal Rights Amendment in Congress and secure its ratification by the states.

The same resolution called on affiliates, to seek "pay equity through collective bargaining agreements that upgrade undervalued job classifications and, when a union determines that such factors as legal limitations or the employer's bargaining policy make it necessary, to seek pay equity through administrative and judicial redress."

These differences with President Reagan on civil rights are fully reinforced by the AFL-CIO's fight against Administration economic policies and program cuts that find their chief victims among the poor, low-income minorities and women.

Reagan Recession, cuts deal cities double blow

By Press Associates, Inc.

Most cities are in worse shape today than they were in the 1960s, a study by the National Urban Coalition found.

The coalition's 67-page report, "The Situation in Urban America," painted a generally gloomy picture of the nation's economic, population, cultural and political centers. But it also pointed to hopeful stirrings.

Despite the spotty economic upturn, cities and their inhabitants are still reeling from the double blows of the worst recession since World War II and the Reagan social program cuts, the report said, charging "the Reagan Administration's budget policies have increased suffering in America's urban centers."

Since the coalition's last report on the cities in 1982, "many cities have continued their decline—a descent accelerated by reductions in federal and state aid, unabated high unemployment among the poor and new poor, a rising tide of hungry and homeless people, bankruptcies and job and business flight, with consequent losses to local tax bases. The fragile resources of cities and states cannot meet the increased demands or lighten the deeping despair faced by millions of Americans."

A bad bargain

Regarding Reagan's philosophy of shifting more responsibilities from the federal government to the states in the name of New Federalism, the report noted that "Republican and Democratic governors alike joined the mayors in backing away from the Administration's sweeping New Federalism proposals as a very bad bargain." New responsibilities must be matched by the dollars needed to meet them, it pointed out.

As part of the New Federalism, Congress in 1981 lumped more than 50 categorical aid programs into seven block grants to the states and then cut funding by 25 percent.

This new "flexibility," the report said, "often has led to re-allocation away from cities in distress to higher-income suburbs or to less populated rural areas." In addition, the new approach fails to take proper account of "imbalances among the more affluent and less affluent states," it said.

Actions versus words

"Minorities and women and other urban residents continued to find that, in their lives, the gap between the rhetoric of the Reagan Administration's concern for civil rights, education, crime, and drug and alcohol abuse was not matched by its actions and expenditures," it stated.

While noting the recent decline in the jobless rate, the report pointed out that economists are not optimistic "that the recovery will reach communities and groups hardest hit by the recession and the decline in the industrial sector."

It noted that a number of states and even some cities recently discovered budget surpluses due to tax hikes, service cutbacks and public employee layoffs. The coalition urged that these surpluses be used to restore vital services and to ease regressive taxes, such as sales taxes, which burden lower-income people.

At the national level, the coalition pressed Congress to spare "the already-decimated social and human needs programs from further reductions. There is truly nothing left to cut without exacerbating the rising homelessness, hunger and unemployment. . . ."

For the longer run, the coalition called for large-scale public works, housing, job training and education programs targeted to disadvantaged and dislocated workers.

On a hopeful note, the coalition pointed out that "the new political activism among blacks, Hispanics and women which decided or strongly influenced mayoral races across the country provides the possibility for a stronger emphasis on urban priorities in the up-coming 1984 elections."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Upcoming Labor Issues in Congressional Agenda for 1984

	WHAT HAPPENED IN 1983	FORECAST FOR 1984	COMMENTS
ISSUE: FEDERAL BUDGET	Congress approved a budget that seemed to offer hope of reversing Reaganomics. But than it failed to comply with its self-imposed budget targets. House and Senate did not come up with enough votes to pass deficit-reducing tax reforms.	President Reagan will soon release a new budget plan for fiscal 1985 with the deepest cuts in Medicare and Medicaid. "Deductibles" would increase, fees to patients would increase for all but "catastrophic" long-term hospitalizations.	Republican Whip Trent Lott (R-MS) said, "It's pretty unanimous there won't be cuts in Medicare." Medicaid, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, other programs may be more vulnerable.
ISSUE: TAXES	In 1983 Congress passed a budget resolution calling for tax reforms. But the Senate then killed one major reform: the labor-endorsed $720 cap on personal tax cuts. The House failed to come up with enough votes for a tax reform package.	President Reagan will ask Congress for new taxes on workers' health insurance. If your employer pays more than $900 per year for your individual policy or $2,200 for a family, the difference would be considered taxable income to you.	House Speaker O'Neill (D-MA) after most Republicans voted to kill tax reform last year: "The next time I see Republican crocodile tears about the deficit, I'm going to ask them where their party was today."
ISSUE: FAKE CORPORATE BANKRUPTCIES	Several corporations filed for bankruptcy not because they were bankrupt but only in order to escape obligations to unionized employees. Wilson Foods and Continental Airlines were the most notorious examples.	The AFL-CIO is leading an effort to clarify the Bankruptcy Act and prevent this kind of abuse. But the needed reform may be combined with other legislation dealing with the bankruptcy court system. AFL-CIO is working to end this logjam.	Airline executive: "What Continental is doing makes a mockery of the collective bargaining system. If the unions let them get away with this, they're crazy."
ISSUE: INDUSTRIAL POLICY	Rep. John LaFalce (D-NY) introduced H.R. 4360 to help older industries modernize for greater efficiency, help new industries with research and development, and create good jobs by helping U.S. industry meet foreign competition.	Additional hearings, passage to full House Banking Cmte. expected by early February. Senate Democratic Caucus endorsed an industrial redevelopment program. Also on the agenda is H.R. 2847: protections for workers when a plant is closed.	AFL-CIO President Kirkland: "America's industrial base is dangerously eroding and with it our ability to grow and create and sustain millions of jobs. Reversing this process requires a national commitment..."
ISSUE: FAIR TRADE	Sen. John Danforth (D-MO) tried to push his so-called trade reciprocity bill through the Senate. The AFL-CIO objected because it would give President Reagan more tariff-cutting authority, easing the way for even more imported goods.	Unfair trade "reciprocity" bills will continue to be a threat in the House and Senate. The AFL-CIO will continue to push S. 707, the domestic content bill, which already passed the House (see story, below).	The United States is suffering from the worst trade deficits in history. Imports exceeded exports by $70 billion in 1983. Every billion dollars in trade deficit translates to 25,000-50,000 lost jobs.
ISSUE: IMMIGRATION REFORM	Senate passed an immigration reform bill last May. House bill, H.R. 1510, requires improvement before the AFL-CIO can endorse it. House leadership withdrew the bill from consideration because of political concerns, but now has agreed to bring it to the floor early in 1984.	The AFL-CIO is working for: sanctions against those who hire illegal workers; anti-discrimination protections; employee ID system; generous legalization plan for current undocumented residents; prohibition of "bracero" temporary worker plans; adequate Immigration Service funds.	Illegal workers are exploited by unscrupulous employers. For example, illegal garment workers in New York sweatshops earn $9-10 per day. This reduces employment opportunity, wages and benefits for all.
ISSUE: NATURAL GAS PRICES	Good news: In November the Senate rejected legislation that would have accelerated current timetable for removal of controls from natural gas prices. Bad news: Senate also rejected a bill to extend gas price controls beyond their planned expiration date in 1985.	The AFL-CIO will continue its three-year-old drive to stop the Reagan Administration from decontrolling gas prices, and will push bills to extend controls and roll back price ceilings to lower levels: H.R. 2154 and S. 996.	The major oil companies have begun a $1 million "grass roots" campaign to try to get consumers to write Congress asking for decontrol! Watch out for this campaign of confusion and misinformation by the "Alliance for Energy Security."

HOUSE VOTES WERE FAVORABLE; URGE SENATE TO PASS THESE BILLS

The House has completed action on these labor-endorsed bills. Reaganites in the Senate will be more difficult, so please redouble your efforts and write to your Senators:

STOP "ACCESS CHARGES" AND KEEP TELEPHONE SERVICE AFFORDABLE

The American Telephone and Telegraph Co. has been broken up into seven local companies plus a new AT&T. One result will be sharply higher phone bills. Local rate increases do not come under Congress' purview, but Congress can stop proposed charges for "access" to long-distance lines. These charges would begin at $2 per month this year and rise to $10 per month by 1990, and would be imposed even on those who make no long-distance calls.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to support S. 1660. This bill would prohibit "access charges" and would help keep rates reasonable for basic residential service.

DOMESTIC CONTENT BILL WOULD ADD 1 MILLION JOBS

Just as the Japanese government announced it will increase its shipments of autos and trucks to the United States, from 1.68 million in 1983 to 1.85 million this year, the House passed the domestic content bill, which would force foreign vehicle manufacturers to set up plants in this country if they wish to sell here.

Mexico has announced that Ford will comply with that country's content law and will manufacture a small car there for export to the U.S.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to support S. 707, the domestic content bill.

HEALTH CARE FOR THE UNEMPLOYED

Because most people lose their health insurance if they lose their jobs, and because most are not eligible for Medicaid, unemployment creates a national health crisis. So the House approved a special program of health care for the jobless.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Key Senate leaders have worked out a compromise health care bill, but the threat of a filibuster has kept it off the floor. Urge your Senators to approve legislation to provide health care for the jobless.

New NLRB majority reverses course

Shifts to back management in pivital case

AFL-CIO news
VOL. 29, NO. 4
SATURDAY

By David L. Perlman

The new Reagan-appointed majority of the National Labor Relations Board has reversed a decision that supported labor's position in an important transfer-of-work case. It overturned at the same time the court-tested precedent on which the decision was based.

Siding squarely with employers in the board's 180-degree policy reversal were Chairman Donald L. Dotson and members Robert P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis.

Strongly dissenting was Don A. Zimmerman, the lone holdover from the pre-Reagan NLRB.

According to the present NLRB majority, it is no longer an unfair labor practice for an employer to lay off workers in a plant where their union had refused to take a mid-contract pay cut and transfer their work to another plant where workers weren't represented by a union and where wage rates were lower.

Unless the union contract specifically prohibits such a transfer of work, the new NLRB held, that sort of conduct is allowed. The only requirement is that the transfer of work be for economic reasons—a cost savings for the employer — and not from anti-union motivation.

Earlier ruling

Just 14 months earlier, a 3-0 decision by an NLRB panel had taken an opposite position—in clear accord with what then was viewed as firmly established precedent.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, speaking to an Industrial Union Dept. conference the day after the NLRB's reversal, lashed out at what he termed the Reagan Administration's "revolution of the right." The Administration is "packing the National Labor Relations Board with lifelong sycophants of industry," Kirkland charged.

The case involved a local of the Auto Workers, which represented workers at the Milwaukee Spring Division of the Illinois Coil Spring Co.

Midway in the contract period, the company asked the union to agree to major pay and benefit concessions to offset a decline in revenue. The parties bargained on the issue but in the end the union notified the company that the workers had voted against mid-contract wage concessions. The company subsequently acted unilaterally to close down its assembly operations at Milwaukee and transfer the work to its non-union Illinois plant.

As the NLRB noted in its original 1982 decision ordering the company to rescind the shift: "The relocation decision is economically motivated. . . . The failure to provide an adequate return on investment prompted the decision to relocate the assembly operations, not an inability to pay the contractual wage rates."

The decision cited precedents dating back to 1973 and especially a similar 1978 case involving the Los Angeles Marine

Kirkland stresses risks of new economic slump

Calls Reagan policies fuel for recession

America risks a new and more devastating Reagan Recession "until there are changes in the policies that brought us to the brink of disaster," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned at a series of union legislative conferences.

"We will have to persuade Congress that, for millions of jobless Americans, the Reagan Recession is far from over, and the unemployed still need help," Kirkland said.

Several thousand local union delegates were in Washington as the second session of Congress opened, taking part in legislative conferences of the Industrial Union Dept. the Auto Workers and the Fire Fighters.

Kirkland stressed that labor's agenda goes beyond "applying Band-Aids to torn safety nets" and seeks a revival of America's industrial capacity—"an undertaking that will require the full cooperation of business, labor and government."

Labor is "no longer a voice in the wilderness" on this issue, Kirkland noted and bills have been introduced in Congress that the AFL-CIO is pressing to have taken up by the House as soon as possible.

"But we are under no illusion that our program will get past the desk in the Oval Office until there is a new President to pick up the pen and sign it," he said.

Mondale candidacy

"Walter Mondale, the candidate whom union members have instructed the AFL-CIO to support, shares our concerns and objectives," Kirkland told the delegates. And "seeing to it that he gets the chance to lead the way to a national industrial renaissance is our highest priority."

Kirkland acknowledged that labor's so-called "big political gamble" carries a "risk of failure."

But unless the effort is made, he stressed, there will almost inevitably be a continuation of policies that "brought such hardship and pain to the millions we represent."

Continental divide

Machinists and Air Line Pilots picket at Washington's National Airport to protest Continental Airlines' misuse of federal bankruptcy laws to break contracts with unions. Similar demonstrations were conducted Jan. 27 at a dozen major cities.

Reagan speech viewed as kickoff for campaign

President Reagan set the tone for his re-election campaign with a State of the Union address that painted a glowing picture of an America that has overcome its economic problems, lifted the burden of government from the backs of its people, and now is "bursting with opportunities," especially for "small business people with big ideas."

For millions still unemployed, for the homeless huddled in public shelters within sight of the Capitol, Reagan had assurances that the day will come when "each of you can reach as high as your God-given talents will take you."

The President defended the tax cuts that contributed so much to the record deficits of his Administration and said the first step in bringing down federal deficits is by further "limiting the size and scope of government," but without tampering with the military segment of the budget.

He asked constitutional amendments to allow him to veto part of an appropriation bill, to require a balanced budget, to allow prayers in public schools and to prohibit abortions.

Reagan invited bipartisan involvement of Congress in plans for a "down payment" on deficit reduction and said he had directed his Secretary of the Treasury to come up with a plan to simplify the tax system and give him the specifics next December, after the presidential election.

For the future of American industry, Reagan had faith that "initiative and ingenuity" will "create sunrise industries and make older ones more competitive." He announced plans to develop a permanently manned space station within a decade, "ease regulatory constraints and, with NASA's help, promote private investment in space."

Real wages still below 1979 level

The real earnings of American workers at the end of 1983 were still 3.5 percent below 1979, even though inflation rose only 3.8 percent last year and purchasing power climbed 2.5 percent.

As the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research calculates it, that 3.5-percent lag in inflation-adjusted wages meant that average weekly earnings in 1977 dollars were $6.37 a week less in December than in December 1979.

That means that workers' purchasing power has fallen off about a dollar a day from December 1979 to December 1983.

The figures reported from the Bureau of Labor Statistics often seem like so much gobbledegook, a situation that AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald noted could be confusing to some workers.

"Many workers feel that the drop in purchasing power is taking place but don't see the numbers released by BLS that substantiate that drop," he said.

Unadjusted earnings

Gross weekly earnings, expressed in current dollars, continued to rise last month as they have over the past four years, he noted. These averaged $289.68 last month as compared with $229.04 in December 1979.

"But workers frequently fail to see the numbers that show that real, inflation-adjusted earnings—actual purchasing power—are dropping," Oswald pointed out.

Real weekly earnings in December were $174.40, down from $180.77 in 1979.

The 1983 slowdown in the inflation rate, as measured by the government's consumer price index, was attributed mainly to the Reagan Recession, as well as more stable world oil prices and a rising dollar that helped cause an actual decline in energy prices.

Food price increases moderated in December also, contributing to the slowdown in the over-the-month CPI rise of just two-tenths of 1 percent.

Baltimore columnist winner of Guild's 1983 Broun prize

Dan Rodricks, a columnist for the Baltimore Evening Sun, won the Newspaper Guild's 1983 Heywood Broun Award for outstanding individual journalistic achievement.

Rodricks was selected among 115 nominees for the union's prestigious annual award which is named for the Guild's founding president.

The competition's judges said Rodricks was chosen because of his "sustained attention to the problems of ordinary men and women" in his columns during 1983.

The award, which includes a $1,000 prize and a citation, was presented to Rodricks at a luncheon prior to the Guild's international executive board meeting in Washington.

Honorable mention citations were also awarded to Bob Wyrick and Patrick Owens of Newsday, Long Island, N.Y., and Steve Konicki and Luisa Yanez of the Miami News.

Wyrick and Owens were cited for a series that examined the hardships suffered by thousands of people who lost social security disability pensions as a result of government cost-cutting, and Konicki and Yanez were honored for a series exposing abuses by health clinics that were supposed to serve the needy in South Florida's Cuban community. Wyrick had previously won the Broun award in 1967.

Rodricks, who is a member of the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild, is the second columnist to win the Broun Award in its 43-year history. Columnist Mike Royko, then of the Chicago Sun-Times, won in 1968.

The judges of the 1983 Broun competition said Rodrick's columns were outstanding because "with compassion and restraint, with humor and understanding" they introduce readers to "people made needy by shifting economic and political circumstances."

"Three times each week," the judges said, "he tells their story with care, kindness and a spirit of intelligent concern that echoes and extends the journalistic contribution of Heywood Broun." The judges noted that Broun's columns in the 1920s and 1930s "virtually introduced the daily column of compassion and understanding."

Judges for the 1983 Broun Award were Susan Stamberg, co-host of National Public Radio's "All Things Considered" news program; Maxwell McCrohon, editor-in-chief of United Press International, and Richard T. Stout, director of the graduate program in journalism at American University.

The panel was chaired by Peter Kihss of the New York Newspaper Guild, a retired New York Times reporter.

Voting up in all regions

Election trend points to heavy '84 turnout

By Susan Dunlop

Voter turnout in 1982 was up over 1978, reversing a 20-year downward trend, and that could mean voters will be flocking to the polls in record numbers in 1984, the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate reported.

The bipartisan research group studied voter turnout in so-called off-year, or non-presidential year, elections since 1962. Fewer and fewer eligible voters had been going to the polls since the mid-1960s, but the turnout in 1982 was up substantially over 1978 in states that had elections, the CSAE said.

The study put overall national voter turnout in 1982 at 41.1 percent of eligible voters, up 3.6 percent from the 37.5 percent who voted in 1978. By contrast, AFL-CIO COPE estimated the turnout by union members at 48-49 percent.

The study said voter participation was up in all regions of the country and for both parties. The largest increases in turnout were in the industrial Midwest and the farm belt. And in the South, where turnout has traditionally lagged far behind the rest of the nation, the gap continued to narrow.

The study found that both the Democratic and Republican parties experienced greater participation, but it noted that the 1982 increase in voting came despite little change in the rate of voter registration nationwide.

CSAE Director Curtis B. Gans, in an analysis of the study, said the results suggest that the Reagan Administration "has had both a polarizing and mobilizing effect among already registered voters."

He pointed out that voter participation was up among groups such as blacks, farmers and employed and unemployed workers.

The fact that "nobody seems neutral about Reagan" could draw voters to the polls in 1984, Gans said.

Polarization

At a separate news conference, pollster Lou Harris agreed that President Reagan has "polarized the nation more than anyone since Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Harris predicted that the 1984 election will be very close, but said Reagan is vulnerable to a loss because polarization usually boosts voter turnout and that usually favors Democrats.

He told reporters his polls find that 35 percent of the voters are "hard-core pro-Reagan," but 38 percent are "hard-core anti-Reagan." And, of those questioned, about 72 percent didn't believe the federal budget will be balanced if Reagan is re-elected. Also 61 percent of those polled are worried that President Reagan will get the nation into war, Harris reported.

Other results of the CSAE study of statewide contests showed that while both major political parties experienced greater turnouts in 1982 over 1978, more Democrats went to the polls than Republicans, continuing a 20-year trend.

Democrats increased their share of total voter participation from 19.5 percent in 1978 to 21.8 percent in 1982, while Republicans increased their share from 17.2 percent in 1978 to 18.4 percent in the last election.

Voter turnout

Census figures, used as the basis for CSAE's results, showed that a total of 65,549,788 persons voted in the 1982 elections out of a potential of 159,247,000 eligible voters.

The CSAE reported that while voter turnout was up in every region of the country, including a 4.4 percent jump in the industrial Midwest, the smallest increase was posted in the West where turnout improved by only three-tenths of 1 percent over 1978.

The South also showed a sharply improved voter turnout—3.2 percent over 1978. Gans observed that improvements in the region were the result of increased registration among both blacks and fundamentalist Christians, the growth of the two-party system, the impact of the Voting Rights Act and improvements in laws and regulations that ease registration and voting.

The study said the biggest improvements in voter turnout over 1978 occurred in Alaska, where the turnout was up 21.3 percent; Arkansas, up 13.4 percent; Alabama, up 10.9 percent; Georgia, up 10.2 percent, and Missouri, up 9.7 percent.

The states posting the biggest decreases were Ohio, down 7.5 percent from 1978; Florida, down 6 percent; Nevada, down 5.4 percent, and New Hampshire, down 3.1 percent.

The states with the highest actual voter turnout in 1982 were Alaska, where 67.9 percent of eligible voters went to the polls; Minnesota, 60.1 percent; South Dakota, 57.7 percent; Montana, 56.4 percent; North Dakota, 55.4 percent, and Maine, 55.2 percent.

The jurisdictions that had the lowest turnouts for statewide contests in 1982 were the District of Columbia at 23.8 percent, Georgia at 28.9 percent, South Carolina at 29.3 percent, Texas at 29.5 percent and Ohio, 29.9 percent.

The path turned to mud

The following is an example of the writing that won Dan Rodricks the Newspaper Guild's 1983 Heywood Broun award. An excerpt from Rodrick's column of Jan. 26, 1983, in the Baltimore Evening Sun, was read at the Guild's award luncheon.

On State of the Union day, the path to cheese turned to mud. Sticky, cold mud. They were handing out cheese and butter at the Victory Villa Community Center in Middle River, and feet were treading relentlessly on the path to the door.

Just before noon, some workmen came out and placed two large pieces of 1-inch plywood on the ground by the steps, and, as soon as they did this, 20 feet shuffled from the mud to the wood. "That's better," a woman said. "Much better. Thank you."

Actually, the path had been whipped into mud from the waiting. The first seekers of cheese arrived at the door about 7:30 a.m. Three hours went by before big yellow county trucks unloaded the brown boxes. And it was at least 11 a.m. before they actually gave away the cheese.

Everybody waited. Hundreds of people. Young women holding children. Old women holding purses. Old men. Young men. The line went from the door of the delivery room, down four steps, across a wet lawn, then down a driveway and onto a sidewalk around the community center.

The intersection of Compass Road and Martin Boulevard was jammed with cars the way streets around high schools are jammed on Homecoming Day. And the wind was picking up, and the sky was dingy gray.

Allan Walls, in a big blue snorkel coat, came down the steps with two long boxes, each containing a 5-pound block of All-American cheese. He had two 1-pound bricks of butter, and he was fidgeting to get better hold of it all.

"I figure I paid for it with my taxes while I was working, so why not?" said Walls, who is 36 years old and the father of three children. He put the blocks of cheese in the pockets of the big coat. "It's a little degrading, I guess. I worked all my adult life and now it's the pits, standing in line for a couple of pounds of cheese."

In 1980, which was the last time Walls worked a full year, he went into a voting booth, flicked a switch and ordered up Ronald Reagan.

Labor women supported in equity battle

Of all the areas in which "the fight for justice toward women must be fought, the chief battlefield is the workplace," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told representatives of labor, women's and civil rights organizations concerned with pay equity issues.

Kirkland termed the concept of equal pay for work of comparable worth "one of the foundation stones of organized labor."

Pay equity is not seen by organized labor as "exclusively a woman's issue, but as an element of simple justice that in the long run matters equally to men and women alike," he told the coalition reception sponsored by the AFL-CIO with the Coalition of Labor Union Women, the National Committee on Pay Equity, and the Labor Institute of Public Affairs.

Unions learned "long ago that justice for all is the only goal worth having," Kirkland said, citing organized labor's battles to break down all the barriers of discrimination.

Labor's strategy

"The vast majority of women" are discriminated against "routinely and systematically," and the struggle to achieve pay equity is a key part of organized labor's strategy for tearing down the barriers to social and economic equality for American women, he said.

Kirkland pointed out that AFL-CIO affiliates adopted a policy committed to fight for pay equity "in every possible way," including assistance to unions in their efforts at the bargaining table, in grievance procedures as well as through government action and the courts.

The AFL-CIO, he said, stands with CLUW, NCPE "and all the allies we can find . . . on behalf of our goals of equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity for all."

CLUW President Joyce Miller, who is also an AFL-CIO vice president, pointed out that the issue of pay equity is a "natural bridge" between the labor movement and the women's movement, as well as between men and women in unions.

Taking the lead

Nancy Reder, who chairs NCPE, praised the efforts of unions to achieve pay equity through collective bargaining and legislative efforts.

She stressed that when those efforts at negotiations and voluntary compliance have failed, unions have led the battle into the courts.

The pay equity program was held on the eve of CLUW's national political conference.

The conference explored the damaging effect Reagan Administration policies have had on the social and economic progress of women, plans for get-out-the-vote programs, the effect the "gender gap" will have on voting patterns in the election, and the delegate selection process for next summer's national political party conventions.

Power at the polls

The concerns of women voters could be the deciding factor in the outcome of the 1984 elections, Ladies' Garment Workers Vice President Evelyn Dubrow told the national political conference of the Coalition of Labor Union Women. More than 150 unionists attended the meeting in Washington to assess women's political action goals, discuss efforts on behalf of candidates who support women's issues, and examine the damage done to women's social and economic progress by the Reagan Administration. From left, are Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), Missouri State Sen. Harriet Wood (D), Rep. Cardiss Collins (D-Ill.) and Dubrow.

Unions join steel, footwear firms in petitioning for Trade Act relief

By James M. Shevis

Two hard-pressed industries—steel and footwear—asked the government for redress in their fight against imports of foreign-made goods, warning that thousands of jobs and survival of the industries themselves are at stake.

In separate actions, unions and companies in the two industries petitioned the U.S. International Trade Commission for temporary relief under Section 201 of the 1974 Trade Act.

The domestic shoe industry, represented by a coalition of Footwear Industries of America, Inc., the Clothing & Textile Workers and the Food & Commercial Workers, filed its petition on Jan. 24, the same day the Steelworkers joined Bethlehem Steel Corp., in filing a similar action.

Under Section 201, the President may grant import relief regardless of whether any unfair trade practice, such as export subsidies or selling below cost, occurred. In each case, the relief sought is a five-year period of quotas on imports from all foreign sources.

The ITC has six months to decide the cases. If it determines that imports have been a "substantial cause of injury" to U.S. producers, it will make a recommendation to the President, who then will have 60 days to make a decision. Reagan has the option of accepting or rejecting all or part of the ITC's recommendation.

Imports in the two industries have surged in recent years as the nation's foreign trade account has run up unusually high deficits. Through November, the 1983 U.S. deficit with its trading partners reached a record $62.9 billion. It is expected to top $70 billion for the full year.

At a Washington news conference, ACTWU President Murray H. Finley warned that the American shoe industry is "rapidly sinking to oblivion in a sea of imports."

Impacts of imports

Unemployment for shoe workers in 1983 was nearly 19 percent, and domestic production was at close to Depression-era levels, he said. Since June 1981 when import relief in the industry was terminated, more than 16,000 American shoe workers have lost their jobs and imports have risen from 59 percent of the U.S. market to almost 64 percent, Finley added.

UFCW President William H. Wynn said in a statement that the import relief sought by the industry is essential to preserve the jobs of many thousands of hardworking Americans. Together, ACTWU and UFCW represent half of all U.S. non-rubber footwear workers.

George Langstaff, president of Footwear Industries of America, warned that if the industry does not get relief it "stands a very good chance of going under for good."

Jobs at stake

He said the industry employs about 133,000 people in direct manufacturing and provides another 90,000 jobs in supporting industries. The industry includes about 300 manufacturers operating more than 700 plants in 41 states.

At a Bethlehem, Pa., news conference, USWA Acting President Lynn Williams said that the union's petition with Bethlehem Steel "is by far the largest self-help program ever undertaken by any group of American workers."

The petition asks the ITC to investigate all carbon steel imports entering the United States under Section 201. A similar filing by the specialty steel industry prompted President Reagan to raise tariffs and set import quotas last July on a variety of foreign-made stainless steel products.

Current employee sacrifices, such as wage and fringe benefit concessions, should have put the nation's steel companies in the black last year, Williams observed. Instead, most of them are still operating at substantial losses because of the flood of Third World steel imports at subsidized prices, he said.

"We are doing our part," Williams said. "The government must act promptly so that our sacrifices will not be in vain.

"The 100,000 workers that are still on layoff from their jobs in this vital industry are not mere statistics in a so-called 'recovery' period," he said. "They are people—human beings with spouses, children and, many times, with parents who, in increasing numbers, are having again to help support them.

"They're people who have worked hard and who desperately want to work again, but whose industry can't compete in a world of dumping, government subsidies and ownership, and below-poverty living standards that are often maintained through dictatorship."

Williams said that current U.S. trade policies are pushing the steel industry toward extinction and that the union had joined Bethlehem in the ITC petition in the hope of ending "this spiral of despair."

Legislative pursuits

The Steelworkers also are supporting congressional action to enact quota legislation and reform of certain trade laws.

In its petition, the shoe industry coalition pointed out that conditions in the industry are far worse than in 1976 and 1977, when the ITC unanimously found that imports were seriously injuring the domestic industry.

As a result of the 1977 finding, import relief was provided by President Carter in the form of two "orderly marketing agreements" with Taiwan and Korea from June 1977 through June 1981. Despite a decision by the ITC in 1981 that imports were still damaging the domestic footwear industry, Reagan refused to continue the import relief program, leading to the current flood of imports.

Reagan launches campaign with glowing report to nation

Democratic leaders and presidential candidates conceded the persuasiveness of the President's television style but questioned whether Americans would accept such a rose-hued view of the state of the nation.

"Our view is different from the President's," House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. said. "In case after case, we find this Administration's policies unfair to working men and women, to the elderly, to our children."

The Democratic response included scenes of steelworkers facing contined plant closings, farmers unable to finance new equipment because of high interest rates.

As is customary, the President spoke to a joint session of Congress in an evening speech designed for prime-time television. But earlier that day, a Housing & Community Development subcommittee headed by Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez (D-Tex.) moved its hearing to the District of Columbia's emergency shelter for the homeless, where governors and mayors testified from first-hand knowledge that the nation's capital wasn't the only place where people who haven't yet seen the economic recovery line up at soup kitchens and sleep in makeshift dormitories.

Donald Danielson dies, Carpenters' top aide

Donald D. Danielson, special assistant to three presidents of the Carpenters, died Jan. 20 at Montgomery General Hospital in Olney, Md., following a long illness.

Danielson, who was 59, apprenticed in the 1940s and was initiated into Carpenters Local 87 in Minneapolis. In 1954, he was named research director of the international and was appointed the assistant to the president in 1972.

Funeral services were held Jan. 24 at Colesville Baptist Church in Silver Spring, Md. Survivors include his wife, Georgianne, eight children and three grandchildren.

States, cities squeezed by cuts in federal funds

Federal assistance to states and cities was slashed by $42 billion in the first three years of the Reagan Administration, a study by the State, County & Municipal Employees found.

As a result, state and local governments are entangled in the most serious fiscal crisis since the Great Depression, the union charged.

Heavy fund reductions have been made across the board, in education and training, health and human serivces, public works and economic development programs.

"Not surprisingly, the immediate losers from these cuts have been middle- and lower-income families," AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee told a Washington news conference. "But all citizens will ultimately be losers as roads and sewer systems go unrepaired, education is degraded, and opportunities to acquire modern job skills are lost.

Voter issue

"We think that is a lesson which the voters will remember in November 1984."

The report, titled "The State of the States," ties the meat-ax reductions in state aid to Reagan's tax cuts and increased military spending. The Administration's tax policies have showered corporations and the rich with enormous windfalls, it points out.

"A predictable result of Reagan's tax and defense policies has been enormous federal deficits," McEntee observed. "Simple arithmetic and common sense suggest that more domestic spending cuts, and especially cuts in federal aid to state and local governments, cannot close the gap."

Viable alternatives

The solution to the federal deficits, he contended, lies in "limiting the increases in defense spending and insuring effective taxation of corporations and the wealthy."

The report reveals the extent of the Reagan cuts in all 50 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico on a program-by-program basis. Calculation of the state-by-state federal assistance cuts is based on the most recent congressional budget actions.

The first three years of the Reagan presidency have been very troubled ones for state and local governments, the report notes. The combination of deep federal aid cuts, together with the prolonged and severe Reagan Recession, forced those governments to reduce services, raises taxes and pass through the burden of the Administration's reckless budget cuts to those least able to bear that burden, it observes.

Employment and training programs have been cut 63 percent, health resources 41 percent, and economic development 64 percent, the study shows.

In addition, the new block-grant programs enacted in 1981, heralded by the Administration as a way to provide more local control over spending, were in fact nothing more than a smokescreen for cuts, the report said.

The education block grant was cut 20 percent, the preventive-health block grant 22 percent, community services 36 percent, and alcohol, drug abuse and mental health 33 percent.

Heaviest cuts

A few programs have seen increases above the 1981 levels, the study notes. Included are Headstart, the elderly feeding, assistance for infant children and women, and aid for highways and airports. But where cuts were made, they were heaviest in just the areas that needed the assistance most, the study said.

For example, the New England states suffered the highest per capita losses in low-income energy assistance, and southern states had the highest per capita cuts in nutrition programs.

The study found that the Middle Atlantic states were hardest hit by the Reagan Administration cuts in state aid. New England was second, the east north-central states third, then the east south-central states, the Pacific Northwest, Pacific Southwest, South Atlantic, west north-central, and the west south-central states last.

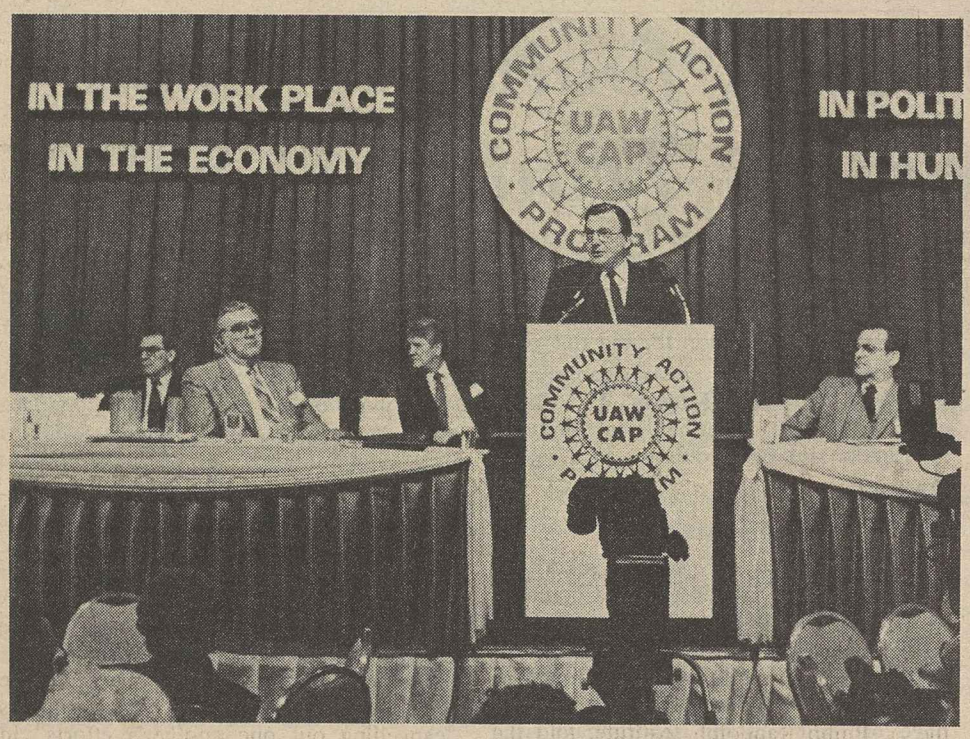
Financial drain

"States have had few or no financial resources with which to replace the drastically diminished federal funds," the study observes. The effects of the cuts "will continue to plague state and local governments, even those few that have regained a firm financial footing."

The report measures cuts in aid to state and local governments for 172 individual federal aid programs in 39 major program categories. Altogether, the programs considered in the report account for nearly 90 percent of all federal aid to state and local governments.

Of the $42-billion reduction in state assistance, the largest losses were recorded in fiscal year 1982, the first year of the Reagan presidency, when $16.5 billion was cut. The report said that fiscal 1984 losses of $15.2 billion totaled nearly as much as were inflicted in the first-year cutting binge.

All areas of federal assistance and most programs were affected, the report observes.



Summons to action

Reagan Administration appointees have thwarted programs enacted to protect workers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged at an Auto Workers political conference in Washington. UAW President Owen Bieber is at left. More than 1,000 delegates came to lobby Congress for labor's program.

Kirkland hits Reagan policies as threatening new recession

Kirkland said Reagan has sought "to cripple the federal government as an instrument of social progress."

The people he has put in charge of government agencies and programs have sought to "drain them of content," he charged.

He cited assaults on the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law.

But "nowhere are the sycophants of industry given freer reign than at the National Labor Relations Board, chaired by a man who simply does not believe in the federal labor law he is sworn to uphold."

Before his appointment as head of the NLRB, Donald L. Dotson had assailed "unionized labor relations" in letters to legal journals and Kirkland commented: "The law says workers have a positive right to band together and bargain collectively, but the NLRB chairman calls that process a distortion of the economy because it prevents wages from sinking to their market level."

He warned the legislative conference delegates that the Reagan White House hasn't finished its agenda and that "more cuts in social services, bigger holes in the safety net, are being prepared for 1984" and will be issues in this session of Congress.

Kirkland made clear that the AFL-CIO welcomes "any sign of relief from the deepest recession and highest unemployment since the days of Herbert Hoover." And every jobless person called back to work "pushes our country and economy ahead."

But many will be going back to lower-paid jobs, with unemployment-caused debts to pay off and the prospects of continued lowering of living standards.

The "main beneficiaries of this slow recovery," Kirkland suggested, are those who never suffered from the recession and who "reaped huge benefits from the Administration's raid on the Treasury, which lowered their taxes and opened new loopholes."

The "biggest budget deficits in history," Kirkland said, have left the economy "in far worse shape and in greater danger than it was four years ago."

In the election campaign, he stressed, "we are not only supporting a candidate; we are supporting a program to resume the nation's progress toward justice."

Plan for disputes settlement revived by Building Trades

San Diego — The general presidents of the building and construction trades unions have voted to put into effect the newly negotiated Impartial Plan for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

Georgine said it would take about 30 days to confer with contractors, select arbitrators and complete restructuring details. Although the plan officially has been operating, the hearing of disputes and rendering of decisions have been suspended. Intensive attempts were made to obtain "stipulation" — agreement that participating parties would be bound by a decision reached by a joint board of union and contractor representatives. Georgiane sharply criticized the Associated General Contractors for refusing to participate in the voluntary plan that for many years has kept construction industry contractors and unions from going to the courts with their disputes.

"Most of the suggested changes and modifications to the plan came from the Associated General Contractors through its umbrella organization, the National Construction Employers Council," Georgine said.

"Almost without exception the suggestions were accepted either entirely or in important part by the labor members of the Joint Negotiating Committee and ratified by the Governing Board of Presidents.

Concessions

"These changes were radical departures from the original plan. They really were concessions to obtain widespread acceptance from the management sector of the construction industry."

Georgine said it was "most frustrating" to have acquiesced in the demands of management organizations for the sole purpose of obtaining their participation and then not to get that participation "as in the case of the AGC."

Nevertheless, a number of management organizations will participate and "stipulate," including the National Constructors Association, National Electrical Contractors Association, Mechanical Contractors Association of America, Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning Contractors Association, National Erector Association, National Association of Construction Boilermakers Employers, National Elevator Industry, Inc., and probably the Glazing Contractors Association and the National Association of Home Builders, Georgine observed.

During their meeting, the presidents of the department's 15 affiliates spent a day touring the Cool Water Coal Gasification Project and the adjacent 10-megawatt Solar Thermal Control Receiver Pilot Plant in the Mojave Desert near Daggett, Calif. The 25-story plant, being built by a consortium that includes some of the nation's largest companies, should be generating electricity from coal converted into synthetic natural gas before the end of 1984.

Georgine also announced that the Governing Board of Presidents had approved a new agreement with Disney World and that Carl Murphy of the Carpenters would administer the agreement.

It also was decided to open an existing agreement with the Standard Oil Company of Ohio to negotiate modifications and to extend the 30-year Taconite Contracting Corporation's master labor agreement with the building trades.

Food store chain to stop buying boycotted lettuce

Keene, Calif.—The Farm Workers won a significant victory against the anti-union tactics of Bruce Church, Inc., when the nation's third largest grocery chain announced it would no longer buy the firm's iceberg lettuce.

Lucky Stores, Inc., said it based its decision on a December ruling by the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board which found Bruce Church guilty of bad faith bargaining. The UFW has been trying to renew its contract with the grower since 1979.

The state board ordered Bruce Church to "make whole" those workers affected by the bargaining. The order is retroactive to October 1979. ALRB Executive Sec. Janet Vining said the grower's bargaining demands "would have undermined the UFW's position as the employees' representative." The company objected to UFW proposals for union administration of employee benefit funds, a "good standing clause" on union membership, paid union representatives and a hiring-hall clause.

Lucky Stores, which buys about 10 percent of Bruce Church's produce, said its decision will be effective Feb. 17.

Bruce Church lettuce, which has been on the AFL-CIO boycott list nearly five years, is marketed under the Red Coach, Friendly, Green Valley Farms and Lucky labels.

Phelps Dodge strikers fight medical cutoff

Phoenix—A coalition of 13 unions representing Phelps Dodge Corp. copper workers planned to file an action in federal court to prevent the company from denying strikers medical benefits.

Cass Alvin of the Steelworkers, which leads the union coalition in its long-running dispute with the country's second largest copper producer, said the suit would ask the court to make the company live up to its argreement to continue the benefits during the strike that began last July 1.

The company has given the 2,300 striking workers 60 days' notice that it plans to terminate the benefits.

The unions also were preparing a second suit to bar the company from carrying out its threat of mass eviction of strikers from company housing in Morenci and Ajo, Ariz. Last September, Phelps Dodge pledged it would not evict the workers. In a Jan. 18 letter, the company gave notice to employees it planned to take over the properties.

Both suits were to have been filed in United States District Court in Tucson.

Firm reneged

Under an agreement with the unions, Phelps Dodge had said it would grant the benefits if the striking workers paid a share of the premium. When workers went to make payment, the company refused to accept it, Alvin said, arguing that they were no longer employees.

The arbitrator ruled last Dec. 20 that the strikers were still employees and entitled to benefits retroactively to the start of the strike.

Meanwhile, the first formal negotiations since contract talks were suspended last Nov. 23 broke off abruptly on Jan. 23, when a federal mediator announced he would seek private conferences with bargainers on both sides.

Alvin said that no new talks have been scheduled.

Phelps Dodge has continued to operate with strikebreakers throughout the bitter dispute over wages and benefits. The company refused to go along with an industry pattern last summer and insisted instead that, in addition to the three-year wage freeze other companies had agreed to, cost-of-living adjustments should be eliminated, benefits cut and a reduced salary structure be put in force for new hires.

Claims denied

The union workers rejected management's assertions that it must cut labor costs to survive. They pointed to other copper companies, including Kennecott, Anaconda and Asarco, which showed they could afford to settle without obtaining wage and benefit concessions from the workers.

The strikers accused the company of a calculated attempt at union-busting, a charge that a local company doctor, Jorge O'Leary, backs up. O'Leary, who was fired for criticizing Phelps Dodge's anti-worker policies, now operates a "people's clinic" providing medical attention to the striking workers and their families.

Unions in the bargaining coalition are the Steelworkers, Boilermakers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Electrical Workers, Machinists, Operating Engineers, Painters, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Railway Carmen, United Transportation Union, the Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Out in the cold

Members of Allied Industrial Workers Local 879 in Hartford, Wis., and their supporters ignore bitter January cold to protest union-busting tactics used in the sale of two Chrysler Corp. outboard motor plants where they work to non-union Bayliner Marine Corp. of Arlington, Wash. Bayliner made it a condition of the sale that Chrysler shut down the plants and fire all 400 employees, but the new company refused to agree to rehire the 325 AIW members—whose average seniority is 20 years. At a rally at the plant gate after the march, AIW President Dominic D'Ambrosio pledged the union will fight for the workers' rights. At D'Ambrosio's left is AIW Region 9 Representative Charlie Griffin. Recently, after a federal court turned down AIW's suit to block the sale, Bayliner took over the plants, and re-hires include a number of Local 879 members. AIW said talks are still on with the new management over issues including union recognition.

Reagan majority reverses policy of Labor Board

Hardware Co. In that case, the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals enforced the NLRB's finding that the company's action amounted to a unilateral repudiation of contract terms to which it had agreed.

In the Milwaukee Spring case, the company appealed the NLRB decision. But before the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled on the case, the new NLRB asked the court to halt proceedings and return the case to the labor board for reconsideration.

Last September, attorneys for the UAW and the AFL-CIO argued against a policy reversal, while the U.S. Chamber of Commerce took the employer's side.

In the argument before the NLRB, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold contended that a reversal would in effect give employers the right to reopen collective bargaining agreements at will—a concept that Congress rejected for either side in the 1947 Taft-Hartley Act. He termed employer demands that workers agree to wage concessions during the life of a contract or face relocation of their jobs to non-union facilities akin to economic blackmail.

The NLRB's policy reversal, clearly foreshadowed by its earlier action in aborting the appellate court test, was denounced by the UAW as representative of the Reagan Administration's "all out ideological and economic assault on working people."

Rights policy seen spurring black voters' role in election

"Blacks are asserting themselves at the ballot box with such great vigor because President Reagan's term in office has been one unrelenting attack against the interests of blacks and other working and out-of-work people," Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, told the institute's national board at its annual meeting.

Hill lashed out at the Administration's attempt to undermine civil rights and criticized recent Presidential commissions that have sought to explain away the harmful consequences of harsh cutbacks in social spending.

"What we need is not the limiting of government functions," Hill asserted, but "the development of a public philosophy aimed at creating social justice."

Jackson candidacy

Hill's presentation focused as well on the entry of a black candidate into the Democratic presidential primaries. He noted that while Jesse Jackson's candidacy may well bring to the fore a number of issues on the black agenda, "few of us expect that Rev. Jackson has even the most remote chance of capturing the Democratic nomination."

Thus, Hill argued, "it is very important that we formulate the issues in this campaign in a way that builds on the euphoria and enthusiasm the Jackson campaign has engendered among large numbers of black Americans. We must work to convey to black Americans that the principal task at hand is the defeat of Ronald Reagan and his replacement by a President who is committed to full employment, social justice, and civil rights. We must emphasize issues rather than personalities, programs rather than rhetoric."

In a luncheon address to the more than 50 APRI leaders and officers at the Washington meeting, AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins praised the Randolph Institute for its non-partisan work in registering black voters and getting out the black vote. Perkins outlined labor's 1984 election year strategy and indicated that the federation's decision to back Walter Mondale early in the Democratic campaign "sprang from a disappointment with the impact labor has had on the Presidential process in past election years."

Labor's consensus behind one candidate precludes the possibility of labor resources "cancelling out one another's efforts" in the primaries, Perkins stressed.

Among the participants in the day-long deliberations, which focused on voter education and voter participation strategies for 1984, were AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal; AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard; NFL Players Association Executive Director Eugene Upshaw; Postal Workers President Moe Biller and Vice President William Burrus; civil rights leader Eleanor Holmes Norton; Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch; Laborers Vice President Robert E. Powell; and APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin.

The board approved the program for the 1984 APRI national conference, which will be held May 11-13 in Hollywood, Fla.

Howard Coughlin dies, retired OPEIU president

Bronxville, N.Y.—Howard A. Coughlin, president emeritus of the Office & Professional Employees, died after a heart attack Jan. 19 at Lawrence Hospital. He was 70 years old.

In a message to his wife Margaret, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said, "Along with countless union members across the land, we are deeply saddened to learn of your husband's death. Thousands of working men and women have benefitted from his leadership and were enriched by his friendship."

Coughlin served for 26 years as head of the union. He joined OPEIU's predecessor, the American Federation of Office Employees in 1937, and served as the business manager for two New York locals and as an AFL organizer before being elected an OPEIU vice president in 1951. Two years later he was elected president and continued in the post until his retirement in 1979.

Beulah Carter heads COPE volunteers in West

Beulah Carter has been named director of the COPE Western States Volunteers in Politics program by COPE Director John Perkins.

Carter has been an AFL-CIO field representative since 1976. Prior to her new appointment, she was assigned to Region III based in Baltimore. She succeeds Jane Adams as VIP director for the region that takes in Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming. Adams recently became director of COPE Region VI comprising Arkansas, Louisiana and Mississippi.

Before joining the federation staff, Carter was an international representative of the State, County & Municipal Employees, and had been an organizer for the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and the Service Employees.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue discusses the future of work at the George Meany Center.

Donahue warns downgraded jobs threaten U.S. standard of living

The future of work could hold "desperate consequences" for workers, the economy and American society unless labor, government and management act to improve the outlook, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared.

The trends developing in the workplace, if they are ignored and unchanged, "will seriously erode the employment prospects and the earnings of our workforce and effectively prevent our maintaining—much less improving—the standard of living to which we've grown accustomed," he said.

He reviewed the findings and recommendations of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's committee on the evolution of work at a seminar on "The Changing Workplace" offered at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The council committee found that continuing high unemployment is likely to hang on in the future because there will be a persistent job shortage. Among the causes of the shortfall are the changing size, age and composition of the workforce, the decline of key industries, the shift from an industrial to a service economy, and technological change, Donahue noted.

Job downgrading

Some jobs, he pointed out, could be downgraded as they become "deskilled."

What's needed to head off that bleak scenario, he asserted, are massive job-creation programs, industrial and trade policies, increased labor-management cooperation, reform of labor laws and more responsible conduct by employers.

Donahue stressed that active participation by the labor movement and "serious government involvement" are critical to solving the employment problems of the future.

He asserted that a legitimate function of government is to assure that the rights of workers are protected. And, he said, workers have a right to insist on shaping the future of work so that it "serves the human person at the center of the economic order."

But today, Donahue charged, the economic order is one that is "driven by the profit motive," and it operates under a government "that denies any responsibility for ensuring either employment, employment opportunity or the equality of that opportunity."

Anti-worker

Donahue pointed out that the same government has shown its stripes by appointing to high office persons who not only have shown "little respect for the objective rights of workers," but who also "firmly believe in and argue for the operation of so-called free markets, uncontrolled and responding only to the profit seekers."

He noted that the Executive Council committee's conclusions stressed the "enormous" need for job creation—along with training and retraining—that must be met if the economy is going to avert the potentially disastrous effects of job shortages.

But that task is "not going to be done by individual corporations left unattended," Donahue declared. He pointed to the need for labor, management and government cooperation in shaping for the nation both an industrial policy and a trade policy that include a commitment to full employment.

The AFL-CIO's concern that this progress will only be made if there is a change in the government leadership is at the root of the federation's endorsement of Walter F. Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination, Donahue said.

Shrinking opportunities

While the evolution of work is producing growth in the number of unskilled service jobs and low-skilled manufacturing jobs, and a much smaller number of professional jobs at the top of the economic ladder, jobs for the middle-level worker are disappearing.

The "shrinking middle class" includes not only highly paid manufacturing workers, but also many other professional, administrative and white collar workers whose jobs are being phased out of corporate America, Donahue stressed.

The major cause of the shrinkage is the "alteration of and in many cases the disappearance of our manufacturing base," Donahue said. He explained that some companies have developed procedures for manufacturing goods that require fewer and fewer workers, and many firms have "simply moved their manufacturing plants across the border or all the way to Southeast Asia, to Latin America, or other places where they can pay extremely low wages, far below American standards."

What most Americans don't realize, Donahue said, are the consequences this loss of a manufacturing base — and the wages that go with it — have for the economy as a whole.

When hundreds of thousands of workers who once made $12, $13 or $15 an hour are forced to take jobs that pay $3.50 an hour "it takes a very simple computation to see that average income is going to suffer," he said.

Donahue also stressed that union wage and benefit levels in the steel, auto, electrical and other metal fabrication industries have been the "standard bearers" that have boosted pay and benefits for many other workers in this country, union and non-union alike, and "even the administrative, professional and lower-management people ride the big union coattails."

As those coattails shrink, Donahue asserted, "the ride will be a whole lot less pleasant."

Transitional force

He stressed that the labor movement is the "one force that could ease the transition for the American worker from the manufacturing to the service-dominated employment market" by stepping up organizing and enlarging the beneficial union presence in the service industries.

But our government "is devoted to minimizing our effectiveness and reducing the influence of the labor movement in the American economy," he pointed out. What is needed, he said, is revised labor law that makes it easier for workers to "exercise their free choice to form and join unions," coupled with "the fullest degree of labor-management cooperation . . . based on mutual acceptance of the other side's right to exist" and recognition of each other's legitimate rights and needs.

Trade deficit puts drag on U.S. economy

Signs of a slowing in economic activity showed up in government reports that pointed to some trouble spots and possible rough months ahead.

A drastic worsening in the nation's trade balance put a drag on economic growth in the final quarter of 1983, the Commerce Dept. reported. The agency said that "real," or inflation-adjusted, gross national product—the total output of goods and services—grew at a 4.5 percent annual rate in the fourth quarter.

That was less than half the 9.7-percent gain posted in the April-June quarter.

The major reason for slower-than-expected growth was the nation's deteriorating trade balance. Net exports—exports of goods and services minus imports—plummeted at an annual rate of $8.9 billion in the October-December quarter, the Commerce Dept. reported.

If exports had remained unchanged, the economy would have expanded at a 6.7-percent rate, the department said.

Budget problem

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said one reason for the trade problems is the large federal budget drafted by the Administration. The government's big credit needs help keep interest rates high, he said, and this in turn attracts foreign funds to the United States which bid up the value of the dollar, making imports cheaper and exports more expensive.

The Labor Dept. said that initial claims for state unemployment benefits jumped to 405,000 during the second week of January. The seasonally adjusted figure was a sharp increase from a four-year low of 353,000 in the first week of 1984.

The department said the figure does not include more than 760,000 others collecting benefits under other state and federal programs.

Other troubling economic reports included the Commerce Dept.'s announcement that big-ticket factory goods orders declined 1.15 percent last month. The decline, the first in six months, was pulled down by a 10.3-percent reduction in defense orders but would have been down three-tenths of 1 percent even if military orders had been excluded.

The durables orders, for heavy duty merchandise from machinery to automobiles, provide much of the fuel for the nation's industrial economy and employment in the months ahead.

Meanwhile, the value of contracts for new construction declined by 7 percent in December. The F. W. Dodge Co. attributed the drop to unusually severe weather.

'Worklife' plans given mixed reviews

Labor's willingness to participate in "quality of worklife programs" is endangered by companies that insist on using these joint efforts as an "anti-union tool," President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. said.

Too often, he noted at a Work in America Institute conference, the quality of worklife program "represents mostly a surface effort which sometimes barely masks a corporate effort to dump its collective bargaining obligations, or to avoid them in the first place."

Samuel pointed out to conference delegates that each union's response to quality of worklife schemes is related directly to its experience with a certain management and its approach. "The success or failure of QWL (quality of worklife programs) will probably be determined more by management's basic attitude toward its union relationship than how skillfully we practice it," he said.

"What is needed today is a bona fide expression by American corporate management that it is willing to meet labor halfway, to recognize the role of trade unions in a democratic society and to allow us a share in the decision-making at the highest level," Samuel said.

He noted that most quality of worklife efforts are shallow at best. "What is needed is a much more deep-seated change in labor-management relationships, in which workers through their unions are kept informed of major decisions affecting production and employment, and have the means of influencing those decisions to protect the best interests of workers and the company," he said.

Government evaluation

A recent Labor Dept. report summarizing some 200 quality of worklife programs in both the private and public sector, stated flatly, "Thousands of companies and unions that have tried these cooperative programs are convinced that there is no other way to operate."

Samuel challenged this conclusion, saying, "I haven't found any support for this claim from the Allied Industrial Workers who recently found their bargaining position undermined by the Briggs & Stratton Co.'s exploitation of a QWL program. That situation eventually deteriorated into a bitter 13-week strike which ended without a union victory."

He added to this the negative experiences of the Clothing Workers and the Machinists in respect to the quality of worklife programs. "In short, there are a number of unions which are not ready to class QWL as one of those inventions on a par with sliced bread," Samuel observed.

Emphasizing that management's approach to QWL is the basis for a union's reaction, Samuel noted the Auto Workers, Communications Workers and Steelworkers are pleased with the various quality of worklife programs they have been involved in.

The key is involvement, Samuel explained. "A QWL program which proceeds with union approval, but without union participation, can do irreparable harm to the foundation of membership support the union must depend on," he warned.

Management often seeks to use these programs to improve productivity, and not the quality of worklife. The programs are also designed "to save money for managers by improving productivity, reducing waste, etc. Are workers not entitled to their fair share of the gain? Too often, management's answer has been 'no.' "

Samuel pointed out that where management has agreed to give labor a "share of the action, not only to consult, but to participate in the decision-making," this represents a "change in management attitudes which give some of us hope for the future."

Roses vs. Realism

IS THE STATE of our nation as rosy as President Reagan would have us believe?

Are further cuts in the shrinking, non-military segment of the budget really the answer to enormous deficits spawned by tax cuts tilted to those with the least need?

Should prayer in public schools and tax credits for persons sending children to private schools top the agenda for education?

And can the erosion of America's industrial base be ignored because Mr. Reagan tells us "the spirit of enterprise flourishes?"

The President is not without anecdotes to prove his points. He illustrates the new "spirit of enterprise" by telling the story of a Cuban refugee who "turned $27 and a dream into a successful importing business in Coral Gables, Fla."

It's reassuring, perhaps, to find out that some business ventures started on a shoestring do prove successful. But is that really the best encouragement that the President of the United States can give to steelworkers faced with imminent plant closings and to shoe workers whose jobs have been permanently wiped out?

HOUSE MAJORITY Leader Jim Wright gave what might be considered a Democratic version of a state of the nation address in a less publicized speech to the National Press Club.

"Only one-fifth of our federal budget goes to help the hungry, the homeless, the sick and the handicapped, the elderly and the young who would get an education," Wright noted. But these programs have absorbed 60 percent of all of the budget cuts of the past three years.

"We have cut nutrition while hunger is increasing. We have cut job training when millions are out of work," the majority leader noted.

"In the last three years we have reduced vocational education, adult education, Pell grants, school lunches. . . . Clean water and clean air programs have been cut."

Meanwhile, a President elected on a promise to achieve a balanced budget by 1983 has added more to the national debt "than all seven post-war administrations from Truman through Carter added in 35 years." And the tax cut, which President Reagan says can't be tampered with "adds $135 billion to the already astronomical annual deficit," Wright stressed.

Merely to pay the interest on the national debt, the House majority leader pointed out, requires $100 billion a year. That, too, is part of the continuing price of Mr. Reagan's tax policies.

Saving just a fraction of that amount would make an enormous difference in the cruel budget competition between a necessary defense and the domestic needs of the nation.

Now presidents, like politicians in less exalted offices, would much rather point with pride, leaving it to opposition leaders to view with alarm. And that is certainly understandable.

But the hard fact is that Jim Wright's analysis of the economy is a lot more realistic than Ronald Reagan's State of the Union assessment.

Not Such a Gamble

WALTER MONDALE, the candidate whom union members have instructed the AFL-CIO to support, shares our concerns and objectives. Seeing to it that he gets the chance to lead the way to a national industrial renaissance is our highest priority.

Much has been written in the press about labor's big political gamble in 1984. Since we do not control the political process in this country, and do not seek to, I concede that we run the risk of failure. Every significant enterprise entails the possibility of failure.

But if we do not make the effort, we render almost inevitable a continuation of the policies that have, in the last three years, brought such hardship and pain to the millions we represent. Measured against that prospect, and the essential purpose of our movement, we have very little to lose, and a world of hope to win.

We have every intention of winning.

Post-Watergate reforms weakened under Reagan

By Press Associates, Inc.

Watergate proved that no government official, not even the President, is above the law.

Richard Nixon, who in 1974 became the first Chief Executive to resign from office, learned this lesson the hard way.

Shocked by the revelations of criminal misconduct and cynical abuse of authority by top officials, the American people demanded and won reforms to guard against future Watergates.

But some of the reforms now have been called into question. While liberals praise the aftermath of Watergate for strengthening democratic institutions and making government more open, some conservatives say the reforms went too far and speak with dismay of "the Watergate syndrome."

Unfortunately, the Reagan Administration has been backtracking on the Watergate reforms.

Former Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox said, "The Reagan Administration has done nothing to stress the importance of maintaining the highest standards of honor and integrity among government officials."

Administration targets

Cox said the Administration has tried to undermine, with mixed success, four key post-Watergate measures. These are the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), the Ethics in Government Act, executive directives aimed at curbing intelligence agency abuse, and the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act making it a crime to bribe foreign officials.

The FOIA, enacted in 1966 and strengthened in 1974, reduced government secrecy by establishing the right of any citizen to government documents.

Screen Actors Guild President Ed Asner recently called the FOIA a "cornerstone of democracy." It enables the public to take the initiative in finding out what the government is doing or has done, Asner said.

The Reagan Administration has tightened guidelines for releasing information under FOIA requests. It also has been charging more fees for compiling requested information, making it difficult for the average citizen to obtain it.

On the Ethics in Government Act, the Administration has suggested that the financial disclosure reports required of public officials under the law be made available only to congressional committees—not to the public as now is the case.

Repealing impartiality

Further, Atty. Gen. William French Smith asked Congress to repeal the law's provision for a special prosecutor, which was meant to ensure impartial investigations of allegations against government officials.

An Executive Order by President Reagan greatly expanded the authority of the CIA, which was set up as a foreign intelligence agency, to conduct intelligence operations in the United States.

In addition, the Administration's new domestic security guidelines expand the FBI's investigatory authority in ways which civil liberties experts believe could endanger legitimate political dissident. This, of course, could include political activities by trade union members.

The Reagan assault on traditional liberties has been wide-ranging.

Congress, however, has demonstrated an increasing willingness to do battle with the White House over issues involving individual rights.

The lessons of Watergate must never be forgotten and the reforms it spawned must be preserved and strengthened.

Eternal vigilance, we are occasionally reminded, is the price of liberty.

Mondale joins with UFCW in 17-city television linkup

By Arlee C. Green

The Food & Commercial Workers beamed a two-hour satellite television broadcast to more than 5,000 local officers and union volunteers in 17 cities to mobilize support for the election of Walter F. Mondale as president.

The teleconference was sponsored by the UFCW's political arm, the Active Ballot Club.

The first part of the program was devoted to a review of the Reagan Administration actions by UFCW President William H. Wynn, an interview with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, and a panel discussion of the election-year issues. The second part featured Mondale discussing his candidacy with Wynn and fielding questions from UFCW members.

Key reasoning

Mondale keyed on his three reasons for seeking the presidency—to restore the nation's competitive edge, to restore a sense of fairness in American life and to make a safer world. By way of contrast, Mondale said, President Reagan "is wrong in everything I have talked about . . . He is moving this country away from our future. . . . 1983 was the worst trade year in American history and '84 is going to be worse. . . . He is the most anti-labor president in modern history."

Asked what economic program he would offer to put people back to work, Mondale said, "First of all you have got to repeal Reaganomics. That means you have got to get those deficits down . . . get the interest rates down and when you do that, the economy will start moving again." He stressed the need for retraining workers and over the long term, the need to rebuild the nation's infrastructure and to strengthen educational programs.

Other questions from members focused on women's issues, nuclear arms, foreign imports, the Supreme Court, workplace health and safety, Lebanon, hunger and possible vice presidential running mates.

Nationwide hook-up

The teleconference linked UFCW audiences in Los Angeles, Denver, Atlanta, Chicago, Boston, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Houston, Seattle, San Francisco, Davenport, Iowa, Laurel, Md., Troy, Mich., and Newark and Cherry Hill, N.J.

Wynn explained at a press conference prior to the broadcast that this form of communication with the membership was the most cost-effective method of conducting the union's legislative forum which usually involves about 500 members.

He pointed out, also, that the broadcast would be available to the union's 700-plus locals on video cassette tapes. Wynn said he expects that as many as 500 locals will make use of the tapes.

Asked whether this type of "internal expenditure" was necessary since the union's members had already shown significant backing for Mondale and had endorsed him last October, Wynn said Mondale "doesn't have it (the Democratic nomination) wrapped up. Our members think he's going to win, but we want him to win big."

Joint endeavor

When a reporter cited support for Reagan among union members in 1980 and asked if it would happen again, Wynn responded: "Our membership has been devastated by the Reagan policies. Some have had their wages rolled back by $3 an hour. They're angry. They don't have short memories. They know the impact of Reaganomics, and they know there hasn't been a recovery. The recovery is more in the media and in Reagan rhetoric than in fact."

In the broadcast, Kirkland, when asked what advice he had for union members this election year, said simply, "Be there. Be there when there are primaries and caucuses. The whole world is run by people who show up when the decisions are made."

Referring to the 1980 election, Kirkland said, "No doubt some union members voted for Reagan. I'm confident that next time around we'll get much stronger unity. We need to get 65 percent of our members supporting a candidate to offset the conservative vote."

There were also interviews with Sen. Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii) and House Majority Whip Thomas Foley (D-Wash.). The panel members included political analyst Alan Baron, publisher of the Baron Report; Judith Goldsmith, president of the National Organization for Women; State, County & Municipal Employees Sec.-Treas. William Lucy, president of the Coalition of Black Trade Unionists, and UFCW Vice Presidents Jay Foreman, Arnold Mayer and William Olwell.

At House hearings

IUD warns U.S. close to two-tiered economy

A continuing wipeout of middle-income factory jobs is moving the United States dangerously close to a two-tiered economy of rich and poor, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. warned.

At House hearings that coincided with the department's annual legislative conference, IUD President Howard D. Samuel and other witnesses testified to the economic distortions caused by a shift from manufacturing to lower-paid service jobs. Already, they noted, hard-won gains of blacks and other minorities have been rolled back and the standard of living of most Americans has been pushed downward.

Samuel's testimony, before the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, was based on a new IUD study that documents the change in the traditional economic pyramid.

It shows that "the middle group is disappearing," he testified. Workers in the fastest-growing fields of employment earn an average of $100-a-week less than production workers in declining industries, the report notes. Thus the pyramid shows "a relatively small number of highly-trained jobs at the top, paying extremely well, coupled with a very much larger group of low-skill jobs at the bottom, paying very little."

Subcommittee Chairman John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.) sponsored a labor-supported industrial strategy bill which seeks to enlist private-sector unions and management in a cooperative endeavor with government to halt the erosion of this nation's industrial base. Its approach parallels the recommendations made earlier this month by a panel of prominent Americans.

Coalition witnesses

Also testifying in general support of the LaFalce bill were Eleanor Holmes Norton, who heads the Women in the Workplace task force of the Business & Professional Women's Clubs of America; Tom Stoel, testifying for a coalition of 13 environmental organizations, and University of Chicago Prof. William Wilson, for the Joint Center on Political Studies.

The House subcommittee, a unit of the Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs Committee, plans to mark up the legislation in early February, LaFalce indicated.

As did the IUD report, the subcommittee witnesses stressed the social consequences of deindustrialization as being the elimination of better-paying jobs, thereby shrinking opportunities for women, minorities and the young.

Hispanics as well as blacks are among the heaviest losers in the combination of deindustrialization and recession now battering America, the IUD report noted. The unemployment rates in the industries with the highest concentration of Hispanics are substantially above the national average. And "Hispanic women are much more likely to hold blue-collar jobs than are other women."

The report pointed also to the setbacks to the promising start made in opening up apprenticeships and skilled jobs to minorities and women. It cited the strain on tax revenues and social services in cities that have lost a large part of their manufacturing base.

Recipe for rebuilding

Pressing the case for a national industrial policy, the IUD report welcomed the bill introduced by LaFalce and other Democrats on the subcommittee. Under the title of the Industrial Competitiveness Act, the bill's ingredients include:

- A Council on Industrial Competiveness, composed of top-level leaders from labor, business, government and concerned public interest groups. Subcommittees for the various industrial sectors would bring together industrial development recommendations for review by the full council and submission to the President.
- A Bank for Industrial Competitiveness, to help finance needed investments for industrial modernization and expansion.
- An Advanced Technology Foundation to participate with industry in research and development projects that give promise of new breakthroughs.

"America cannot hope to achieve full employment for the 1980s without coherent strategies for revitalizing basic industries and supporting emerging industries that can generate new job growth for the future," the report declared.

The full employment goal was stressed especially in a preface signed by civil rights and environmental leaders as well as by Samuel and Auto Workers President Owen Bieber. They were joined by National Organization for Women President Judy Goldsmith, National Urban League President John Jacob, Wilderness Society President Gaylord Nelson, National Women's Political Caucus Chair Kathy Wilson, Congressional Black Caucus Chair Julian C. Dixon (D-Calif.), NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks and Sierra Club Executive Director Michael McCloskey.

Carpenters create unit to aid retiree activities

The Carpenters established a new retirees department and created the UBC Retirees Club as a voluntary association for the union's nearly 70,000 retired members and their spouses.

The new department, created with the UBC executive board's approval, will provide local retiree clubs with guidance and services.

UBC President Patrick J. Campbell said the local retiree units will offer their members recreational and social contacts, community activities, and a variety of opportunities for legislative and political education work.

'One-sided' Reagan budget puts burden on workers, sick, poor

Lane Kirkland addresses AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84 committee meeting. Representatives from 35 federation affiliates attended the committee's founding session.

Further cuts sought in key social areas

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan asked Congress to make further cuts in already slashed domestic programs and vote another big increase in military spending. But he warned against any rollback of the tax cuts that have contributed heavily to a succession of staggering budget deficits.

In fiscal 1985, the budget year that starts next Oct. 1, the tax cuts that were the heart of Reagan's economic program account for $165 billion of the projected $180 billion deficit.

The President told Congress that the federal tax system needs to be made "simpler and fairer"—but not this year. And in a speech to an audience of business supporters, Reagan said critics who complain that his tax policies favor the rich are motivated by "greed and envy" and want to penalize success.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald criticized Reagan's budget proposal as "one-sided," with its heavy tilt to military spending and reductions in programs "to help workers, students, the elderly, the sick and the poor."

More cutbacks

Federal workers are again targeted for cuts in retirement benefits and another year of severe pay curbs, he noted. Unemployment benefits for railroad workers would be reduced, the elderly and the needy would be required to pay more for health services, and most students would get less help in paying college tuition.

At the same time, defense spending would rise to $272 billion, a $34.5 billion increase over this year and nearly double the 1980 level. The total budget calls for $925.5 billion in outlays, including $116 billion just to pay the interest on the federal debt.

Director David A. Stockman of the White House Office of Management & Budget acknowledged at a press briefiing that the Administration will have to come up next year with some "tough bullets to bite" in terms of revenue-raising proposals to bring down the deficit.

But there was no point in proposing

Black unionists mobilize for all-out election drive

By Susan Dunlop

Black trade union leaders formed a national committee—AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84—to continue to mobilize labor support among AFL-CIO union members for the presidential nomination and election of Walter Mondale.

The first formal meeting of the committee drew nearly 200 unionists representing some 35 AFL-CIO affiliates, including all of those with substantial black membership.

Cochairs of the committee are AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson, who is also director of the Government Employees' Women's Dept.; Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees, Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch, AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, who is president of the Actors & Artistes, and Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp.

Velma Hill, civil rights and international affairs director of the Service Employees, will coordinate the committee's activities for AFL-CIO COPE.

The cochairs stressed that a primary objective will be to spell out the damage that the Reagan Administration has inflicted on black union members, their families and their communities by its unfair social and economic policies.

The committee will also launch a nationwide effort to explain the crucial issues in the campaign and to urge AFL-CIO union members to support Mondale as the candidate best qualified to defeat Ronald Reagan and return the nation to a progressive path, they said.

Federation President Lane Kirkland pledged to the group that its efforts will have the "full and total support of the AFL-CIO."

Stepp pointed out the "stark contrast" between the attitudes of other American presidents, such as Franklin D. Roosevelt who urged workers to join unions, and President Reagan, one of whose first acts "was to destroy a union."

Lynch asserted that President Reagan's social and economic policies have devastated the nation, and have fallen particularly hard on blacks and women. He said

Mondale links deficit reduction to tax reforms

Walter F. Mondale's deficit-reduction plan relies heavily on a more equitable tax system to raise revenues and a smaller rise in defense spending than President Reagan has proposed.

That's the thrust of a position paper Mondale issued on the eve of Reagan's budget message to Congress.

It includes a shift in farm policies, a clamp on health care costs and—as an inevitable byproduct—a substantial savings in interest payments on the federal debt.

By the end of Mondale's first term in office, his campaign fact sheet asserts, the annual savings over the Reagan budget scenario would exceed $100 billion even after allowance is made for up to $30 billion in added spending for social programs and industrial development.

Reagan also has a plan for future deficit reduction, his top economic spokesmen assured the press at a budget briefing. But don't expect it to be unveiled until after the election.

Rising trade deficit bleeds U.S. jobs

By James M. Shevis

The record 1983 merchandise trade deficit of $69.4 billion is a direct threat to the nation's economic well-being and is costing hundreds of thousands of Americans their jobs, the AFL-CIO warned.

Research Director Rudy Oswald said that last year's deficit—63 percent greater than the 1982 deficit of $42.7 billion—"has had an extremely negative impact on the U.S. economy and has contributed significantly to the current high levels of unemployment."

Government and private economists alike have expressed fear that the imbalance will rise even higher this year, topping $100 billion, and that even more jobs will be lost.

The Commerce Dept. said the 1984 deficit could reach $110 billion. The job loss resulting from such a deficit could cost up to 2 million jobs, studies by both Data Resources, Inc., and the Institute for International Economics estimate.

Accelerated decline

"The decline in our trade position has accelerated very, very dramatically," DRI President Otto Eckstein said. "It's snowballing."

Eckstein said the growing international trade deficit is the strongest evidence of an accelerating decline for U.S. manufacturers.

In manufacturing trade alone, the 1983 deficit reached $38.2 billion and an astonishing 260 percent increase over the manufacturing deficit level of 1982.

A major contributor to the huge growth in the trade deficit has been the appreciation of the U.S. dollar. Since July 1980, the value of the dollar has risen 56.9 percent against the currencies of the nation's major trading partners.

This change in the dollar has had the effect of increasing the cost of U.S. exports and reducing the cost of imported

At IUD conference

National policy urged to aid ailing industries

The critical need for a national industrial policy and the importance of reversing the damage done by the undermining of basic industries were the key concerns of the Industrial Union Dept.'s legislative conference.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel told participants in the two-day meeting that the problem of America's shrinking industrial base is not new, yet for many industries the recession brought on by the policies of the Reagan Administration intensified their decline.

Samuel said the nation urgently needs "sound tax, budget and trade policies if we are to get back on the road to prosperity and full employment."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in his keynote address, called a national industrial policy that takes into account the needs of the nation as a whole "a logical and necessary element in the development of democracy itself."

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO welcomes and supports the Industrial Competitiveness Act introduced by Rep. John LaFalce (D-N.Y.), but he stressed that "we are under no illusion that our program will get past the desk in the Oval Office until there is a new President to pick up the pen and sign it."

Labor's top priority

Because Walter Mondale "shares our concerns and objectives" the AFL-CIO has endorsed his candidacy and made it the highest priority "to see to it that he gets the chance to lead the way to a national industrial renaissance."

Machinists President William W. Winpisinger warned that "all is not right" in the current economic upturn. Although a one-sided recovery is being felt "at the top" of the economic ladder, millions of Americans have been left behind.

Winpisinger said the number and quality of jobs emerging in new industries, such as "high tech," and in services are a "poor substitute" for lost jobs in manufacturing.

Communications Workers President Glenn Watts told the conference that the lack of an industrial policy "is a direct result of our national preoccupation with the short term, especially short-term profits."

He pointed out that the need for an industrial policy isn't restricted to the so-called "basic industries." Watts said there are already "warning signs" that the future of the information and high tech industries "could fall victim to the same maladies" plaguing such industries as steel and automobiles.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber stressed that industrial policy is not just "a political buzzword—a ploy to help Democrats get elected," but instead "a practical necessity for the people we represent on the production lines and on the unemployment lines of America."

Bieber, who heads the IUD's industrial policy committee, said the first prerequisite of a "meaningful" industrial policy is "to maintain and expand productive, job-creating investment in the United States." And he stressed that labor must be on guard "to see to it that industrial policy does not end up meaning a national economic policy run by private industry."

The public interest in industrial policy should be defined and broad, democratic controls should be built into it to assure that "the goals of secure employment, a rising standard of living . . . and an expanding supply of useful goods and services" are attained, he said.

Wide impact

Steelworkers Acting President Lynn R. Williams agreed that most corporate decisions concerning the industrial future "are made on the basis of very narrow, very selfish and very immediate considerations . . . in private with little or no public involvement." Yet they affect the lives of millions of workers and their communities and the safety and welfare of the nation, he pointed out.

Williams urged that the first step toward achieving industrial policy is to "get rid of this crowd in the White House and their allies in Congress" and then "we must get on with the business of industrial policy legislation."

Electrical Workers President Charles H. Pillard, citing as an example the erosion of jobs in the electrical and electronics industries, said the United States seems to be "the only country in the world to allow the pious formulas of 'free trade' to lead us down the road of industrial ruin." Pillard urged that a national industrial policy include "a sensible trade policy."

In a discussion of how industrial policy can be put in place, Graphic Communications Union President Kenneth J. Brown outlined the legislative priorities needed for a national industrial policy framework, and Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell explained the status of legislation that would bar labor law violators from obtaining government contracts.

Blocking deregulation

Utility Workers President James Joy, Jr., described labor's legislative efforts to block natural gas deregulation, and Electronic Workers President William H. Bywater explained progress toward achieving key domestic content legislation for the automobile industry.

Other speakers at the conference included State, County & Municipal Employees Sec.-Treas. William Lucy and Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, as well as former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall.

Labor presses court battle on prevailing wage rules

The AFL-CIO and eight affiliates asked a federal appeals court to overturn a lower court decision that would permit the Reagan Administration to impose damaging changes in the Service Contract Act, the prevailing wage law meant to protect workers on jobs under federal contract.

The suit seeking to force the Labor Dept. to pull back the rule changes was filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia by the federation and the Building & Construction Trades Dept., with the Carpenters, Electrical Workers, Laborers, Machinists, Seafarers, Service Employees and Transport Workers.

The AFL-CIO and the unions acted following a Jan. 27 District Court ruling upholding the changes sought by the Reagan Administration. Although the Labor Dept. had agreed to postpone the changes until the District Court acted, the lower court's position cleared the way for Sec. Raymond L. Donovan to put the new rules in effect immediately.

The new rules would cut back on the categories of workers who are protected by the law, weaken "successorship" rules that kept employers from cut-throat wage competition to win federal contracts, and exempt certain types of services from coverage completely, notably maintenance and repair contracts covering "high technology" equipment and services performed as part of a multi-purpose contract where the services themselves are not the main element of the agreement.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine said the unions are "very disappointed" in the district court action.

He said that in challenging the changes, the unions argued that the Labor Dept. "failed to provide adequate justification" for any of the cutbacks.

The new rules, Georgine stressed, severely weaken the protection of workers the act was designed to protect.

The AFL-CIO has called the new rules a "wage-busting" tactic and said in a statement that they "cruelly" cut back on wage protections Congress intended to protect working people who are "among the most unskilled, the weakest and poorest of our citizens."

The federation said the District Court decision "strengthens the AFL-CIO's resolve to continue its efforts to bring a measure of fairness and decency to the government's dealings with those who do its laundry, sweep its buildings, cook its food, cut its forests and perform a hundred other hard, demanding—and necessary—jobs."

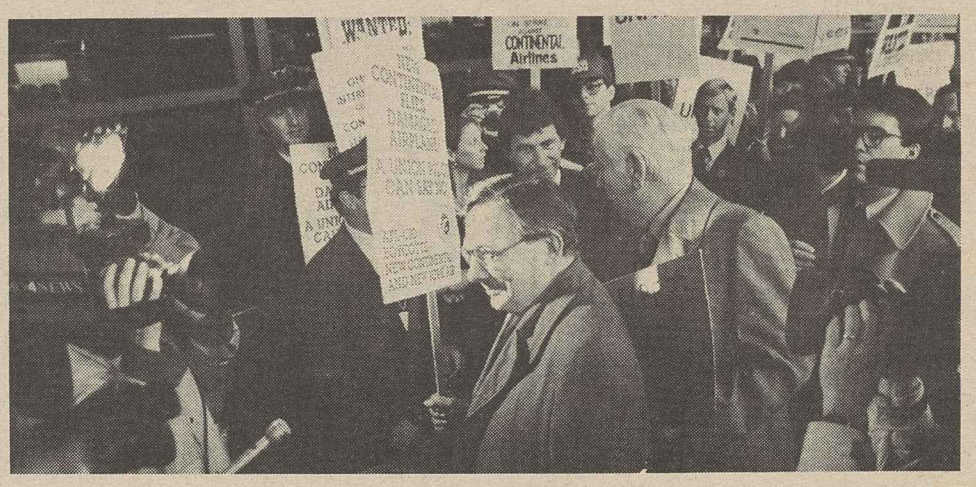
Davis-Bacon ruling

The District Court ruling came after the U.S. Supreme Court had refused to hear a challenge to the Labor Dept.'s rule changes cutting back protections of the Davis-Bacon Act, the prevailing wage law covering federal construction contracts.

By denying review, the high court let stand an appeals court decision allowing the rule changes to go into effect.

The AFL-CIO has charged that the Labor Dept.'s tampering with long-standing prevailing wage regulations is a "back door" tactic by the Reagan Administration to achieve changes in legislation by administrative action when it can't get them through Congress.

Since President Reagan took office, Congress has rejected several Administration attempts to weaken prevailing wage laws.



Continental protest

Continental Airlines' perversion of federal bankruptcy laws to break union contracts was the focus of demonstrations at major cities over the Jan. 27-29 weekend, including the one at Washington, D.C.'s National Airport, left, and in Seattle, where AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joined pickets. In Washington, Air Line Pilots President Henry Duffy, left, and Machinists Airline Coordinator William Scheri led the rally.

Black labor leaders unite for Mondale

the committee's efforts with black trade unionists on the local level will be "full time until we turn Ronald Reagan out of office."

Hutchinson charged that the policies of the Reagan Administration are "killing our communities, killing our young people, killing our jobs," and urged trade unionists to work together to "win with Mondale" and to end the "oppression" many Americans feel under the current Administration.

Lucy said that among black union members "it is not a question of telling them 'how to vote,' but of telling them where to vote" because they are already determined to defeat Reagan. He said the committee's get-out-the-vote programs came as a result of a meeting of black trade unionists immediately following the AFL-CIO's endorsement of Mondale at its convention in October.

Its three goals, now, he said, are "registration, education and election."

Committee members at the meeting included elected officers of AFL-CIO unions, their regional and district directors, officers of AFL-CIO state and local central labor councils, local union officers and union staff members.

Primary targets

Hill said committee activities will initially focus on Georgia, Alabama and Florida, all of which have Mar. 13 primaries. The group's next meeting will be Feb. 19 in Jacksonville, Fla.

The committee has also designated six vice chairs: Vice President Mattie Jackson of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Vice President Nat LaCour of the Teachers, Vice President Calvin Moore of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Vice President Bill Stodghill of the Service Employees, President Tom Turner of the Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO and President Joslyn Williams of the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO.

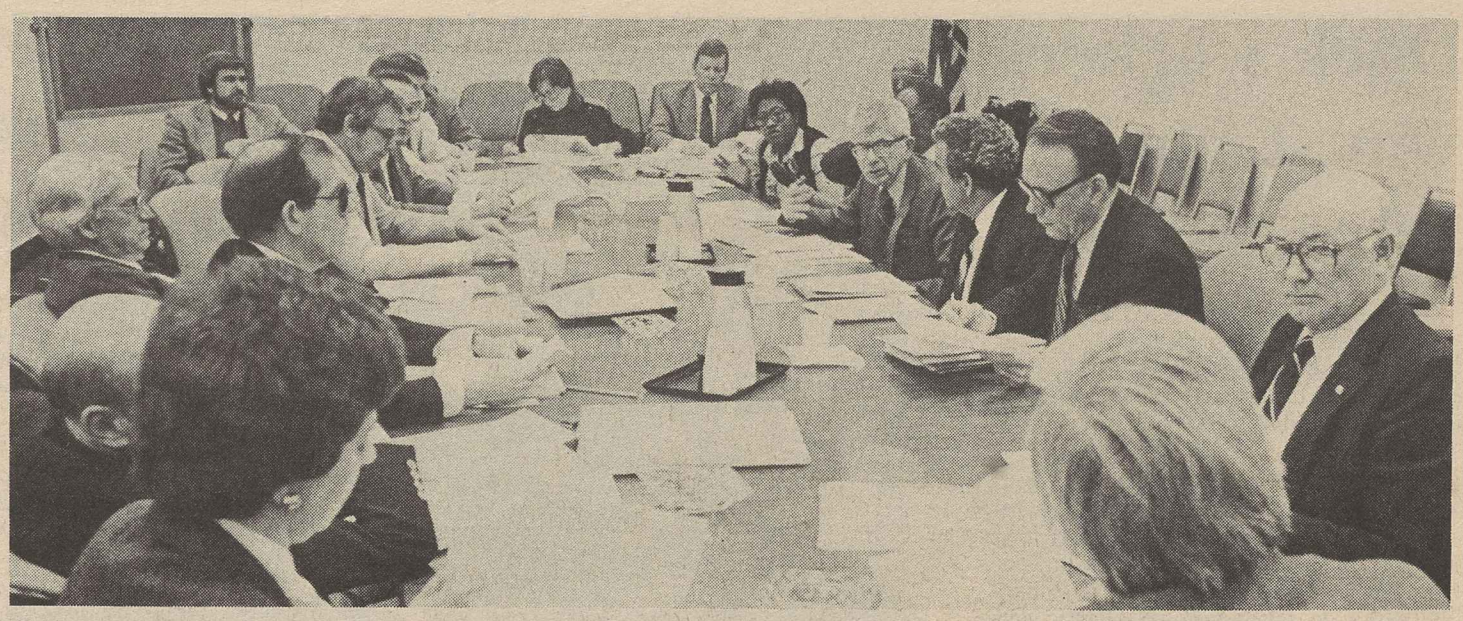
Other speakers at the meeting included COPE Director John Perkins and pollster Peter Hart.

Harvard picks Fraser for Wurf fellowship

Former Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser is the first Jerry Wurf fellow named to the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University.

Fraser will teach during the spring term in the school's trade union program and participate in economic and health policy seminars. He will also conduct a special seminar at the university's Institute of Politics.

The annual fellowship was established last year under a $1-million grant by the State, County & Municipal Employees in memory of the late Jerry Wurf, AFSCME's president from 1964 to 1981.



Dealing with Medicare

Social Security Committee of AFL-CIO Executive Council discusses labor's dissent to a government advisory council's recommendations for raising costs to the elderly and reducing their coverage under Medicare. AFL-CIO Vice President Sol C. Chaikin presided at the meeting held at federation headquarters.

Reagan's 'one-sided' budget seeks further cuts in key social programs such a plan in an election year because Congress wouldn't want to touch it, he claimed. And besides, it would offer a "target" for candidates for Congress to run against.

The President did use his budget to again propose a subminimum summer youth wage, contending that if it were enacted the deficit could be reduced by appropriating a smaller sum for the government's summer youth employment program. He wants the $3.35 minimum reduced to $2.50.

Fast-food franchises that employ a lot of teenagers have been the big advocates of a reduced youth minimum wage. The President's reasoning was that his proposal "will let employers lower their costs to levels more in line with the skills youth possess."

Labor Dept. cutbacks

The Labor Dept. budget calls for reduced funding for the Employment & Training Administration, projects the Occupational Safety & Health Administration at close to current levels but specifies that both OSHA and the Mine Safety & Health Administration "will continue efforts to revise or eliminate standards that burden employers without enhancing protection for workers."

Overall, according to an AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research estimate, the Reagan budget proposal "would cut social programs by approximately $10.6 billion from current services with the cuts highlighted in the social welfare programs."

Poor people eligible for Medicaid would help reduce expenses by "cost-sharing" whenever they needed to see a doctor or enter a hospital and persons would have to wait an additional month after turning 65 to qualify for Medicare—another Administration cost-saver.

Federal employees would pay a higher payroll deduction for a lower level of retirement benefits. Money would be cut from community service programs and special assistance for children and the elderly.

Many of the budget "savings" proposed by the President are retreads of proposals he made last year which Congress rejected or ignored.

That category includes the Administration's attempt to raise postal rates substantially for publications of non-profit organizations by slashing the subsidy from the $879 million that Congress allocated this year to $400 million.

Another renewed proposal was to limit tax-free employer-paid health benefits to $70 a month in premiums for an individual and to $175 for family coverage.

On the plus side, in terms of labor's concerns, the President did propose a substantial increase in Environmental Protection Agency programs, including the identification and cleanup of hazardous chemical dumps, anti-pollution grants and pesticide research.

Education funds overall would get a slight increase, but low-income students would have to pay a larger share of educational expenses.

The President's budget message gave election-year lip service to a call for "a constitutional amendment mandating balanced federal budgets and spending limits."

He also wants a constitutional amendment to allow a president to veto one item in an appropriations bill without vetoing the entire measure.

Reagan renewed his invitation to congressional leaders to join in a bipartisan effort to make a "downpayment" on deficit reduction this year. But he insisted that it must involve "substantial reductions in spending and strictly limited increases in receipts."

Up to Congress

The actual budget is set by Congress, not the President. The economic assumptions, which often do not agree with those of the Administration, are made by the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office, the legislative branch's equivalent of the Office of Management & Budget.

Congress has set various target dates, which it sometimes fails to meet, for setting budget goals by broad categories, further refining the figures, and adopting the legislation needed to reconcile budget goals with the requirements of law.

The President's budget, nevertheless, usually serves as a starting point for the congressional budget planning and many of the less controversial elements are adopted with little or no change.

Lots of guesswork

The budgets presidents submit to Congress each year base projections of tax revenues and required outlays on a set of economic assumptions—in effect, educated guesses on the behavior of the economy.

Sometimes these assumptions prove close to the mark; in some years, they have been widely askew.

Here's what Preseident Reagan's latest budget proposal supposes for the near future:

- It assumes that unemployment, which was 8.2 percent in December 1983, will drop to 7.7 percent in the fourth quarter of this calendar year, but dip only to 7.5 percent by the last quarter of 1986. That would leave the jobless rate higher than when Reagan took office.
- It assumes an after-inflation growth rate of 4.5 percent for calendar year 1984, dipping to 4 percent the following year.
- It assumes, contrary to the expectation of most private economists, a continuing decline in interest rates on Treasury bills—thus reducing the budget drain. The projection for 91-day bills is a 7.7 percent rate in 1985, dropping to 5 percent by 1989.

Mondale plan to lower deficit keyed to equitable tax system

Office of Management & Budget, said the Administration will wait until after the election to make any major deficit-reduction proposals.

Mondale's program calls for a partial rollback of Reagan tax cuts that he termed "the most unfair tax measures in modern American history." He called for making "wealthy individuals and corporations join the rest of us in paying their fair share."

His revenue plan, which he said would add $60 billion in revenues in the 1989 fiscal year, proposes to:

- Defer indexing, which will otherwise result in annual tax reductions while deficits continue to soar.
- Put a retroactive cap on the third year of the Reagan tax cut that would affect incomes above $60,000.
- Impose a 10-percent surcharge on incomes above $100,000.
- Enact a 15-percent minimum corporate tax and end widespread loopholes and abuses in the corporate tax code.
- Adopt a tough compliance code to reduce tax evasion.

On the spending side, Mondale pledged to maintain a strong defense but "bring defense spending down to a steady, sustainable level." He spelled out weapon systems he would support as alternatives to Administration plans, holding the annual after-inflation rise in spending to 4 percent—less than half the projected Reagan increase. The difference would be in the $30-$40 billion a year range, he said.

For agriculture, Mondale indicated areas of changed emphasis that he said would save about $10 billion a year.

New investments

On the budget expansion side, Mondale called for "new investments of about $20 billion in such areas as education, research and development, job training, industrial strategy and exports." The goal would be to make the United States more competitive in world markets.

"To promote fairness," Mondale proposed budget restorations of about $10 billion "in compensatory education, health, nutrition, legal services, environmental protection" and comparable programs.

If during the campaign he proposes any new commitments in these areas, Mondale pledged, he will at the same time indicate how he would pay for the improved measures.

Dock workers win stronger job security

Miami Beach, Fla.—The Longshoremen reached agreement with ocean carrier companies on a supplement to their already negotiated master contract covering some 50,000 dockworkers in ports from Maine to Texas.

The supplement, reached here after four days of intensive collective bargaining, increases job security by stipulating that each of the more than 200 ocean carrier companies will use ILA members to handle cargo on their ships in Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports. The union will conduct a ratification vote Feb. 7.

The newly approved change in the master contract supplements a three-year agreement that will expire Sept. 30, 1986. The master contract calls for wage increases of $1 an hour in each year of the pact, and increased contributions to pensions and welfare programs.

Longshoremen's basic wage will rise to $15 an hour, retroactive to Oct. 1, to $16 next Oct. 1, and to $17 on Oct. 1, 1985.

In announcing the supplement agreement, ILA President Thomas Gleason also said that the union had reached a settlement with the New York Shipping Association on local issues in the port of New York and New Jersey, the nation's largest ocean harbor.

The bistate port pact is geared to producing greater labor-management cooperation and improve control of cargo-handling costs. Other locals are expected to follow suit, the ILA said.

Other ports

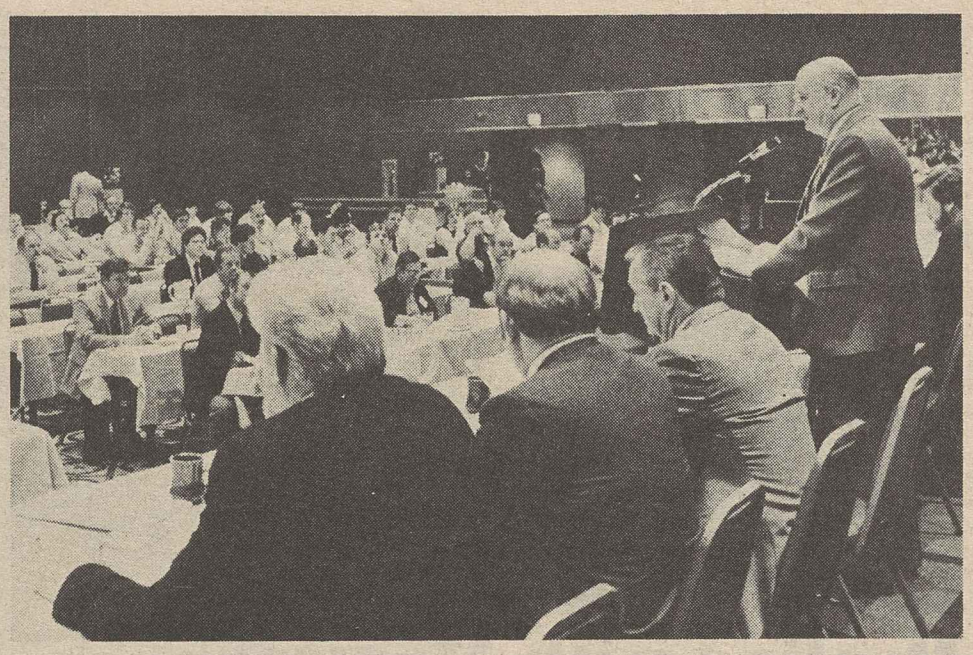
In addition to the New York dockworkers, the ILA represents maritime workers in 35 other ports along the East and Gulf Coasts and in the Great Lakes harbors, eastern Canada, and Puerto Rico.

Agreement on the supplement to the master contract was expected to clear the way for settlement of agreements at other Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports, he said.

Negotiations on both the master and local contracts were delayed last year by a dispute over the handling of containerized cargo. The union had previously negotiated measures to preserve members' jobs in handling the containerized cargo.

ILA members currently are working under an interim contract that has been in effect since Oct. 1.

It had been scheduled to expire Jan. 31 but was extended to Feb. 8 to give other ports enough time to complete local negotiations.



Legislative agenda

Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon outlines IAFF concerns at the union's legislative conference in Washington. Pension-related issues dominated the agenda of the three-day meeting attended by 200 participants. Sessions focused on fringe benefit taxation, right-to-know hazard identification legislation, toxic building materials, federal job reclassifications and death benefits. Meetings were also held with congressional representatives.

OCAW contract at Union Oil ratified after striker's death

Rodeo, Calif.—Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at two Union Oil Co. refineries ratified new two-year agreements, ending a 13-day strike during which one OCAW member was killed and another injured by vehicles running through the picket line at the main gate.

Contracts were ratified on Jan. 30 by OCAW members at the Rodeo and Wilmington, Calif., plants and members were expected to be back on the job by Feb. 3. The agreements match the industry-wide pattern OCAW set in early January in its contract with Gulf Oil Co. Wages will be increased 20 cents per hour the first year and 35 cents per hour the second year with the company contribution to medical insurance going up $15 over the term of the agreement.

Two days after workers struck Union Oil, Gregory T. Goobic, 20, of OCAW Local 1-326, was killed on the picket line when a tank truck driven by a strikebreaker ran him down at the plant gates. The driver, Robert E. Carper of Hanford, Calif., was charged by police with vehicular manslaughter.

Fellow union member Paul Griffith, who was with Goobic at the plant gate, said the truck accelerated as it turned into the main plant gate. "I jumped out of the way. If I had not jumped, I would have been in the same place," he said.

A day earlier, OCAW member John D. Smith suffered a leg injury after being rammed by a security guard's car entering the plant.

In the wake of the injury to Smith, the union's local officers met on Jan. 19 with police and plant officials to get an agreement that all trucks stop in front of the picket line to be informed of the strike before proceeding into the plant. Later that day Goobic was killed.

OCAW members struck the two refineries Jan. 17 after failing to get the company to drop its demand for a two-tier pay system that would cut pay for new hires by as much as 40 percent in some classifications. The company finally dropped this demand.

OCAW is bargaining nationwide to gain new contracts for its members based on the pattern settlement reached with 19 oil companies covering 26,750 of the 50,000 workers OCAW represents in the industry.

About 175 workers are still on strike at Cenex, a small Montana refinery, where last week a vehicle belonging to the local's vice president was blown up.

Senators back phone unions on pensions

A bipartisan effort to salvage pension portability for telephone workers affected by the breakup of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. has support from senators on both sides of a 44-40 vote on the controversial issue of levying a long-distance access fee on every household with a telephone.

The House had passed a labor-supported bill that would have:

- Barred the Federal Communications Commission from putting into effect its plan to make telephone users pay a monthly charge for the ability to make long distance calls, even if they didn't make any toll calls.
- Continued indefinitely the right of workers affected by the court-ordered breakup of AT&T to take their earned pension service credits with them if they transfer from one company to another before having the 10-year service required for vesting. The original court order only gave them that right through 1984.

The Senate was preparing to take up a bill to postpone the access fee plan for two years when the FCC postponed the effective date of its order from April 1984 at least until June 1985.

That move was credited with tilting the Senate majority, resulting in a 44-40 vote against taking up the access bill—in effect rejecting a legislative solution.

Future action

But after the bill was sidetracked, senators from both sides of the aisle and on both sides of the access fee vote took the floor to express support for extending pension portability rights either in separate legislation or through an amendment to some other pending bill.

In other congressional action, the budget deficit built by President Reagan's tax policies set the stage for a surprise. House vote rejecting higher spending authority for the program that funds weatherization of homes of the elderly, handiicapped and poor.

The Administration opposed the bill for a $500 million authorization and got an assist from a bloc of House Democrats fearful of being labeled big spenders.

After some parliamentary confusion, the House voted 233-142 for an amendment by Rep. Thomas Carper (D-Del.) to cut back the authorization to the current level of $200 million. Republicans backed the amendment, 125-18. But the Democrats were against it by a slim 124-108.

Major contract settlements show rising trend

The government's report on collective bargaining in 1983 showed improvement in major settlements over the previous year.

In key contract settlements last year covering 5,000 or more workers, total compensation—wages and benefits—rose by 3.4 percent in first year and by 3 percent a year when averaged over the term of the agreements. The figures compare with 3.2 and 2.8 percent, respectively, in 1982.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which released the figures, also reported that wage settlements in contracts covering 1,000 or more workers provided increases averaging 2.6 percent in the first year and 2.8 percent over the term of the contract. In 1982, the comparable increases were 3.8 and 3.6 percent.

Upward trend

While the figures were down from 1981 increases of 9.8 percent for first-year wages and 7.9 percent annually over the life of the contracts, the trend-line last year showed a definite rise toward larger settlements, culminating in a first-year wage gain of 4.4 percent in contracts negotiated during the fourth quarter.

Heavily weighted concession pacts dominated the first-quarter figures, when the average first-year wage change was a decline of 1.2 percent, the first quarterly drop in wages since BLS began the statistical series in 1968. The pace picked up in the second and third quarters, with first-year wage increases averaging 2.7 and 3.7 percent, respectively.

AFL-CIO Economist John Zalusky noted the decline in wage settlements last year "indicates a movement to benefits rather than wages, and analysis of the quarterly data also shows improvement over the first of this year."

The Labor Dept. released two other sets of figures, one showing employer cost for total worker compensation—wages and benefits—increased 5.7 percent between December 1982 and December 1983 for all workers, and the other reflecting a 3.1-percent increase in worker productivity last year.

The 1983 productivity rise was a big turnaround from 1982's decline of one-tenth of 1 percent, and the biggest gain since 1976.

Factory productivity measured by itself showed the best improvement in two decades. The nation's factories, employing 19 million people, increased their productivity by 6.6 percent in 1983 to show their biggest gain since 1963's 7.2 percent, the government reported.

In its report on employer costs, BLS said total compensation for unionized workers rose 5.8 percent last year. Compensation for non-represented workers increased 5.7 percent.

Because of the two- or three-year contract terms, union wage improvements usually lag behind non-union gains during economic upturns, Zalusky observed. Employment wage costs of union-represented workers increased 4.6 percent last year, compared with 5.2 percent for non-union workers.

Since June 1981, union wages and benefits have risen 2.5 percent more than for non-union workers, reflecting the benefits of union representation even during hard economic times, Zalusky pointed out.

Most got raises

In its report on major settlements last year, BLS said that 37 percent of the workers covered by the pacts took an initial wage freeze or reduction while the remaining 63 percent negotiated pay increases.

Apparently, many of the agreements without first-year wage increases negotiated improvements in the second and third years of the contracts. Over the term of the agreements, 73 percent negotiated increases and those without increases dropped to 27 percent.

"Thus, nearly three-fourths of the workers covered by 1983 settlements will receive wage increases before their contracts expire," BLS said. These increases were negotiated in a variety of industries, including telephone communications, airlines, aerospace and electrical products, glass, and paper manufacturing.

About 460,000 workers last year, mainly in steel, transportation, and construction industries, showed wage cuts averaging 6.7 percent in the first contract year, BLS said.

"Subsequent wage increases will fully restore these cuts for some of these workers, but about 395,000 will have wages reduced an average of 1.7 percent annually over the contract's life," BLS said.

About 2.3 million workers had cost-of-living wage changes averaging 2.1 percent last year, BLS said. Nearly nine out of 10 of these workers received increases averaging 2.4 percent while the remainder had pay cuts due to their COL provision.

During the first quarter of 1984, BLS said, 126 major agreements covering 350,000 workers are due to expire or may be reopened for wage negotiations. These contracts include some 90,000 workers in construction and 26,000 in petroleum refining.

About one million workers are scheduled to receive deferred wage boosts averaging 3.2 percent in the current quarter under contracts negotiated earlier.

Economy threatened

Surging trade deficit takes toll in U.S. jobs

goods. The change in currency valuation has also had the effect of understating the impact of the record trade deficit since the dollar amount does not accurately reflect the increase in volume of goods being imported.

A second big reason for the nation's poor trading performance is the difference in the growth rates between that of the United States and other countries. The U.S. economy is growing much faster than that of other nations, resulting in brisk American purchases but a lag in foreign buys of U.S. goods.

Consulting economist David Ernst said that 1984 is "definitely going to be a disastrous year for U.S. trade," and that the weak trade picture was putting a drag on the overall U.S. economy. Ernst said that last year's deficit cost the nation 1.5 million jobs.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige, who a week earlier had forecast a $90 billion deficit this year, revised his projection upward to $100 billion.

The 1983 trade situation looked bleak all over. The nation posted a record $21 billion deficit with Japan, traditionally the country which contributes the most to the U.S. imbalance. But the United States also ran up a $1.6 billion deficit with the countries of the European Common Market, the first such deficit since 1972.

Last year's red ink reflected a 5.9 percent rise in imports and a 5.5 percent drop in exports. Imports totaled $269.9 billion while exports amounted to $200.5 billion.

The import figures reflected sizable increases in various manufactured goods, including new automobiles, office machines and automatic data processing equipment, telecommunications equipment, electrical machinery and clothing, and moderate increases in some agricultural commodities, the Commerce Dept. said.

The 1983 export figures reflected large declines in manufactured goods, including items in the non-electric machinery, iron and steel, and chemicals categories, bituminous coal, and farm products.

Trade with Japan and Canada accounted for about 36 percent of total imports and about 30 percent of total exports, the government said.

A 14.6 percent drop in petroleum imports reflected a decline in the average number of barrels imported daily to 4.5 million in December from 5.5 million in November, and a slight drop in the average per-barrel price to $29.37 from $29.47.

For December alone, the overall trade deficit narrowed to $6.3 billion from November's $7.4 billion. Analysts attributed the improvement to the dip in oil imports and a surge in aircraft sales.

In Congress, lawmakers attacked a proposed federal regulation freeing shipmakers from the so-called "50-percent rule" requirement for U.S. ships as harmful to American workers.

Policy retreat

Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.) called the proposal a "retreat" from long-held "Buy American" requirements. He said the U.S. Coast Guard was moving to modify the 50-percent rule in a way that would eliminate engines and other mechanical components from the "Made in America" requirement.

In a letter to the Coast Guard, Aspin said that "as long as American firms produce quality products, the government should not damage their business and destroy American jobs." He cited Fairbanks Morse of Beloit, Wis., which is now under contract to build engines for Navy tankers, as one company that could continue to grow under the existing 50-percent rule.

In the DRI study, statistics on the importation of manufactured goods showed a mounting impact on American industry and jobs.

In 1965, some 4.3 percent of manufactured goods in the economy were supplied from abroad, the study observed. By 1980, the figure had risen to 13.5 percent, and "virtually every industry suffered from a major worsening of import penetration," DRI said.

E. R. McKinney dies, union organizer, writer

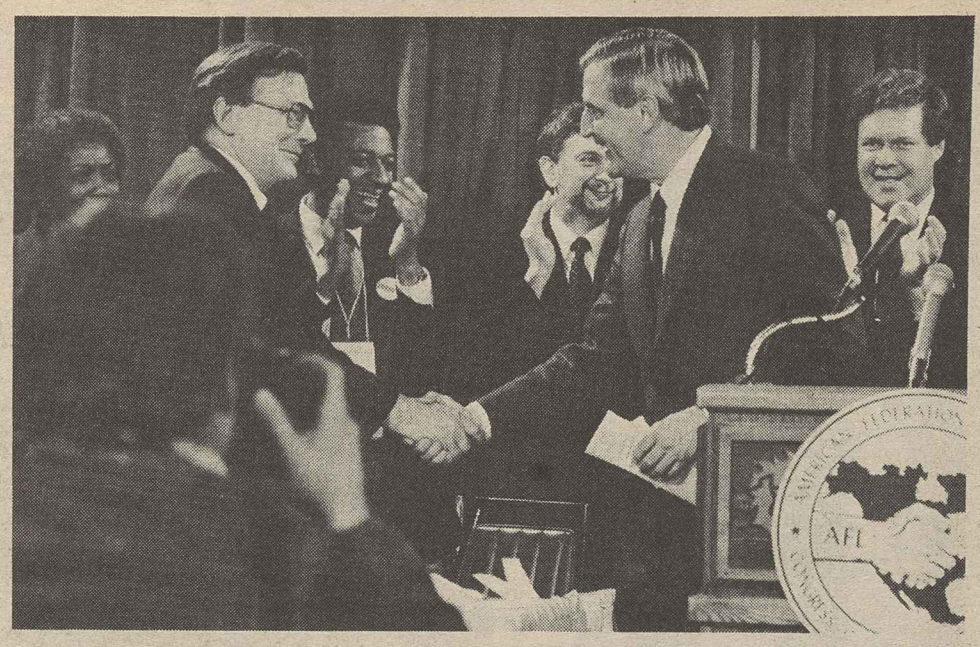
New York—Ernest Rice McKinney, an adviser to the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund, died at St. Vincent's Hospital here at age 97.

Throughout his life, McKinney was a union organizer, writer and educator. During the 1920s, he helped Sleeping Car Porters President A. Philip Randolph organize Pullman car porters. McKinney was editor of the Pittsburgh Courier and also contributed articles to the Messenger magazine, edited by Randolph.

In 1936, McKinney became an organizer for the CIO, assigned to the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee in Youngstown, Ohio. In 1940, he organized sharecroppers and cotton pickers in Missouri.

McKinney joined the Randolph Institute's educational fund in 1972 as a special assistant to APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin. During his career, he also wrote on the history of black workers in the trade union movement, and taught labor history at Rutgers University.

A memorial service will be held Feb. 28 at 4 p.m. at the Community Church of New York, 40 East 35th St.



Lane Kirkland welcomes Walter Mondale to Seattle conference.

Mondale keynote highlights first regional conference

Seattle — Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale brought union members to their feet cheering at a labor rally here that highlighted the first of a series of seven AFL-CIO regional conferences.

Mondale, who has the AFL-CIO's endorsement in his quest for the Democratic Party nomination, lashed out at the Reagan Administration for having fostered "hostility to the legitimate rights of working men and women . . . an attitude in this country where many employers are using King Kong tactics to force Hong Kong wages."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland introduced Mondale at the rally, which drew an overflow crowd of union members.

Joining with the Seattle-area workers were union activists from eight states, who had taken part in a round of workshops that focused on labor's election-year role.

Topics they had covered included nuts-and-bolts techniques of reaching union members with labor's get-out-the-vote message, the political outlook in the states represented and procedures for delegate selection.

Other conference workshops dealt with organizing, national legislation and AFL-CIO headquarters operations.

Taking part in the Seattle workshops were local union leaders from the states of Washington, Hawaii, Alaska, Oregon, Montana, Wyoming, Nevada and California.

The pattern of workshops and rallies was being repeated in Boston Feb. 3 and 4, with participants from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, Rhode Island, Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

Iowa next

After that, participants from a seven-state region will be taking part in a Feb. 10-11 program in Des Moines, Iowa. Four other regional meetings will be held during March and April.

In Seattle, two busloads of workshop participants joined Kirkland on a picket line at the airport to demonstrate solidarity with striking Continental Airlines pilots, machinists and flight attendants.

The event focused public attention on Continental's abuse of the bankruptcy law to tear up collective bargaining agreements with the two AFL-CIO unions representing its employees.

Similar demonstrations were held in Chicago, Denver, New York and Washington, D.C. Labor's boycott will continue until Continental "decides to negotiate fairly," Kirkland said.

"This is no one-shot affair," he declared.

Senate urged to kill zero tariff system

A bill to renew the President's authority to allow the duty-free importation of certain products from developing countries was denounced by the AFL-CIO as "contrary to the interests of American workers."

The Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) under which the duties are eliminated has not fulfilled its goals and represents a "prime example of misguided government policies and practices" in the area of international trade and investment, Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan told the Senate Subcommittee on International Trade.

"We believe the system should not be renewed," said Koplan, in testimony on an Administration bill introduced in the Senate by Sen. John Danforth (R-Mo.).

"In the more than nine years of its existence, GSP has provided pitifully little benefit to the majority of the less developed countries, and has contributed to the deterioration of U.S. industries and unemployment."

Koplan was accompanied by Mark Anderson, an economist in the federation's Dept. of Economic Research.

The GSP program was enacted in 1975 for a period of 10 years in response to a recommendation of the UN Conference on Trade & Development for aid to Third World countries from the world's major industrial nations. Its purpose was to help developing countries diversify their exports and increase their rate of economic growth.

Koplan noted that at present the GSP program grants special zero tariffs to some 3,000 categories of products imported from 140 countries and territories. Between 1976 and 1982, he said, the value of such imports rose from $3 billion to $8.5 billion and accounts for 4.9 percent of all U.S. non-petroleum imports.

GSP imports are heavily concentrated in industrial sectors such as minerals and metal products, machinery and equipment, and miscellaneous products—the very industries that are among America's most endangered and already suffering high levels of unemployment, Koplan observed.

Despite restrictions in the 1974 Trade Act on "import-sensitive articles" such as textiles and apparel, electronic articles, steel products, footwear, and glass, the GSP list of eligibles continues to allow a wide array of goods to enter the United States duty free, he said.

"We see no justification at a time when America is experiencing high levels of unemployment to allow GSP duty-free treatment for this kind of overseas production," Koplan said.

He noted that Taiwan, South Korea, and Hong Kong together accounted for almost half of all GSP imports last year, and the top 15 beneficiary developing countries accounted for 88 percent.

Marginal help

"The intended beneficiaries of GSP have not, in any real way, been helped," Koplan observed. "It is obvious that for the remaining 125 countries the benefits of GSP are marginal at best."

Koplan said it is hard to justify GSP benefits for Hong Kong, Taiwan, and South Korea. The U.S. trade deficit with the three countries topped $10 billion in 1982 and was heading considerably higher in 1983, he pointed out.

"It seems that these three countries crowd out less developed countries from GSP eligible product sales while contributing at the same time to the decline of U.S. industry," Koplan observed.

At the very least, if Congress does renew the GSP program, it should enact strong provisions concerning human and trade union rights, he said, declaring:

"A country should not be designated as a beneficiary developing country where these basic rights are restricted or denied."

ILGWU asks broad industrial policy

A national industrial policy must deal with the loss of jobs in labor-intensive industries as well as the shutdown of large capital-intensive plants, Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin urged at House hearings.

The shutdown of a garment shop employing 40 people understandably doesn't get the media attention given to the closing of an industrial plant with 10,000 workers, Chaikin noted. Yet the losses add up, he emphasized in testimony to the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization.

While technological lag may be a factor in capital-intensive industries, the loss of some 700,000 garment industry jobs is the direct result of wage differentials, Chaikin declared.

U.S. garment workers are among the lowest-paid in manufacturing but they can't and shouldn't have to meet "the wages of poverty of third-world countries," he insisted.

In this case, he urged, industrial policy must focus on trade solutions based on "market-sharing on a global basis."

Such a policy "would assist developing countries," Chaikin contended, while recognizing that "the primary obligation of any nation is its own people—a fact that is recognized by every nation in the world except our own."

ILO mining parley affirms basic rights of trade unionists

Geneva — Employer and government delegates joined trade unionists at a 22-nation International Labor Organization conference in affirming the importance of freedom of association and collective bargaining for the "promotion of good industrial relations" in the mining industry.

The unanimous recognition that trade union rights are a "basic prerequisite for the smooth functioning of any industrial relations system" was hailed by the worker members of the U.S. delegation as a key development at the ten-day session.

Lawrence L. Dugan, Jr., vice president of the Operating Engineers, and Frank X. Lunney, international affairs director of the Steelworkers, formed the AFL-CIO team at the conference that dealt with all mines except coal. A separate ILO industrial committee deals with coal mines.

Dugan commented that the mining session proved to be an "eye-opener" because of what he said was "the more enlightened attitude shown by the employer delegates toward the workers than that which we find among employers in our own country."

Lunney welcomed the employers' recognition of their obligation under the ILO's constitution and conventions, which are international treaties, that "workers have the right to organize, to be free of all pressure, to bargain collectively and to strike."

The agreements on the rights of workers were spelled out in the conclusions drafted by a subcommittee on which Lunney spoke for the worker delegates.

Unanimously adopted by the conference itself, the accords included what Lunney termed the "particularly significant" recommendation that governments refrain from interfering in the collective bargaining process between workers and employers.

The conclusions on workers' rights and those reached by a second subcommittee, also approved unanimously by the conference, were forwarded to the ILO Governing Body for follow-up action.

Dugan, who served on the health and safety subcommittee, said that "everyone came out of this meeting in very good shape."

"I am hopeful," he said, "that workers the world over will derive a lot of benefit from it eventually."

The conference noted that progress had been achieved in the prevention of occupational hazards and diseases, but it warned that "numerous problems remain." These require action at the local, national and international levels to "ensure the protection of the life and health of workers," it said.

Union officials named to benefit plan posts

New Orleans—Frank Parker, secretary-treasurer emeritus of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, was elected president and board chairman of the International Foundation of Employee Benefit Plans.

Elected treasurer was John E. Boyd, a vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers who is also secretary-treasurer and chief executive officer of UFCW Local 546 in Chicago.

Newly elected board directors include Graphic Communications Union Vice President John M. Greer and L. Rex Brasell, business manager of Plumbers & Pipefitters Local 412 in Albuquerque, N.M.

Coalition urges ban

Labor presses drive to outlaw use of EDB

By Arlee C. Green

The AFL-CIO, along with environmental and consumer groups, is pressing the Environmental Protection Agency to ban the sale and use of ethylene dibromide (EDB) a cancer-causing chemical that has been detected in food products made from grain.

The AFL-CIO was joined by the Natural Resources Defense Council, Consumers Union, and the California Agrarian Action Project, in urging EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus to act promptly on the ban. The coalition stressed that EPA's "duty is clear" and that permitting residues of the chemical to remain in food with the approval of the federal government would be both "unprecedented and illegal."

EDB is a highly toxic pesticide which has been used as a fumigant on certain fruits, nuts and grains, as well as a spot fumigant on grain and flour milling machinery. The federal government has known since 1974 that EDB is a carcinogen and it later found it to be a mutagen, causing a variety of reproductive problems.

Industry impact

In 1980, EPA was set to ban the use of the chemical, but after a series of meetings with industry officials, during the first year of the Reagan Administration, all action on banning the carcinogen ceased. After EDB was found in a variety of grain processed food products and in the water supplies in Florida, the EPA acted to ban only EDB's use as a soil fumigant.

The AFL-CIO letter to Ruckelshaus outlined a plan for "effectively and expeditiously (acting) to both regain the public trust and protect its health in this emergency."

Besides the ban on the sale of EDB and the use of current stockpiles, the letter recommended:

- Instituting a comprehensive testing program of both raw agricultural and grain products and of finished foods to determine the presence of EDB residues in all applicable products.
- Rescinding immediately the 1956 exemption granted for EDB from the federal residue tolerance requirements and establishing levels for EDB in grain, citrus and other products.
- Immediately rescinding the tolerance level of 1 part per billion set on Mar. 31, 1981, for EDB in soybeans. (An internal agency memo reportedly questioned this level as being too high, as soybean extract is used in infant formulas.)
- Investigating and reporting to the public why the 1956 exemption for EDB was left in effect even though the EPA had known since February 1981 that EDB residues were showing up in food, and why it took the agency 10 years to adopt a final regulatory position on this "dangerous chemical."

Last September, the agency suspended EDB's use as a soil fumigant for agricultural crops. The cancellation also covered EDB's use on grain and grain milling machinery, and it phased in a cessation of the chemical's use on citrus.

Citrus growers, EDB manufacturers and the Dept. of Agriculture have challenged the EPA orders in court.

Added foot-dragging

Under Reagan, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration also has been accused of foot-dragging on EDB. After two years of prodding, it only recently proposed protection for workers exposed to the chemical, and then just before a congressional hearing into the agency's inaction. In 1981, the AFL-CIO and the unaffiliated Teamsters petitioned OSHA for an emergency standard to protect workers. The agency denied the petition.

The AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., representing some 45,000 grain elevator and mill workers, has also pressed EPA to take action. FAST President Robert F. Harbrant recently met with Ruckelshaus and received assurances the agency would act soon.

Industry representatives who had met with Ruckelshaus and other government officials earlier in January concluded "that a suspension was only a remote possibility," according to the United Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Association's newsletter.

A recent food association study of EDB reported measuring residues as high as 26,000 parts per billion on corn coming into a mill. This contrasts with actions by Florida to remove from grocery shelves food products with levels above 1 ppb.

Human guinea pigs

FAST safety specialist Deborah Berkowitz testified at a House subcommittee oversight hearing on toxic substances that "the grain elevator and mill workers we represent are the true guinea pigs of the use of EDB in the food industry. For they are the people who must grade grain by sticking their noses into samples of fumigated grain to smell for mold . . . and they are the workers who can smell EDB for days in their workplaces following machinery fumigation — though the odor threshold for EDB is estimated to be 100 to 200 times higher than recommended safe levels."

At that hearing, EPA Assistant Administrator John Moore, questioned about why the agency had failed to take action on the pesticide, replied: "I honestly don't know."

Staying the Course

AN EARLIER Congress, which took office at the start of the Reagan presidency, launched this nation on a disastrous economic course by taking the President's budget proposals seriously and passing his program almost intact.

The result was a witches' brew of extravagent tax cuts for the wealthy, sharp reductions in programs which helped the poor, and a rapid escalation of defense spending without provisions to pay the cost.

Congress was told in Mr. Reagan's first budget message that, by some mysterious alchemy, this was to lead to a balanced budget by the year 1984.

Instead, of course, we had the most devastating recession in 50 years and a succession of deficits that have come close to $200 billion a year.

By the President's account, the country is now in the midst of a booming recovery—what he terms "a new springtime of hope for America," even though unemployment is projected to remain above its pre-Reagan level.

Still the deficits continue. And the arithmetic of the budget projects high deficits year after year.

MAYBE AFTER his re-election, we should do something about it, Mr. Reagan's budget message suggests. But meanwhile, the President insists, please don't tamper with his tax relief for the rich.

David Stockman, the director of the Office of Management & Budget, spoke much more frankly at a press briefing the other day.

Next year, he said, "there are going to be some tough bullets to bite," suggesting the inevitability of some sort of rollback in the deficit-breeding round of tax cuts.

But it wouldn't make political sense, Stockman suggested, for the Administration to tell the American people how it intended to deal with the deficit. That would be foolhardy in an election year.

By sending a budget to Capitol Hill, President Reagan has complied with the technical requirements of the law. But has he really complied with its spirit?

The fact remains that the President chose to duck the hard decisions and ignore an economy-threatening deficit in order to mouth platitudes in a re-election campaign.

That's just plain irresponsible.

An earlier Congress acted irresponsibly by giving Mr. Reagan what he asked for. This Congress can at least make a start toward undoing the damage.

Dealing from the Bottom

WE ARE HERE to express the solidarity of the entire American labor movement with our brothers and sisters who are the victims of calculated cruelty and treachery by their employer, Continental Airlines.

This is a company that deals from the bottom of the deck.

This is a company that says, "We won't keep our word. We won't honor our agreements."

The Air Line Pilots and the Machinists have the support of every union in the AFL-CIO and those of our brother and sister trade unionists in all of the nations of the free world, wherever Continental flies.

That support will continue, and it will grow and intensify, until Continental learns that business does not prosper on greed alone, and decides to negotiate fairly with the unions representing its employees.

This is a fight for airline safety, for ethical business practices and justice and decency toward the public, as well as toward workers.

—From remarks by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the Seattle airport, Jan. 27, 1984.

Hunger abounds in U.S. despite Reagan cover-up

By Press Associates, Inc.

President Reagan was "perplexed" about reports of hunger in America. So he stacked a commission to look into the situation and to no one's surprise, the panel reported it was unable to document "rampant" hunger.

One must wonder where the panel looked because Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) had no trouble finding widespread hunger problems during field hearings in five areas around the nation. From the mouths of hunger victims, this is a sample of what he heard:

• Ron Hegedus, a laid-off Steelworker in Pittsburgh, supports himself and his four children on $180 weekly in jobless benefits and $79 monthly in food stamp benefits. He fell behind on his mortgage payments and faces losing his house. He has trouble buying enough food for his children and relies on the Steelworkers Unemployed Charitable Trust for extra food.

• Michael Kelly, a 17-year Marine Corp veteran in Oakland, Calif., lost his job as an X-ray technician in 1982. Since then, he has lived on the street and "underneath the freeway."

Growing food lines

Unable to find work, Kelly said, "I started eating at the Salvation Army in Oakland about a year ago and the lines were fairly small . . . now they are longer and longer. Some days they're two blocks long."

• Ruth Rice, 67, receives $365 a month in Social Security benefits and pays $225 a month in rent on an efficiency in Minneapolis. Last year, she ate only one meal a day and was subsequently hospitalized with nutrition-related health problems. She now eats dinner four nights a week in a local church soup kitchen. "Not in my whole life did I think I would be like this," said Rice.

• Leroy Madison is unemployed after six years of work in a southeastern Kentucky coal mine. He works off his $50 monthly rent by doing odd jobs for his landlord, and the family's only income is $100 a month in food stamps, which he says runs out after three weeks. His pregnant wife receives only sporadic prenatal treatment at a clinic and, with no medical insurance, they don't know how they will pay for the delivery.

• Charles Davis of Detroit was laid off from Chrysler in 1979 and his wife also is unemployed. Their total monthly income is $70 in food stamps. "I've been living in the state of Michigan since 1947 and I have never in my life seen such a damn mess. . . . People going hungry, people on the streets standing in food lines," he said.

These personal stories were multiplied by hundreds of thousands in the testimony of those who run emergency food and shelter programs and who work in pediatric clinics and with the elderly.

Barbara Freyenberger, head pediatric nurse in the Hazard, Ky., Appalachian Hospital, reported an increasing number of infants failing to thrive, so underweight that they "look like tired little old men."

Dr. Silas Norman of the Detroit Receiving Hospital, which serves a large number of poor in the city, described his patients: "A family of three sitting in the examination room . . . seriously discussing whether or not they will have cereal or hot dogs and beans for dinner . . . each of them ill."

Emergency food programs in the five areas reported increases in requests for help ranging from 75 to 400 percent over the last three years. And those working in the programs consistently reported a massive influx of the "new poor"—intact families whose providers were employed and financially stable before the Reagan Recession.

All the expert witnesses linked hunger and nutrition-related health problems to the Reagan Recession, with its soaring unemployment and simultaneous cuts in federal nutrition and other programs for the needy.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Not To Be Believed

The State of the Union Speech: There He Goes Again!

President Reagan told a joint session of Congress that the state of the union is great, and getting better all the time. No doubt that's true in the circles he travels in. But for those who have been paying the price of Reaganomics (including the 4.2 million people who lost their jobs during the Reagan recession), Reagan presented a distorted picture of the state of the union.

Below are quotes from the President's speech, with notations that point out inaccuracies and misstatements.

Once again, in keeping with time-honored tradition, I have come to report to you on the state of the Union. I am pleased to report that America is much improved

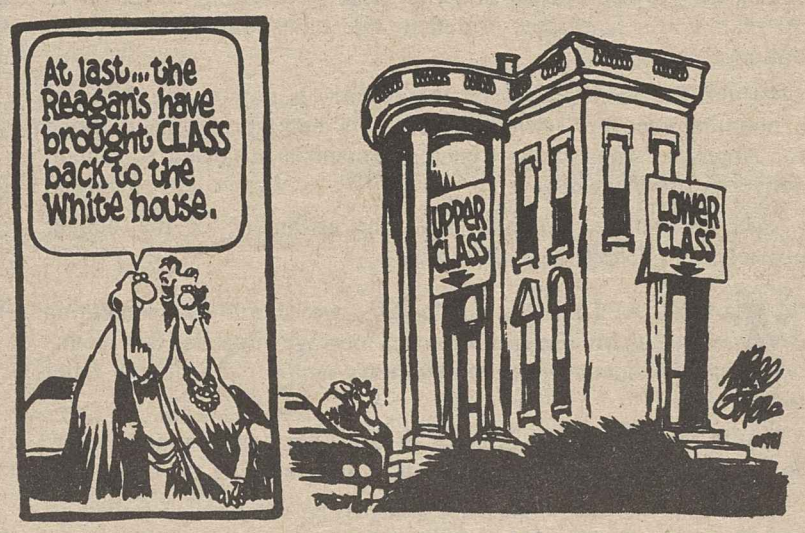
UNEMPLOYMENT:
pre-Reagan: 7.0%
December 1982: 10.8%
December 1983: 8.2%
This is improvement?

Americans were ready to make a new beginning, and together we have done it. We are confronting our problems one by one.

Not so. Reagan did not "confront" the recession; he let it linger for 18 months, and threatened to veto jobs legislation.

Today, a working family earning $25,000 has $1,100 more in purchasing power than if tax and inflation rates were still at 1980 levels. Real after-tax income increased 5 percent last year.

Wrong again. In constant dollars, average weekly earnings have dropped since 1980. And Reagan's 5% increase fails to account for state and local tax hikes caused by his slashing of aid to the states.



--Mike Peters, Dayton Daily News

And economic deregulation of key industries like transportation has offered more choices to consumers and new chances for entrepreneurs and protecting safety.

Deregulation also means job losses, higher fares.
"Chances" for safety?
23% fewer aviation inspectors under Reagan cuts. Continental was flying a jet with a cracked fuselage.
And air traffic controller error nearly caused a mid-air collision of two PanAm jumbo jets. See Jan. 30 Newsweek.

In 1983, women filled 73 percent of all new jobs in managerial, professional and technical fields.

Reagan overstates women's advances. Many of the "managerial + professional" jobs are in teaching and nursing, where women have traditionally outnumbered men. "Technical" fields include low-paid sales clerk + office positions; median income $287 per week.

But we know many of our fellow countrymen are still out of work, wondering what will come of their hopes and dreams. Can we love America and not reach out to tell them: you are not forgotten;

But the fact is: Reagan has threatened to veto jobs bills, health care for the jobless, and mortgage foreclosure relief.
And because of Reagan trade policies, in 1983 imports to the U.S. were $69 billion greater than exports, causing loss of millions of jobs.

Simple fairness dictates government must not raise taxes on families struggling to pay their bills.

So why has Reagan asked Congress for new taxes on your health care benefits?

I will continue to press for tuition tax credits to expand opportunities for families

--for families who can afford private schools.
Public education has suffered a 20% budget cut under Reagan.
Subsidizing private schools with tuition tax credits would undermine public schools.

Fear is expressed that government borrowing to fund the deficit could inhibit the economic recovery by taking capital needed for business and industrial expansion.

DEFICITS:
Carter average: $48 billion per year
Ford average: $56 billion per year
Reagan: $111 billion in FY 1982
$195 billion in FY 1983
--New Reagan budget projects $180 billion deficits through 1987.
Reagan's election-year economic recovery is being paid for with money borrowed against the future.

Help us to free enterprise by permitting debate and voting "yes" on our proposal for enterprise zones in America.

"Enterprise zones" plan would give corporations more tax cuts. Would not create new jobs but only rearrange unemployment.

In the budget I will submit on Feb. 1, I will recommend measures that will reduce the deficit over the next five years.

Here's how the Reagan budget would cut the deficit:
—NOT by reversing the tax cuts for the wealthy that caused the big deficits;
—Instead, Reagan wants to cut the pensions of federal civilian + military retirees by $700 million.
—Also tax your health insurance.
—And increase patients' fees for Medicare.

We will carry on the tradition of a good and worthy people who have brought light where there was darkness, warmth where there was cold, medicines where there was disease, food where there was hunger and peace where there was only bloodshed.

Reagan has cut school programs and college loans + grants by 20%
Reagan speeded oil price decontrol, costing consumers $12 billion. Low-income fuel assistance program was cut.
School lunch program cut 29%.
We're crossing our fingers.
Medicaid cut by $1 billion. Local health screening, immunization: veto threat.

REAGAN'S LEGISLATIVE PRESCRIPTION: YOU PAY MORE IN 1984
—(and just wait 'til '85!)

There's no free lunch. Welfare for the rich has a price--and under President Reagan's proposals to Congress, you would pay:

• NEW TAXES ON YOUR HEALTH INSURANCE -- The President says he opposes new taxes, but makes an exception for working people. Insurance premiums paid by your employer above $70/month for individuals or $175/month for family coverage would be considered taxable income on your return. About 30 million people would face higher taxes or reduced benefits.

• TAX OVERHAUL: MORE BREAKS FOR THE RICH -- President Reagan has asked his Treasury Secretary for a report (to be delivered after the 1984 election) on various ways to overhaul the federal tax code. Ideas mentioned by Treasury officials include:

--The flat tax. All would pay the same tax rate, millionaires and low-wage workers. This would cause a major shift in the tax burden from the rich to middle-and low-income taxpayers, a Treasury official admits. That's why it's a Reagan favorite.

--The value-added tax (VAT), basically a national sales tax. Those who spend their income on the necessities of life would pay the most.

--The consumed-income tax, which the Administration says would encourage savings because only income that is spent would be taxable. Again, those who spend most of their small incomes on necessities would be taxed the most.

• HIGHER ENERGY BILLS -- One of President Reagan's first executive orders was to speed oil price decontrol. This cost consumers billions of dollars. Reagan also favors natural gas decontrol, but he cannot do this without Congressional approval. If Reagan gets his way, your gas bills could jump by 67 percent.

• HIGHER TELEPHONE BILLS -- The Reagan Administration lobbied in favor of telephone "access" charges -- fees of up to $10 per month by 1990 for access to long-distance lines. These charges have been postponed but not prohibited.

President Reagan says his program helps everyone. But it didn't help the millions of workers who were laid off during the Reagan recession. And even those who managed to keep their jobs have suffered a decline in wages, adjusted for inflation, since 1980.

Labor Dept. double standard aids union-busters

By David L. Perlman

The Labor Dept. isn't enforcing the reporting and disclosure requirements of the Landrum-Griffin Act against union-busting consultants and the employers who hire them.

In testimony before the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, union organizers and attorneys told of a pervasive pattern of government indifference to flagrant management violations of Landrum-Griffin reporting requirements.

The law requires reports from persons hired by employers to "persuade" workers on the issue of union representation or to supply an employer with information about union activities in the workplace. But under the Reagan Administration, the subcommittee was told, the requirement is rarely enforced.

By contrast, the labor representatives testified, unions are being held to strict account and scofflaw management consultants regularly use detailed financial reports required of labor organizations as ammunition in organizing campaigns.

Enforcement decline

A report prepared by the subcommittee staff documented the massive switch in Labor Dept. emphasis and resources after the change of administrations. It revealed a sharp dropoff in enforcement actions against management coupled with greatly expanded investigations and audits of unions. (Story, Page 3.)

Subcommittee Chairman William L. Clay (D-Mo.) said the report clearly showed selective enforcement of federal labor law by the Administration. He charged that the Labor Dept.'s enforcement policy undermines the "even-handed" approach intended by Congress.

Charles McDonald, who edits the AFL-CIO's periodic Report on Union-Busters, testified to the proliferation of management consultants who sell their expertise at defeating union organizing drives or getting unions decertified. Their activity has contributed to an "incredible increase" in illegal discharges of union supporters, he testified.

A federation survey of 224 organizing campaigns in 1982-83 found that outside consultants were directing management strategy in 70 percent of the cases, McDonald said. He counted as consultants lawyers who serve as "architects" of anti-union campaigns but not those who function merely as legal advisers to employers in dealing with the National Labor Relations Board or interpretations of labor law.

After the election, too

McDonald, who is executive assistant to Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler, told the subcommittee that consultants have also been used to thwart a collective bargaining agreement after workers have voted for union representation.

Kirkland demands emergency curbs on EDB exposure

By Arlee C. Green

The AFL-CIO called for an emergency federal standard to sharply reduce workers' exposure to the toxic pesticide ethylene dibromide (EDB).

Federation President Lane Kirkland pointed out in a message to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan that the current exposure limit for the cancer-causing chemical is 200 times higher than levels now deemed safe for consumers. Kirkland said "that discrepancy must be corrected.'

The AFL-CIO along with its Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. and the Grain Millers petitioned Donovan to have the Occupational Safety & Health Administration issue an emergency standard immediately. OSHA denied a similar petition in 1981.

Banned by EPA

The petitions for OSHA action are keying on the Environmental Protection Agency's Feb. 3 ban on EDB's use on stored grain and on grain milling machinery and its guidelines setting acceptable residue levels.

The federation's petition calls for a reduction in exposure levels to 45 parts of EDB per billion parts of air (45 ppb) over an eight-hour work shift, with a ceiling of 100 ppb for short-term exposures. The current standard allows an exposure level of 20,000 ppb, and OSHA's recently proposed revision set a 100 ppb level.

The federation asked that the emergency standard include work practice controls to assure that no worker is overexposed to EDB and provide for medical surveillance, training and the use of appropriate respirators.

EDB is a highly toxic, colorless, sweet-smelling pesticide which has been used as a fumigant on certain fruits, nuts and grains, as well as a spot fumigant on grain milling machinery. The chemical was proven to be a carcinogen nearly a decade ago and was later found to be mutagen, causing a variety of reproductive problems.

The AFL-CIO also called on OSHA to issue an emergency standard on methyl bromide which has been substituted for EDB in the milling industry. The federation's petition said such a standard should be aimed at "establishing safe work practices so that no worker re-enters a fumigated mill or handles treated citrus until exposure levels are below the current OSHA standard" of 20,000 parts per billion.

An emergency standard "must contain requirements on monitoring, appropriate emergency respiratory protections and a training/education component," the federation stressed. It said methyl bromide can cause chronic damage to the central nervous system and to the kidneys.

Wide use of the chemical in the milling industry and on citrus products will expose over 150,000 workers to this chemical, the petition said. OSHA's current exposure limit alone "will not provide the necessary worker protection to prevent undue risk resulting from the wide usage of exposure to this toxic pesticide."

House ties El Salvador aid to progress on civil rights

The House voted overwhelmingly for a labor-supported bill that would renew a requirement of past law that military aid to El Salvador be conditioned on that nation's progress in improving its human rights record and achieving democratic reforms.

It is identical to a bill that President Reagan had pocket-vetoed after the first session of Congress adjourned last November.

As the House acted, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee along with former Sec. of State Henry Kissinger, who chaired the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America.

Kirkland, who was a member of the commission, testified in support of the recommendations for a five-year program of economic aid for Central America and for military support for El Salvador that would be made contingent on "demonstrated progress" toward basic freedoms, a crackdown on the right-wing death squads and "vigorous action" against those guilty of crimes.

In response to questions, Kirkland told the committee he disagreed with Reagan's veto and "cannot support military aid" that is not conditioned on human rights progress.

"I have not been satisfied with the behavior of the authorities in El Salvador, and have not for the past year supported

Reagan advisers cite deficit dangers

The report of President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers placed the blame for continuing high interest rates and the record U.S. trade imbalance squarely on the Administration's huge federal budget deficits.

The CEA report, a 343-page book that accompanied Reagan's economic message to Congress, brought into focus the sharp differences separating the rosy views of Reagan and his political aides from the more realistic assessment of his top economic advisers.

In his brief economic message to Congress, Reagan said he was "very optimistic about the prospects for the American economy" and that continuation of his policies would lead to "unprecedented prosperity and economic security" for the American people.

In contrast, the CEA report—largely the work of Council Chairman Martin Feldstein—warned that budgets deficits at the projected level of $180 billion a year already are distorting the economy. Even the cost of carrying the deficit—the interest the government pays on its bonds—is cancelling out the savings from federal spending cuts that the Administration has won from Congress since taking office, Feldstein pointed out.

In other areas, the CEA report reflects the frank economic analysis that brought down White House criticism on Feldstein last fall. One table, for example, traces the mounting budget deficits to the huge tax cuts for business and wealthy individuals, pushed through Congress by Reagan in the first year of his term, along with heavy increases for military spending while spending is reduced for non-defense programs.

The CEA called for large reductions in the size of the deficits as soon as possible. Its report noted that Administration projections imply that the budget deficit will remain roughly $200 billion a year for the rest of the decade unless there is legislative action to reduce spending or raise revenue.

"Deficits of that size would represent a serious potential threat to the health of the American economy in the second half

Industrial decline laid to government policies

A study prepared for nine of the nation's largest industrial corporations blames the decline of American manufacturing on U.S. trade policies, an over-valued dollar, high capital costs, and government neglect.

The study by Data Resources, Inc., concludes that the American economy cannot remain strong unless its manufacturing industries are healthy and growing.

The report charges that manufacturing industries have suffered from national economic policies which have been "insensitive to their needs." It also charges that the government "stood idly by" as industries in other countries took advantage of easy entry into the United States.

Economist Otto Eckstein, the principal author of the study, called for steps to reduce the value of the dollar in foreign exchange. He said tax reforms should be made to eliminate a preference for non-industrial investments.

The strongest evidence of an accelerating decline for U.S. manufacturers is the growing international trade deficit, which is expected to approach $100-$110 billion this year at a cost of up to 2 million American jobs.

The report was prepared for American Telephone & Telegraph Co., Bethlehem Steel Corp., Burlington Industries, Inc., E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Eastman Kodak Co., Ford Motor Co., Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., Deere & Co. and Texaco, Inc.

Eckstein, the head of Data Resources, Inc., and a former member of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Johnson, said the study provides the most significant evidence so far that the United States is deindustrializing.

Federal decisions

Tax and regulatory policies have diverted the country's savings from productive industrial investment, and industry has had little voice in critical government decisions on budget deficits, interest rates and exchange rates, the study charged.

"While other nations aggressively promoted the development of their industries, the United States made no serious effort to assure that this worldwide thrust of industrial development would occur in an environment of free trade and competition.

"In its international trade policies, the U.S. government placed our economic interests second to political goals."

The study listed five steps to be taken to promote a healthier development of U.S. manufacturing in the years ahead:

- Reduce the cost of industrial capital. Bring about lower interest rates by controlling federal budget deficits; eliminate or reduce preferential financing of non-industrial investments; provide easier access to long-term debt capital for investment.
- Lower the exchange rate of the dollar to a level more consistent with relative cost positions. "Lower interest rates made possible by a smaller budget deficit would go far to achieve this goal."
- Develop trade policies to open world markets to U.S. goods, particularly in Japan and in newly industralized countries. "The federal government should put a greater emphasis on economic as opposed to political goals."
- Preserve the American lead in high technology industries.
- Establish monetary and fiscal policies to achieve a more stable and sustainable pattern of economic growth.

The report noted that the Reagan Recession accelerated the decline of U.S. manufacturing industries. Production and employment in some industries has shrunk one-third from earlier levels, it pointed out.

Spreading problems

"Resultant unemployment has created profound economic problems for families and communities. A regional disparity in economic opportunities not seen in four decades has developed," the study observed.

"If we follow the path of the last two decades, with an exchange rate that makes our goods noncompetitive, an economy that disrupts industrial capital formation every few years, a cost of industrial capital far higher than Japan's, and industrial trade policies that sacrifice our industries for the benefit of industries of our allies, the outlook for all U.S. industries is clouded, and particularly grim for our older industries."

Bid to lift tariffs for Israel opposed as threat to jobs

The AFL-CIO asked the Senate Finance Committee not to approve an Administration proposal for a tariff-free trade relationship with Israel.

Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan testified to American labor's strong and continuing support for Israel as "the only democratic state in the Middle East and a strategic ally" of the United States.

But he stressed that trade-free zones anywhere in the world threaten jobs of U.S. workers. Too many Americans have already paid with their jobs "for trade and economic policies that have resulted in decreasing exports and an ever-rising flood of imports."

Koplan noted that under international agreement, a free-trade arrangement must cover "substantially all trade" between the parties, thus precluding exemptions for import-sensitive products that have been included in other tariff concessions made by the United States.

Israel already enjoys privileged access to U.S. markets through its participation in the Generalized System of Preferences, Koplan noted. But if restraints on import-sensitive products were listed, the broad variety of Israeli manufactured goods—including such sophisticated products as medical equipment and engine parts—would be competing with U.S. goods in the vast American market. A comparable acceptance of U.S. goods by Israel would necessarily be on a much smaller scale, Koplan noted.

He told the committee that the close relationship of the AFL-CIO with Israel and with its trade union federation, Histadrut, "has made our opposition to a U.S.-Israeli free-trade area particularly difficult."

But an economically weakened United States is not in Israel's interest either, he insisted. An industrially strong America is in "the mutual benefit of the two countries."

UAW opens drive to expose abuses by General Dynamics

The Auto Workers branded General Dynamics Corp. the nation's "premier symbol of the arrogance of corporate power" and pledged to "shake the corporate empire" of the huge defense contractor with a nationwide publicity effort to expose its "greed and abuse."

UAW President Owen Bieber told reporters at a Washington news conference that the union will mount a campaign to make public the company's "failure to comply with accepted principles of law, justice and common decency" and to expose its "anti-labor and anti-taxpayer behavior."

Bieber charged the company with "grossly irresponsible conduct" during the long strike at its Electric Boat Division in Groton, Conn., with "needless endangerment" of workers' lives at its facilities, and with "massive ripoffs" of taxpayers in its defense contracting practices.

He said the UAW's program to expose the St. Louis-based company's "pattern of abuses" and "lawlessness" will be modeled on the campaign organized by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and a group of affiliates to call public attention to anti-labor policies of Litton Industries, Inc., also a major defense contractor. That effort led to formation of a joint labor-management panel to explore the union charges.

Bieber said the 2,200 draftsmen, designers and technical workers on strike at Electric Boat since June 9 had been willing to head off a walkout by accepting terms of a three-year agreement proposed earlier by the company. The settlement would have provided only cost-of-living adjustments.

But management rejected the offer and provoked the walkout by the members of Local 571, and has refused to accept the union's proposal to submit the dispute to binding arbitration, Bieber explained.

He said Electric Boat has hired about 300 strikebreakers to work in the facility "at premium rates," and he pointed to statements by a company official indicating that the firm is unconcerned about extra costs because it can pass on the charges to the federal government as "material" on a cost-plus basis.

Bieber charged that Electric Boat "could be reaping a small bonanza at the taxpayers' expense by prolonging the walkout." Electric Boat builds submarines under a contract with the Navy.

The UAW also charged General Dynamics with "gouging" in such practices as charging the Air Force $9,600 apiece for Allen wrenches worth about 12 cents and billing for three-inch pieces of wire, worth less than 3 cents, at $7,417.

The UAW president also sharply critisized the company's safety and health record, pointing out that two worker deaths at General Dynamics facilities in the past year could both have been avoided.

White-collar unions in merger talks

Merger talks are set to start this month between the 135,000-member Office & Professional Employees and the 30,000-member Professional & Technical Engineers.

OPEIU President John Kelly and IFPTE President Rodney A. Bower said in a joint statement that the unions are being brought together not only by a "similar history," but also by "the overwhelming need to organize the unorganized white-collar sector."

The unions announced plans to start formal merger talks following a meeting with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. Informal discussions had been going on for several years, and their success led to the decision to begin a formal merger process, they said. The executive boards of both organizations voted to go ahead with the talks.

Bower and Kelly said the first meeting in late February will be used to map an agenda for future action.

They observed that if merger occurs it will create "the largest white collar union in the United States and Canada."

In their statement, the union presidents called the burgeoning white-collar workforce "a new frontier for organized labor." Changing technology, and other social and economic factors, have led to a "sizable" continuing increase in the number of white-collar workers in both the United States and Canada, they stressed.

Meany award for scouting honors 800 in first decade

The AFL-CIO's George Meany Award for Voluntary Service in Scouting has been presented to more than 800 labor volunteers since its inception a decade ago.

Labor's highest recognition for union members' service to youth through the Boy Scouts of America recently received a $3,000 boost from a joint contribution by the AFL-CIO, the Carpenters and the Electrical Workers.

Union members are eligible for the Meany award upon recommendation of their local or state central body. The criteria include the extent to which the candidate has worked to bring scouting to youth in the community, the assistance provided in recruiting scoutmasters and other key volunteers from the labor movement, and other scouting contributions.

Robert F. Harbrant, chairman of the national labor advisory committee to the BSA and president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., said George Meany's love of country "is symbolized in this recognition given to those union members who exemplify his devotion to America's greatness."

Presented annually, only one award is allowed for each local or state labor council. The central body makes the final selection and submits the name to the local scouting council for verification of membership as a registered Scouter.

Continuing efforts hailed for merger of printing unions

Preliminary discussions on the prospects for merger of the Graphic Communications International Union and the International Typographical Union drew the praise of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who expressed the hope that more detailed talks will be forthcoming.

In a letter to GCIU President Kenneth J. Brown, Kirkland said the September deadline suggested by Brown for a merger agreement is "reasonable and encouraging" as it would permit conventions of both unions to act on the proposal in 1984.

Kirkland noted that the GCIU board already has given unanimous approval to the AFL-CIO proposal for a single union in the printing and publishing industry.

"It is clear," he said, "that the future interests of workers in the graphic communications industry would be best served by a single union. For too long, the employers in publishing and printing have been able to split the labor movement and weaken our attempts to improve working conditions and benefits."

Double standard permits management consultants to defy disclosure rules

Polly Connelly, organizing coordinator for four regions of the Auto Workers, detailed a series of campaigns in which employers using consultants were found by the NLRB to have been guilty of widespread unfair labor practices. But despite repeated prodding from the UAW, she said, the Labor Dept. refused to compel the offenders to file disclosure reports.

One such case involved the role of a consultant firm in what an NLRB administrative law judge termed the "virulent hostility to unionization" at the Japanese-owned Kawasaki motorcycle plant in Lincoln, Neb.

Connelly said a field investigation by the regional office of the Labor-Management Services Administration found seven instances of reportable conduct by the law firm. But after the change of administration, the Labor Dept. concluded there was no cause for action. A federal judge ruled last December in response to a UAW suit that the Secretary of Labor has "absolute discretion" over enforcement of the law. The union is appealing the decision.

Connelly found it "ironic" that while Kawasaki and its consultants were refusing to file disclosure reports, "they went to the Dept. of Labor and received copies of reports the UAW had filed and used them in the campaign. . . . I simply don't understand why we have to file these reports but employers or their consultants do not."

Still no action

In another case, an NLRB judge's decision in 1981 specifically cited both the Formaloy Corp. at Peoria, Ill., and its hired consultant for serious unfair labor practices, Connelly testified. The union prodded the Labor Dept. on the lack of employer or consultant reports. While the department "finally opened a case file in September 1983, it has done little else in response to our complaint."

Connelly noted that the president of Formaloy, James Thomson, has been appointed by President Reagan to a post with the Small Business Administration and his wife also received a presidential appointment.

Melinda Branscomb, an attorney for the Paperworkers, testified to the runaround she got in trying to find out why an Evansville, Ind., hospital and the consultants it had hired to combat the union's organizing drive, had not filed disclosure reports.

Last April, she said, the union asked the Labor Dept.'s regional office in Chicago to investigate the failure to file. If anything has ever been done, she is not aware of it. In repeated follow-up queries, Branscomb said, "the department gave me eight different reasons for not enforcing the law against companies and company consultants" including the assertion that it was "national policy" to step up investigations of unions and spend less time investigating management violations.

Attorney James I. Singer and Robert Miller, the business agent of Local 1 of the Electrical Workers in St. Louis, detailed a two-year effort to compel the filing of a report from a management consultant firm that—according to an employer report—was retained "to foster an environment whereby the employees would no longer feel they needed a union." The consultant firm also prepared a decertification petition and advised employees as to the procedures for filing it, the employer acknowledged.

Prods Labor Dept.

Again, the union's prodding has brought no action by the Labor Dept. to achieve compliance.

Con O'Shea, special representative of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and a vice president of the Plasterers, testified to his experiences in trying to compel reporting by a California labor relations consultant whose anti-union role in the construction industry was well documented.

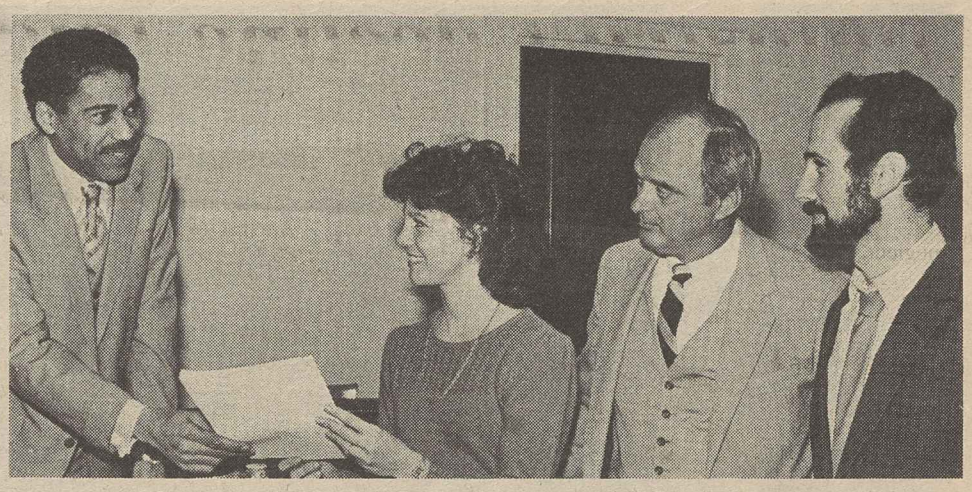
O'Shea and building trades attorneys began the effort to get the Labor Dept. to enforce the reporting law against the consultant in late 1979, and the department did conduct investigations and requested information about reportable activities. But when the consultant refused voluntary compliance, the department did not get around to bringing a suit until last March.

Spurned unions

Even then, it refused to allow the building trades to intervene in support of the suit, contending that the Labor Dept. would adequately protect whatever interest the unions might have in enforcement of the law.

The suit was initially dismissed for lack of prosecution, although later reinstated, O'Shea testified.

"In any event," he said, "the most notorious labor consultant in Southern California has defiantly ignored the reporting requirements with impunity for at least five years without penalty." Further, the prospects for successful prosecution have been diminished "because much of the evidence has become stale due to the Labor Dept.'s delinquent investigation and enforcement efforts."



At House hearings on Landrum-Griffin Act enforcement, Subcommittee Chairman William Clay, Paperworkers Attorney Melinda Branscomb, IBEW Business Rep. Bob Miller and Charles McDonald of AFL-CIO.

Industrial policy bill clears first congressional hurdle

An industrial strategy bill strongly urged by the AFL-CIO won 13-9 approval from the House Economic Stabilization subcommittee. It was supported by Democrats, opposed by Republicans, and will be taken up next in the full House Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs Committee.

The legislation would establish a Council on Industrial Competitiveness, with high-level private and public sector representation, to shape overall industrial policy.

The council would have four members each from government, labor, business and the public—all appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation.

Under guidelines set by the council, an industrial development bank would make loans and loan guarantees to modernize existing industries and assist innovative new enterprises. But at least 70 percent of the funding would have to come from private sources. The bank would begin with an $8.5 billion capitalization.

The development bank concept is a key ingredient of the legislation, which is sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.). Subcommittee Republicans proposed a substitute that eliminated the development bank, but it was rejected with only one Democratic defection.

Also part of the bill is a less controversial plan for a secondary market for bonds issued by industrial corporations to raise money for expansion or modernization. The secondary market concept would be comparable to the system now used for home mortgages.

The subcommittee did approve an amendment to the bill's preamble that called for attention also to the special problems of labor-intensive industries which remain an important source of jobs in the United States.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified in strong support of the legislation at subcommittee hearings and warned against any assumption that the problems of lost industrial jobs will disappear as the nation emerges from recession.

Failure to act, he warned, will doom the United States to continued economic decline and to recurrent recessions, each worse than its predecessor.

Although the details differ, the legislation is very similar in concept to the recent recommendations of a panel of prominent Americans whose cochairmen were investment banker Felix G. Rohatyn, industrialist Irving Shapiro and Kirkland.

Because of the Reagan Administration's opposition, the legislation is not likely to get beyond House consideration this year. But it is certain to be an issue in the presidential and congressional elections.

In other congressional developments:

- The first bipartisan budget talks, involving House and Senate leaders and White House officials, failed to come up with a consensus on how to reduce the budget deficit. But House Majority Leader Jim Wright reported that agreement was reached that any deficit reduction would not involve any further changes or cutbacks in social security.
- The Senate approved the less controversial half of a bill revising the criminal code and was debating other provisions in a separate bill. It included in the measure that was approved a bill it passed separately last year with AFL-CIO support to toughen penalties against union officials convicted of corruption.

House keys aid to basic reforms in El Salvador military assistance," Kirkland testified. "I'm still not satisfied," he added.

Kirkland spoke of the 1981 murder of two land reform advisers for the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development by right-wing members of El Salvador's National Guard.

"We know who did it. We know who ordered it, and we have not been able to get them prosecuted," Kirkland said.

He termed the death squads "as much a threat to the survival of that country as the guerillas."

Kirkland told the Senate panel that the bipartisan commission's report "puts the U.S. on the side of the democratic forces in the area as opposed to the murderous right and the totalitarian left."

Urging approval of the aid package, he stressed that "unfortunately, it can't be done on the cheap."

Leaders of Central American trade union federations meeting in Panama have asked the AFL-CIO to work for enactment of the commission's economic and social recommendations, Kirkland reported. He said the union groups had also proposed that progress on social and political reforms be monitored by a body composed of both Central American and U.S. leaders from labor, business, government, and groups concerned with human rights.

Report notes enforcement rollback

The Labor Dept.'s indifference to reporting and disclosure violations by management consultants results from a deliberate policy decision by the Reagan Administration, a congressional study revealed.

The report, requested by Chairman William L. Clay (D-Mo.) of the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, found the cutback in enforcement "so substantial that it approaches abandonment of the program."

Under an Administration policy directive, the Labor Dept.'s Office of Labor-Management Standards spends 93 percent less than it did in 1980 for enforcement of management reporting requirements. The agency's appropriations have been increased 20 percent, the report notes. But nearly all its funds these days go to investigate union elections, audit union financial reports and conduct other investigations of unions.

The staff report includes the text of a 1982 memorandum providing "policy guidance" on employer and consultant reporting cases. The memo was signed by Ronald J. St. Cyr, the deputy assistant secretary overseeing the program. His boss was Donald Dotson, then an Assistant Secretary of Labor and now chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

St. Cyr said cases in which consultants had only "indirect contact" with workers, by operating through supervisors, should be closed because they involve "contested" legal theories.

Further, "cases that have been opened on a basis other than a complaint should be closed."

The subcommittee staff noted that 100 pending cases against employers or consultants were closed because they hadn't been initiated by a complaint, even when "field investigations had documented violations of the law."

But in programs aimed at possible union misconduct, the subcommittee staff noted, most cases were initiated without a formal complaint. "It is only for investigations directed at employers and consultants that investigators are confined to responding to complaints," the study found.

At one time, the Labor Dept. looked at NLRB records as a productive source of information about the role of consultants in trying to keep workers from choosing union representation, but it no longer does so. Instead, an inter-agency agreement now provides that the NLRB will provide the Labor Dept. with data about newly certified unions so as to "ensure immediate compliance" by these unions with their reporting and disclosure obligations.

The subcommittee staff pointed also to the sharp decline in new cases involving management reporting obligations—from 350 in 1980 to 90 in 1981, 39 in 1982 and 28 in 1983.

"In summary," the report concluded, "the employer and consultant reporting law is not being enforced by the Dept. of Labor. The department has abandoned an even-handed approach to enforcing the law against unions, employers and labor consultants. As a result, non-compliance is widespread and the department has frustrated the Congress' intent that labor-management relations be conducted in the open."

Shop floor registration

Nationwide drive by the Clothing & Textile Workers to spur voter registration is put in action in a New York City garment factory where local joint board representatives Micky Hernandez and Gladys Diaz sign up members. ACTWU business agents and representatives carry voter registration cards on shop visits, and shop stewards encourage new members to register as soon as they join the union. ACTWU said most employers under union contracts cooperate with the program and permit registration in the shops during working hours.

Nation's 8% jobless rate still above pre-Reagan level

Unemployment dipped two-tenths of 1 percent to 8 percent in January, but still stands higher than when the Reagan Administration took office.

When President Reagan entered the White House in 1981, the nation's jobless rate was 7.4 percent and there were 1 million fewer Americans officially classified as unemployed. The jobless rate soared to 10.7 percent in December 1982 at depth of the Reagan Recession.

Last month, the jobless rate declined largely because of a slowing in the growth of the labor force, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. The civilian labor force, at 112.2 million in January, was virtually unchanged over the month.

Meanwhile, overall employment increased 249,000 during the month to 103.2 million, according to the BLS household survey. Payroll employment, measured by a separate survey of businesses, showed an increase of 287,000.

In calculating joblessness, BLS does not include the number of so-called "discouraged" workers nor those working only part time because they cannot find full-time jobs. If these were added to the total count—half of the 5.9 million part time workers and all of the 1.5 million discouraged workers—"true" joblessness last month was 11.9 percent, with 13.6 million workers looking for jobs, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research said.

9 million jobless

Officially, BLS said there were 9 million Americans unemployed in January, down from the 11.9 million at the trough of the long Reagan Recession. Significant drops in unemployment were posted for all major worker groups except black youths, whose jobless rate still hovered near 50 percent.

Overall black unemployment last month declined from 17.8 to 16.7 percent. The rate for whites dropped to 6.9 percent from 7.1 percent, and the rate for Hispanics fell to 11.2 percent from 11.6 percent.

The jobless rate for adult men fell to 7.3 percent from 7.4 percent, while the rate for adult women was unchanged at 7.1 percent. The rate for teenagers was 19.4 percent, down from 20.1 percent in December.

Over the month, employment grew in most industries with a strong 100,000 increase in manufacturing and an increase of 42,000 in service-sector jobs. In government, however, employment dropped by 61,000 and mining was down by 3,000. Rates in many manufacturing industries still are far below pre-recession peaks of July 1981.

Average weekly hours worked in January rose from 35.3 to 35.6 hours and from 40.5 to 40.9 hours in manufacturing.

Double-digit rate

Despite the overall improvement, the unemployment picture varies among different regions of the country. At the end of November, the most recent month for which complete state statistics are available, 11 states and the District of Columbia still had double-digit unemployment rates.

The jurisdictions included West Virginia, 15 percent; Alabama, 12.5 percent; Michigan, 11.7 percent; Ohio, 11 percent; District of Columbia, 10.9 percent; Louisiana, 10.6 percent; Mississippi, 10.4 percent; Oregon, 10.4 percent; Kentucky, 10.3 percent; Washington, 10.2 percent; Alaska, 10 percent, and Indiana, 10 percent.

By another unemployment measure, which includes members of the armed forces stationed in the United States, the jobless rate last month fell two-tenths of 1 percent to 7.9 percent.

McGuire elected by UTU board, Shepherd retires

Cleveland—Thomas J. McGuire has been elected to succeed United Transportation Union Sec.-Treas. John H. Shepherd, who retired Feb. 2.

McGuire, a UTU vice president since 1980 was unanimously elected by the union's board of directors to fill out Shepherd's term which expires Dec. 31, 1987.

McGuire, 53, began his career in 1951 as a brakeman on the Milwaukee Road. He served as a local union chairman for two decades until moving up to general chairman in 1974. A year later, he was elected an alternate vice president, re-elected to that post in 1979 and moved up to vice president in 1980. He was re-elected at the 1983 convention.

UTU President Fred Hardin said McGuire had "excellent qualifications" for his new post. Hardin also commended Shepherd for his long service to the UTU.

Shepherd, 65, a member of UTU Local 200 in North Platte, Neb., started his railroad career as a yardman on the Union Pacific's Nebraska division in 1940. He served as a local and general chairman before he was elected vice president in 1960, and was elected secretary-treasurer of the former Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in 1968. He retained that post with the formation of the UTU in 1969 and was re-elected at each subsequent quadrennial convention.

The union's board of directors is expected to name a successor to McGuire's vice presidential post from the three alternate vice presidents elected from his region at the last convention.

German unions backed in drive for 35-hour week

Geneva—International support for the drive by German unions for a 35-hour workweek mounted as two trade secretariats mobilized their members worldwide to get behind the issue.

The International Metalworkers' Federation and the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional & Technical Employees, whose member unions represent a total of more than 20 million workers in some 100 countries, rallied behind metalworkers of IG Metall, the largest union in Germany, which is spearheading the drive for the shorter workweek.

IG Metall, one of the largest affiliates of the IMF, is seeking the 35-hour workweek in bargaining with German employers for a new contract. The union's old agreement expired last month.

Negotiations for a new contract in Germany's banking and insurance, meanwhile, are scheduled to begin at the end of February, and the Banking & Insurance Division of the Commercial Employees Federation—usually known by its French initials, FIET—has joined unionized workers in seeking the shorter week.

A statement of support for IG Metall's stand on the 35-hour workweek has been signed by 104 officials of IMF unions. Among the U.S. signatories are Lynn Williams, acting president of the Steelworkers; Owen Bieber, president of the Auto Workers, and William Winpisinger, president of the Machinists.

IMF Gen. Sec. Herman Rebhan said the fight for the 35-hour workweek is not just for German workers, but for workers throughout the world.

Postal union fights ban on voter sign-up

The Postal Workers asked a federal court to overturn new Postal Service restrictions on voter registration activities that the union charged violate workers' constitutional rights.

The APWU suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia challenges the regulations that bar postal employees from participating in any voter registration activity on Postal Service premises, and prohibit employees from wearing or displaying any kind of political insignia, badges or posters, or distributing political literature anywhere on USPS grounds, including parking lots.

APWU said the new regulations, issued last December, violate the free speech guarantees of the Constitution as well as its protections of other political rights of union members and postal employees.

The union asked the court to order USPS to pull back on the new regulations because they violate existing civil service laws protecting such rights. APWU branded the USPS move "arbitrary and capricious" and "an abuse of discretion."

The suit also asks the court to issue an injunction that would stop USPS from going ahead with enforcement of the regulations or refusing to rescind them.

APWU President Moe Biller charged that the Postal Service's stricter rules on political participation "are not just isolated events."

He suggested that the measures might be a response by the USPS management to the union's stepped up political activities, including its "Voices in Politics" political action and education programs for members.

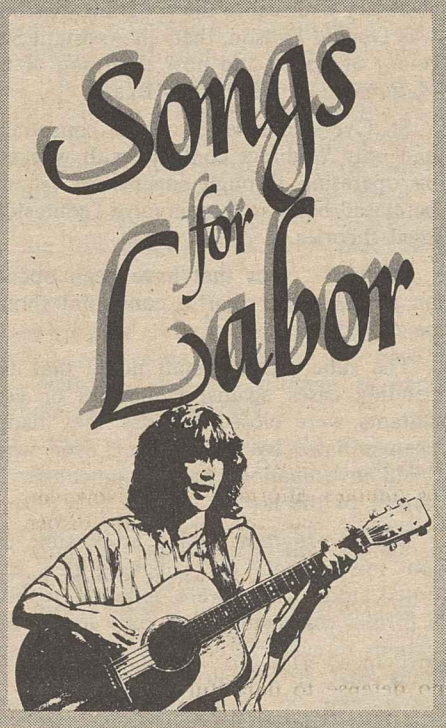
Equal access

The APWU stressed that if other groups are permitted to set up voter registration programs in most post offices, the union should have the same rights.

The union also pointed out that up to now many postal employees have been permitted to wear political insignia particularly in non-public areas of postal facilities, including parking lots. But the new rules would cut out that right, even preventing workers from putting political bumper stickers on their private vehicles if they park in USPS lots.

All federal and postal employees are restricted from most forms of participation in partisan political campaigns both on and off the job by the 45-year-old Hatch Act. The AFL-CIO has called for amending the law to strengthen protections of federal employees against political coercion while at the same time easing bans on political participation.

Biller said the APWU will continue to press its own voter registration and get-out-the-vote programs among its members, including keeping them informed on key issues.



The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has published an updated booklet of popular trade union songs, titled "Songs for Labor."

The revised edition contains 46 songs, including Bread & Roses, Joe Hill, Roll the Union On and Which Side Are You On?

Single copies are free. Additional copies of the songbook, Publication No. 56, are available for 35 cents each from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Union members applaud Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale at a rally that wrapped up the AFL-CIO regional conference in Boston.

Mondale stirs up New England rally

Boston—More than 3,000 New England union members turned out to give a rousing welcome to Democratic Presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale at a full-house rally here that wrapped up the second of seven AFL-CIO regional conferences.

Mondale told the enthusiastic crowd that the Reagan Administration is trying "to teach us that America is some kind of jungle where only the richest or the fittest prosper," and Americans should forget about looking "to your government or your President" for fairness.

But that violates "the most fundamental principle of this country" and fairness is "what we need in this country again," Mondale stressed.

He told the crowd that President Roosevelt gave the nation the "New Deal" and Truman offered the "Fair Deal," but President Reagan "is giving us the 'Double Deal.' "

For example, Mondale said, Reagan offers working men and women the "Raw Deal, but to big corporations, he offers the Sweetheart Deal."

Mondale's speech to unionists from the six New England states and Pennsylvania followed a day-long AFL-CIO conference for area state and central body officers, local union officers and staff that concentrated on election-year programs and included workshops on the federation's organizing, legislative and political activities.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told participants that the federation broke from long-standing tradition and endorsed Mondale's candidacy before the party primaries because three years of "hard lessons" under the Reagan Administration had convinced workers that "it is not enough to go to the polls on Election Day to choose among candidates who have been chosen by others. We have to get on at the ground floor of the political process."

Mondale was endorsed by the AFL-CIO at its convention last October on the recommendation of the federation's General Board.

Undercutting rights

Mondale scored the Reagan Administration for doing "everything they can to undermine the legitimacy and the respect of the right of workers . . . to organize, to bargain and to strike."

"Mr. Reagan wants to make us a 'union-free' nation, and what we need is a nation of free unions," he told the crowd.

Mondale charged the Administration with demonstrating a lack of "respect" for organized labor through such action as appointment of a Secretary of Labor who has "no relationships at all with organized labor," through appointments to the National Labor Relations Board of people "who've spent their lives fighting the legitimacy of organized labor," through failure to enforce laws meant to protect workers, such as job safety legislation, and by encouraging an anti-labor mood among corporate managements.

The former vice president called the Reagan Administration's economic policies "radical," and warned that rather than helping the nation, they are undermining the economy and destroying jobs.

Shifting tax burden

He criticized the Administration's tax policies for putting the "burden of paying for America overwhelmingly on the backs of middle- and moderate-income working Americans and leaving the wealthy scot-free," and he warned that a second Reagan presidency would bring "more of the same."

The Reagan Administration, Mondale charged, "has more purely served the cause of more special interests, more people who are rich and powerful, than any other administration in American history." And he told the crowd that if he is successful in winning the Democratic nomination, he would relish debating President Reagan "to have this issue out in 1984."

In a wrap-up of the rally, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised the enthusiasm of the union members in attendance and stressed that good organization by union political activists had made it a success. He urged the union members to turn the same energy toward other political action programs planned throughout the election year.

The Boston conference will be followed by similar meetings in Des Moines, Iowa, on Feb. 10-11 and in Miami on Mar. 2-3.

The final three regional meetings are set for Mar. 9-10 in Chicago, Mar. 23-24 in New York and Apr. 27-28 in Dallas.

AFSCME warns pay equity could become election issue

If the Reagan Administration backs continuing discrimination in the Washington State comparable worth case, it could turn pay equity into a major election issue in 1984, State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee warned.

McEntee said Justice Dept. involvement in the case on the side of the state would be not only an unwelcome intrusion in the legal process, but also a signal to working women that the Reagan Administration thinks pay discrimination is permissible.

The AFSCME president spoke at a news conference in response to hints from the Justice Dept. that Assistant Atty. Gen. William Bradford Reynolds will recommend that the Administration side with the state in its appeal of a federal court verdict last December finding Washington guilty of sex-biased wage discrimination in the state's employment practices.

In the case, brought by AFSCME, Judge Jack Tanner of the U.S. District Court for Western Washington found that the state violated civil rights law by setting lower pay for state jobs held mostly by women than for jobs held mostly by men even though the tasks require comparable education, skill and responsibility.

Pay raise order

Judge Tanner ordered the state immediately to raise the pay of about 15,500 state employees to levels based on the worth of the jobs they hold. The cost could total $700 million.

Reynolds has said the landmark case upholding the principle of comparable worth "sets a dangerous precedent."

McEntee told reporters that for millions of working women—including AFSCME's 400,000 female members—the Reagan Administration's role in the case "is an important litmus test."

He pointed out that for more than 20 years and a number of administrations, the federal government was a supporter of people who fought pay discrimination.

"The Reagan Administration should be in the business of enforcing the law, not questioning it. We believe that the government ought to be assisting the litigants in the case, not resisting them," he said.

McEntee contrasted the Reagan Administration's position on comparable worth to support of pay equity by Walter Mondale and other Democratic candidates for the presidential nomination and warned that AFSCME wants to "send a signal to the Reagan Administration in the only language it understands—re-election politics."

Support pledged

Earlier this year, at a conference on pay equity, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that the federation would continue to help affiliates in efforts to achieve pay equity on the job, through bargaining and grievance procedures as well as through judicial, legislative and political action.

AFSCME Women's Director Diana Rock charged that the civil rights section of the Justice Dept. "obviously hasn't done its homework" on the case and that the Reagan Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has refused to enforce the Civil Rights Act by ignoring pay equity cases, including the complaint that led to AFSCME's suit against Washington State.

She said that EEOC has been "warehousing" pay equity cases for three years and has "slammed the door" on "at least 250 pay equity complaints so far—including nine of AFSCME's."

The union's attorney, Winn Newman, sharply criticized the proposed Justice Dept. intervention. He said the Administration's contention that wages should be set by the marketplace also tells those who face pay inequity to "get another job.'

Newman asserted that the marketplace "is no defense to unlawful wage discrimination because market rates are themselves a product of discrimination."

Profit pie

The profit-sharing formula that the Auto Workers negotiated with General Motors Corp. in return for wage concessions in 1982 will yield $322 million for some 531,000 UAW members as a result of the corporation's record earnings. GM rang up profits of $3.73 billion for 1983.

The average payment will be about $640 per worker.

UAW Vice President Donald Ephlin, director of the union's GM department, termed the company's returned prosperity "good news." But he noted also that GM's 5,800 executives would get an average bonus of more than $31,000 and served notice that the union will be discussing a "sweetening" of the profit-sharing formula for workers at the bargaining table later this year.

Sheet Metal tabloid focuses on benefits

The Sheet Metal Workers launched a new publication, "Focus on Funds," to keep members informed on the range of benefits available to them through the union.

SMWIA President Edward J. Carlough said the monthly newspaper covers developments in seven joint labor-management trust funds that provide benefits and is being mailed to the union's 160,000 members. He called the new paper, "another vital link in the communication chain between our union, our members and their families."

The publication includes information on the International Trust, which handles prepaid legal and prescription benefits, the National Health Trust Fund, the National Pension Fund, the National Energy Management Institute, the National Training Fund and two Stabilization Agreements for the sheet metal industry which provide benefits to under-employed or unemployed workers and their families.

8 earn degrees in labor studies at Meany Center

Eight more union officials have earned Bachelor of Arts degrees in Labor Studies at the George Meany Center, bringing the total to 57.

The new graduates are Alton D. Bryson, United Transportation Union; Mose Collins, Laborers; Robert B. Douglas, Railway & Airline Clerks; John R. George, Operating Engineers; Richard J. Heffernan and George A. Roberts, Electrical Workers; Walter S. Pearson, Service Employees, and George Reese, Jr., Letter Carriers.

This external degree program, offered by Antioch University in cooperation with the George Meany Center, permits union leaders to work toward college degrees while continuing their regular jobs. Some college credits are allowed for competencies gained through experience in the labor movement.

On-campus week

On entering the program, the participants spend one week every six months on campus at the George Meany Center consulting with faculty and attended classes. These classes introduce them to courses of study they pursue during the following six months.

In this program they earn credits in courses covering such fields as collective bargaining, labor history and economic issues.

Russell Allen, the center's deputy director, spoke at the commencement exercises. Diplomas were presented by Isaac Hunt, dean of the Antioch School of Law.

Unions press OSHA to cut limits on EDB exposure

The federation wants OSHA to take steps to immediately alert all grain elevators, mills and food warehouses outlining the hazards of both EDB and methyl dibromide and the safe work practices required.

The petition pointed out that the Dept. of Agriculture estimates that up to 40 percent of the nation's grain and corn supplies may contain EDB residues.

The EPA suggested that current grain stocks be aerated to dissipate EDB residues to acceptable levels. The AFL-CIO said "this aeration process will expose grain mill workers to high levels of EDB as the fumigant off-gases from the grain and will pose a grave danger to workers."

EDB residues will continue to be found on U.S. citrus and on citrus entering the country from the Caribbean, the federation warned. Government tests have shown residues on citrus range from 1,500 to 16,000 ppb and such levels will pose a "grave danger to workers in handling treated citrus in supermarket warehouses and retail markets."

The EPA has now banned most uses of EDB. The agency's action came three years after it had learned that EDB residues were showing up in the food chain. A decade of pressure by labor, and more recently by environmental and consumer groups, is credited with forcing the agency to action.

The EPA suspension of EDB use will eliminate 97 percent of its agricultural use. The agency also issued voluntary guidelines for states to follow on the maximum acceptable residues of EDB.

The guidelines call for limits of 900 parts per billion for raw grain intended for human consumption; 150 ppb for milled products such as flour, soft cereals and other products that require cooking before eating, and 30 ppb for ready-to-eat products.

The agency is also taking action to revoke a 1956 legal exemption that prevents EPA from setting tolerance levels enforceable by the Food & Drug Administration.

Combined effort

The AFL-CIO was joined by environmental and consumer groups in pressing the EPA to ban EDB.

But the agency "didn't go far enough," said Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security. "It makes a first step," she said, noting that the guidelines are only voluntary and that a number of states do not have the authority currently to enforce such guidelines.

Last October, OSHA proposed a revised standard reducing EDB exposure levels to 100 ppb with short-term exposures set at 500 ppb. An action level of 50 ppb would provide that employers who monitor exposures below that level be exempt from certain requirements.

OSHA began hearings on the proposed rule on Feb. 8. Under normal rule-making procedures, it would take until sometime in 1985 to promulgate a final rule.

Huge deficits called threat to economy of this decade and in the more distant future," the report said.

At a hearing before the congressional Joint Economic Committee and at a press briefing, Feldstein said the Administration's optimistic forecast of an expanding economy with gradually declining inflation and unemployment over the next several years would come true only if further major deficit reductions are enacted.

"We need a goodsized bite now and a bigger bite in 1985," he said of the deficits.

In other sections of the report, the CEA projected economic growth of about 4 percent annually for the remainder of the decade, with falling inflation and unemployment. Though unemployment is dropping, the council still foresees high rates of joblessness over the next five years.

The Administration's economic assumptions anticipate that the unemployment rate will decline from an annual average of 9.5 percent last year to 7.8 percent this year, 7.6 percent in 1985, 7.3 percent in 1986, 6.8 percent in 1987, 6.1 percent in 1988, and 5.7 percent in 1989.

As measured by the government's consumer price index, inflation is projected to average 4.4 percent this year, 4.6 percent in 1985, 4.5 percent in 1986, 4.2 percent in 1987, 3.9 percent in 1988, and 3.6 percent in 1989.

Goals disregarded

As in previous CEA reports, the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act of 1978 came in for discussion. And, as in the past, rather than set a timetable for achieving the numerical goals for full employment and low inflation, the Administration chose to outline policies for "making progress" toward those goals.

The Humphrey-Hawkins Act set a goal of bringing down the adult unemployment rate to 4 percent by 1983 and the inflation rate to 3 percent by 1983.

The report also uses an entire section to make clear the Administration's strong opposition to any national policy to revitalize U.S. industry of the sort long advocated by the AFL-CIO and now the subject of congressional legislation sponsored by Rep. John LaFalce (D-N.Y.). The CEA insisted that most of the problems of American industries "can be solved with prudent monetary and fiscal policies."

The CEA report argues that the United States is not now in the process of "deindustrializing" and that workers from declining industries who suffer long-term unemployment constitute only about 2 percent of the unemployed.

Medicare proposals draw sharp labor dissent

The two labor members of the government's Social Security Advisory Council took sharp issue with the panel's majority report on the adequacy and financial soundness of the Medicare system, charging that it does not address the real problems of the system.

The majority's recommendations won't stem the health care cost inflation "which is the major cause of the threatened insolvency of the Medicare program," said President Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and Sec.-Treas. Stan Arnold of the Michigan Building Trades Council.

"The proposals supported by the majority hold harmless the primary decision-makers in the health care system, namely doctors and hospitals, while squarely placing the financial burden of corrective action on those who are the least responsible for rising costs and the least able to withstand increases in out-of-pocket payments —elderly and disabled Medicare beneficiaries."

The views of Heaps and Arnold were presented to the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Social Security Committee on Feb. 1. The majority report from which they dissented will be released later this month by the Dept. of Health & Human Services which appointed the advisory committee in September 1982.

In their 14-page minority report, Heaps and Arnold called for an immediate, comprehensive cost containment system for the private and public health care sectors.

"What is urgently needed is across-the-board payment reform, which we believe is absolutely necessary to control the costs and preserve the system," they said.

General revenues use

On other specific issues, Heaps and Arnold rejected the contention of the majority that general revenues ought not to be used to finance the Medicare program. If necessary to prevent bankruptcy of the program, general revenue contributions should be used rather than such alternatives as drastic benefit cuts or reduction of eligibility.

The labor representatives also opposed placing limits on tax-free employer contributions for health insurance to fund the deficit in the Medicare program. Under the majority's proposal, any contribution over the specified limit would be taxable as income to employees.

Rather than make workers more "cost conscious" as the Reagan Administration contends, this scheme would result in drastic reductions in coverage for preventive care, outpatient diagnostic services, and other benefits that save money, Heaps and Arnold pointed out.

On the majority's proposal to increase taxes on alcohol and tobacco to provide more revenue for Medicare, they said such regressive taxes would disproportionately hurt the low-income population and unfairly single out particular industries.

They also rejected the idea of automatically increasing the Medicare Part B deductible at a rate corresponding to the annual increase in the government's consumer price index. And they opposed levying a surcharge of $41 a year on beneficiaries to help finance the deficit in the Part A trust fund.

"Both proposals would shift to the elderly and disabled a larger share of the burden of rising Medicare costs, without doing anything to change the behavior of the true health care decision makers," Heaps and Arnold stressed.

They also opposed a plan to restructure the financing of Part A benefits and require that beneficiaries pay a bigger out-of-picket share for hospital care costs.

In addition, they voted against raising the age of eligibility for Medicare from 65 to 67 beginning next year. And they opposed a scheme for voluntary vouchers, terming it detrimental to the interests of elderly and disabled citizens who would have difficulty shopping for and comparing insurance plans.

Areas of agreement

In areas of agreement with the majority, the labor members supported the view that priority be given to the question of including cost-effective preventive care and long-term care in the Medicare benefit package.

"We also agree that whatever steps can be taken to improve the management of the Medicare program ought to be expeditiously put in place, although it should be noted that administrative costs for the program have been consistently at levels far below the industry average for private health insurance programs," Heaps and Arnold said.

In other matters, they recommended mechanisms to limit physicians' fees, prevent unnecessary hospital admissions, and limit the rate of growth in hospital capital expenditures.

EDITORIALS

A Campaign Issue

THE INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY bill that the House Subcommittee on Economic Strategy approved the other day should become law this year. But that's not likely. Not with the Reagan Administration so adamantly opposed.

It is important, nevertheless, that the legislation and the concepts behind it be widely understood and debated in this political decision year.

Ideally, the proposal would be examined in a non-partisan framework since there is nothing necessarily Democratic or Republican about the importance of retaining an industrial base to the U.S. economy. A plant closing devastates communities that elect Republicans as well as Democrats.

The political reality, however, is that our Republican president opposes the concept of private-sector and public-sector cooperation in making America's industries more efficient and better able to compete in world markets.

Walter Mondale, the leading candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, supports it. So do several of the other Democratic contenders.

So let the contrasting views be part of the political platforms of the two parties and let the issue be debated by the presidential candidates.

And let candidates for Congress do likewise. This is what elections are all about.

President Reagan may talk about the "sunrise industries" that are springing up to replace the smokestack "sunset industries." But he wouldn't have to look further than California's Silicon Valley to see that the exodus of high-tech enterprises to foreign shores has begun.

A THOUGHTFUL STUDY recently published by the Industrial Union Dept. is described in the adjoining Washington Window column. It makes clear how the nation's economy can continue to decline at the same time the country is emerging from recession and jobs are becoming more available.

It notes that workers in the fastest-growing fields of employment earn an average of $100-a-week less than industrial production workers whose jobs are declining.

It sees this dwindling of middle-income industrial jobs taking the nation perilously close to a two-tier society with a few high-paid, high-skilled jobs at the top and a big base of low-paid, low-skill jobs.

And then what happens to what we have come to regard as the American standard of living?

That's not the only economic issue that needs to be debated in this campaign, obviously. There's the huge trade imbalance—and not all of it the result of more modern production facilities abroad or even the wage gap in labor-intensive industries.

THE U.S. DOLLAR is clearly overvalued in relation to other world currencies—something that does not seem to seriously concern this Administration even though it means that American firms are at a disadvantage in selling goods abroad and in competing with imports in this country.

These aren't the easiest issues to package into 30-second commercials. But they're not the hardest to explain to American workers either.

We've seen too many jobs disappear, too many plants close. It's time to change course.

The Anti-Union Pattern

CONGRESSIONAL hearings have demonstrated that Labor Dept. investigations of anti-union management consultants who fail to file disclosure statements required by law have come to a virtual halt.

There was a policy directive from the Administration's appointees that set the new priorities. It said in effect, "Investigate unions. Stop investigating management."

That's newsworthy, but it's not surprising.

It's what we've come to expect from this Administration.

Reagan economic policy creating two-tier society

By Press Associates, Inc.

America's middle-class — working men and women with comfortable, mid-range incomes — has long been regarded as the social, economic and political bedrock of the nation.

But the middle class is an endangered species.

For the past two decades, the middle class has been shrinking, a trend accelerated by the Reagan Administration's economic policies. A recent study titled, "Deindustrialization and the Two-Tier Society," documents this trend.

"With the weakening of the industrial sector, a serious mismatch has developed between jobs being lost and those being created in our society. Millions of relatively well-paying production jobs have been eliminated while the overwhelming bulk of employment created has been concentrated in jobs with very low incomes and little realistic opportunity for upward mobility," the study prepared by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. said.

Because of the erosion of the nation's industrial base since the 1960s, "the once solid middle tier of American jobs has been undermined. Massive increases in those unable to find any job at all have accentuated this growing inequality in American society," the report said, adding:

New minority

Middle-income families, a majority of the population six years ago, are today in the minority. In 1978, about 55 percent of the nation's households had incomes between $17,000 and $41,000.

By 1983, this figure dropped to 42 percent and of those who left the middle class, three moved down on the economic ladder for every one who moved up.

Between early 1979 and the end of 1983, a year of "recovery," over 1.7 million manufacturing jobs were lost in the United States.

The social consequences of deindustrialization have been severe. There is the phenomenon of the displaced workers whose jobs were eliminated. They often are highly skilled with long work experience.

These victims of structural unemployment "experience significant increases in personal stress and in rates of suicide, alcohol and drug abuse, and family violence," the 42-page report noted.

Minorities and women, who gained increasing entry into industrial jobs during the 1960s and 1970s, usually are the first victims of job loss.

Downward thrust

So instead of proceeding up the ladder of middle-class economic security, blacks, Hispanics and women are being thrust back down with little hope of regaining well-paid, blue-collar employment.

Cities and whole regions have been wounded deeply by the weakening industrial base. "City budgets are strained, public investment in physical infrastructure needed to support private industry falls short, and the vital social services infrastructure is cut back."

During the 1979-1983 period when 1.7 million jobs were lost in basic industries, the service sector added more than 4 million jobs. But service jobs, the fastest growing being the fast-food industry, are typically low-skilled, low-paid and non-union. The same two-tier division occurs in the high-tech sector with managers and scientists on top and assembly workers on the bottom.

Aggravating the trend is the fact that "unemployment has gone deeper in each recession since 1969, and each subsequent recovery has been weaker, with successively worse 'best' levels of unemployment."

Unless the trend of deindustrialization is reversed, "unemployment will remain very high, standards of living and the quality of life will erode, and the legacy of past discrimination will be perpetuated in a more unequal society."

MEMO FROM COPE

Reagan: 'Great Communicator' or 'Great Obfuscator?'

COMMUNICATE: Convey knowledge or information about; make known.

OBFUSCATE: Darken; make obscure; confuse.

—Webster's Collegiate Dictionary

Which of the two is Ronald Reagan, Great Communicator or Great Obfuscator?

The President submits his annual budget message. In it, he tells the nation, "We are well on our way to sustained long-term prosperity without runaway inflation . . . a result of a program I proposed three years ago. . . ."

Nowhere in the President's message is there mention of the millions of workers (30 million individual workers, as a matter of fact) who suffered one or more episodes of unemployment along the way, many as a consequence of the Reagan program; nor of the millions of working poor and other needy Americans deprived of vital life-sustaining services like food and health care.

And nowhere in the message is there mention of Reagan's ocean of red ink, record-setting deficits which even many of his own advisers and supporters are honest enough to admit threaten massive economic grief in the years ahead.

Is he communicating or obfuscating? Communication clarifies; obfuscation muddies.

He said in his State of the Union message: "America is back" and we are "standing tall."

What do these words mean, anyway, if anything? Are we back from somewhere? Back to somewhere? Or back of somewhere?

And to whom are we standing tall? There is nothing recent to suggest we're standing any taller among our allies or our adversaries than before.

Is he communicating or just throwing around nice-sounding phrases that conceal reality?

In a recent speech to an industry association, Reagan lashes critics who charge his economic policies favor the rich and the corporations. A strong case can be made simply for this—but not only—on the basis of his tax cuts.

How does he respond? "I for one have no trouble with the profit motive," he says. "With freedom and the profit motive, we have achieved greatness."

Who attacked the profit motive, anyway? Not one of the candidates seeking the Democratic presidential nomination. Not one spokesperson or leader of either party in or out of office. Not the labor movement, the environmentalists, the women's movement, nor any other group opposing his policies and his re-election.

He brought it up. He set up the straw man for an easy knockdown.

Is that a Great Communicator or a Great Obfuscator in action?

Reagan looks out at his fellow Americans from the TV screen repeatedly and tells us the huge deficits occurring under his leadership really are because of all the "tax and tax, spend and spend Democrats" who occupied the White House and/or Congress the 50 years before he arrived.

It's Reagan's program, not the Democrats, that drained $750 billion in revenues from the Treasury over a three-year period and ballooned Pentagon spending, creating an authentic budget crisis.

Reagan, without blushing for shame or batting an eye, tells us: "If you look back over the years, you will find that they (Democrats) aren't tax-cutters at all. The tax-cutting that has been done has been done by the Republican Party."

He should read his own speeches. As a presidential candidate and early in his tenure, he often cited John F. Kennedy's tax cuts as a model for his own policy. And the fact is tax cuts have occurred over the past two decades under Presidents of both parties, usually while Congress was controlled by Democrats.

With such patently false statements, is he clarifying issues for the people of the nation he leads, or muddling them up? Is he communicating or obfuscating?

Reagan forever denies that anyone has been hurt by his economic policies or by his severe social program cuts.

But recently, he said, "Actually, if there are individuals who suffer from our economic program, they are people who have been dropped from various things like food stamps because they weren't morally eligible for them. . . ."

Millions of needy adults and children have had food aid or health care taken away or reduced under Reaganism. Was it because they were not "morally eligible?" What's next? Laid-off workers denied unemployment compensation because they're not "morally eligible?"

With throw-away lines like that, is he communicator or obfuscator?

It is true: Ronald Reagan delivers a speech with seeming sincerity and great professionalism, and he comes up with some good one-liners. For that, he's called the "Great Communicator."

But what's their use—and their effect—if they don't clarify, if they're inaccurate or incomplete, if they misrepresent reality?

Voters may or may not see this in 1984, but history will catch up with the Great Obfuscator.

ODDS 'N ENDS

RECORD POLITICAL SPENDING planned by GOP National Committee as it unveils $52 million budget, up 100 percent since the 1980 elections, and more than double the anticipated Democratic National Committee budget. GOP will spend $4 million of it in massive registration effort, abetted by another $4 million from Reagan re-election committee. Combined drive hopes to sign up additional three million potential GOP voters. It will focus on areas around military bases, high income suburbs, some blue-collar enclaves and southern and Sun Belt conservative Democratic areas.

TWO SEATS gained in Michigan state senate, giving GOP control of that body, as result of anti-tax group's successful recall of Democrats in two districts. Election following recall went to Republicans. Tactic expected to be picked up and run with by conservatives in many states, could be major headache for moderate and progressive legislators.

BIG PAT ON BACK for Reed Larson, long-time chairman of right-to-work-for-less committee, is delivered by Sen. Jesse Helms in form of speech in Senate. Helms describes RTW group as "broad-based citizens' coalition." More properly, it should be described as tool of business associations and some individual businessmen. Larson, says Helms, "has done more than any American to restore labor relations to the course originally envisioned by the Founding Fathers." If anyone has Founding Fathers' quotes on right-to-work-for-less, please provide.

INDUSTRIAL POLICY support comes from study commissioned by nine major firms. Data Resources Inc. reports the U.S. economy can't hack it unless industrial base is strong, concludes: "It would be unfounded optimism to believe that the service sector will somehow sustain our economic progress on its own." Cited as key problems: Huge Reagan deficits, over-valued dollar and government neglect. Report warns: "A nation that casually surrenders leading industrial positions through policies of neglect will find it difficult to stage a comback."

ELECTION COMMISSION will file suit against National Conservative PAC. FEC charges right wing group made illegal contributions of $73,755 in 1982 U.S. Senate race in New York by coordinating with campaign of its candidate Bruce Caputo while supposedly engaged in independent expenditure effort. Fine could run from $5,000 to the $73,755 FEC claims was spent.

FIVE TERMS ENOUGH, says Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater as he announces he won't seek another in 1986. Goldwater, landslide presidential loser in 1964, paved way for ultra-conservative movement that followed, was major political patron of then-movie/TV performer Ronald Reagan.

Sailing (or Sinking) on Reagan's Red Sea

'We're Facing Calamity' — Dole

"I believe in '85 and '86 we're facing calamity" because of record-high Reagan deficits.—Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.), chairman of Senate Finance Committee, MacNel-Lehrer News Hour, 2/1/84.

$2181.82 Per Head Just to Pay Interest

In the next four years of Reagan deficits, it is projected the government will have to pay bankers $480 billion in interest alone to finance all the red ink Reagan splashes across the federal budget.

This averages out to $2,181.82 for every man, woman and child in the land—for a family of four $8,727.28.

Just for interest.

Banker Sees 'Deficit Avalanche'

Some business leaders aren't charmed by President Reagan's rose-colored view of his own stewardship as expressed in his recent State of the Union address. Herbert Allen, investment broker, responded this way:

"It was a pep rally in the path of a deficit avalanche . . . totally without substance, and could have been delivered by George M. Cohan."

If You Like Big Numbers . . .

In his first 32 months in office, President Reagan added $457 billion to the national debt. The projected deficit increase for two full Reagan terms—should he be re-elected—is $1.64 trillion. With all the zeros: $1,640,000,000,000.

A dollar bill is six-inches long. If dollars could be stacked end to end, Reagan's projected eight-year deficit would stretch 155,300,000 miles. That's all the way to the sun and back to the moon.

Reagan will triple the total national debt of the 200 years that preceded his presidency.

Quotes to Remember

"Mr. Carter is acting as if he hadn't been in charge for the past 3½ years; as if someone else ran up nearly $200 billion in red ink; as if someone else was responsible for the largest deficit in American history; as if someone else was predicting a budget deficit for the fiscal year of $30 billion or more."

—Candidate Ronald Reagan 10/24/80

75 years of struggle

President Reagan's attempt to undercut the campaign for social and economic justice was assailed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the NAACP's 75th anniversary observance in New York. New plan to curb health care costs gets wide support

By David L. Perlman

A new legislative proposal that seeks to hold down health care costs and avert a threatened cut in Medicare benefits received a warm endorsement from the AFL-CIO when it was unveiled at a Capitol Hill news conference.

Its chief sponsors are Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.). Groups that expressed their support for the measure included the major senior citizen organizations, the SOS coalition formed to defend social security, and the Health Security Action Council.

The Kennedy-Gephardt bill would tighten existing controls on hospital charges for Medicare patients. It would apply the recently begun system of basing payments to hospitals on the anticipated duration of the illness to in-hospital physician fees. The same cost curbs imposed for Medicare patients would be applied to the hospital charges for non-Medicare patients, whether their bills were paid individually or through employment-related insurance.

That feature, the bill's sponsors emphasize, would avoid having hospitals and doctors shift excess charges from Medicare to private insurance reimbursement.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said the across-the-board holddown on health care costs would keep the Medicare system solvent without the need to raise the payroll tax and at the same time "enable workers to preserve hard-won, collectively bargained health insurance protection."

Bargaining issue

Health care costs over the years have outpaced inflation, making continuation or improvement of benefits a troublesome bargaining table issue and pointing toward a fast-approaching funding crisis for the Medicare program.

The AFL-CIO statement termed the Kennedy-Gephardt bill a workable alternative to the Reagan Administration's strategy of reducing Medicare costs by slashing benefits and increasing out-of-pocket charges.

It reiterated labor's continued support for the goal of a universal, comprehensive national health insurance program — to make health care "a right for all Americans." But measures to deal with the immediate cost crisis "cannot wait" and should be acted on now, the federation urged.

The AFL-CIO and other organizations supporting the bill will be suggesting changes in a section dealing with health maintenance organizations, which Seidman said could have an unintended adverse effect. But overall, he said, the legislation would mark "the first real reform of the health care delivery system," and its enactment rates "the highest congressional priority."

The legislation, to be phased in over a two-year period, contemplates state operation of health cost control programs under plans that meet federal guidelines. Only if the state failed to assume responsibility or meet national standards would the federal government step in and operate the program.

Labor opposes revival of 'kitchen sweatshops'

Legislation to legalize industrial homework is incompatible with enforcement of wage-hour and child labor laws, AFL-CO Vice President Sol C. Chaikin charged at Senate hearings.

Chaikin, who is president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, testified for the AFL-CIO as well as for his own union in strong opposition to a bill by Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah).

Wage-hour regulations dating back more more than 40 years prohibit industrial homework in seven garment-linked industries where "kitchen sweatshops" were once a national scandal.

Court ruling

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan tried last year to rewrite wage-hour regulations to exempt the 63,000 workers employed in the manufacture of knitted outerwear and swimsuits from the ban on industrial homework. Acting on a suit brought by the ILGWU and other unions, a federal appellate court slapped down the move as "arbitrary" and "capricious."

Hatch's bill would eliminate by legislation restrictions on industrial homework in all the affected industries—including women's apparel, handkerchiefs, embroidery, gloves and mittens, buttons and buckles, and jewelry.

His contention—sharply challenged by Chaikin—is that the risk of exploitation no longer exists, and therefore the ban on industrial homework should be lifted.

Hatch, who is chairman of the full Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, testified before that body's Subcommittee on Labor in support of his proposal.

He claimed it penalizes "the Betsy Rosses of today," who couldn't sew flags at home "without fear of being prosecuted by the Dept. of Labor."

Chaikin retorted that the "central issue" of the dispute is that the experience of federal and state administrators has been that wage and job safety laws and consumer protection standards cannot be enforced where industrial homework is practiced.

The Hatch bill presumes that each homeworker will keep an accurate record of time worked, Chaikin noted, which should include "not only the time spent actually constructing the item being produced, but time spent going to pick up materials or delivering finished goods, time spent repairing or maintaining machines or tools, changing patterns or styles . . . and hand finishing or packaging."

In reality, Chaikin said, the typical homemaker isn't a Betsy Ross or a rural New England resident.

State jobless toll up for month, down over year

Unemployment rose in 28 states and the District of Columbia from November to December and declined in 21 states and Puerto Rico, the Labor Dept. reported. It remained unchanged in Maryland.

Fourteen of the jurisdictions recorded double-digit jobless rates, even though the nation's overall unemployment rate in December was 8.2 percent.

Over the year ended in December, however, unemployment rates went down in 47 states. Two states and the District of Columbia posted increases in their unemployment rates over the year ended in December. Alaska's rate rose five-tenths of 1 percent to 12.3 percent, Oklahoma's climbed eight-tenths of 1 percent to 7.6 percent and the District of Columbia's went up three-tenths of 1 percent to 11.1 percent.

Perseverance pays off

A small local foils a union-buster

Midvale, Ohio—Perseverance and determination won a satisfying victory for an Iron Workers local here pitted against a notorious union-busting consultant.

Nearly four years after Iron Workers Local 662 filed charges of widespread labor law violations against Flex Plastics, Inc., the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati upheld the findings of the National Labor Relations Board that the company had tried to run roughshod over its Midvale workers, and it ordered the firm to comply with a broad NLRB bargaining order.

The dispute began when Flex Plastics, a supplier to the auto industry, sought to get rid of the union. When Local 662's three-year collective bargaining contract expired in May 1980 and negotiations opened on a new contract, the company brought in a "labor relations consultant," Rayford T. Blankenship, to guide it through the talks.

During the negotiations, seven of the 125 employees engaged in a brief strike over grievance-type matters, and Local 662 filed NLRB charges concerning the employer's conduct during the walkout. Among other things, the union accused Flex of making unlawful promises of benefits to discourage union membership.

Unilateral move

After the talks stalled in July, Flex told the union that it would implement most of its new contract proposals, and the union did not object. Meanwhile, one employee filed a petition for a decertification election to determine if Local 662 was supported by the majority of workers.

Following a superintendent's suggestion, the employee formed what was called a "Flex Shop Committee" of employees who signed a petition authorizing the panel to bargain on a new contract.

All the while, Blankenship was operating behind the scenes, reports Donald Lightell, who was then business agent of Local 662 and subsequently joined the Iron Workers staff as a special representative. Lightell says formation of the shop committee, which amounted to a company union, was undoubtedly the work of Blankenship.

In August, Flex President Glenn E. Burket, still refusing to negotiate with the union, wrote employees that he would no longer honor the expired contract, recog-

Senate bill branded scheme to revive home sweatshops

"Rather, he or she is one of thousands of undocumented workers, hidden in the barrios, ghettos and Chinatowns of our nation's cities," he stressed.

"This homemaker is largely ignorant of American legal and judicial protections . . . fears calling attention to herself by reporting violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act."

For the undocumented worker, deportation could result, he noted. But the employer "is subject to no penalties for employing an undocumented worker."

Drastic budget cuts of recent years have reduced both federal and state wage-hour enforcement staffs, Chaikin pointed out, and the Dept. of Labor can't investigate more than 2 percent of the 4.1 million establishments covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Yet "legalization of homework would dramatically multiply the number of worksites" to be covered. Wage-hour violations will spread, he predicted, "because employers will be tempted to violate a law which is not enforceable."

Chaikin reminded the Senate panel that the garment industry, with more than 25,000 employers, is fiercely competitive.

"Such competition encourages efforts to cut labor costs, often the largest single component of production," he said.

That was the motive 75 years ago for garment shops to move from New York City to Long Island and Pennsylvania, "seeking the cheaper labor of farmers' wives." It caused a shift 40 years ago to the South and to Puerto Rico, "to areas with lower standards of living." And in the present era, "garment production moves overseas to Hong Kong, Taiwan, South Korea and China," he observed.

Wage cutting

Faced with this low-wage competition, Chaikin told the subcommittee, some employers "have reintroduced the sweatshop and its close relative, homework, in an effort to cut their wage costs. These employers evade the Fair Labor Standards Act now. The legalization of homework with a decreased enforcement capability invites them to continue breaking the law."

Legalizing homework, he warned, would be to "welcome back with open arms" the exploitation "that we tried to put behind us more than 40 years ago."

In a letter to Hatch, Labor Sec. Donovan said the Administration hasn't given up its efforts to ease industrial homework restrictions through deregulation.

He said the Labor Dept. is preparing a new effort to rewrite the regulations governing knitted outerwear. It has also asked the Justice Dept. to seek Supreme Court review of the appellate decision and to seek a court order that would let the regulations remain in effect pending Supreme Court consideration.

Sheet Metal union places members through job bank

The Sheet Metal Workers' nationwide jobs bank placed more than 500 of its unemployed members in jobs in its first three months, according to Larry Cassidy, executive assistant to the SMW president.

The computerized "job bank and out-of-work list" was created last October as a response to the high level of unemployment among the union's construction workers. Joblessness among the union's 100,000 construction workers has been running over 20 percent.

Under the program, limited to SMW's construction industry members, locals submit the names of unemployed members available for work and who are willing to travel to get a new job. The SMW also receives listings from locals which need craftsmen to fill positions.

Cassidy said interest in the program has been high as over 2,300 have been put on the computer list and 533 placed in jobs. Cassidy said the cost is minimal and an added benefit of the jobs bank has been its usefulness in organizing.

If a member is referred from a local covered under the SASMI (Stabilization Agreement for the Sheet Metal Industry) to another local covered by that agreement, the member is eligible for up to $750 as a travel benefit.

SASMI provides benefits to unemployed or "underemployed" members in locals that have negotiated it in their agreements. SASMI is funded through an employer contribution equal to 3 percent of wages.

The jobless list is updated monthly. When workers obtain work, their names are removed from the list. If those workers are again unemployed, they must resubmit their names.

At NAACP anniversary

Labor, civil rights tie stressed by Kirkland

New York — Social progress, jobs, fairness and equality of opportunity are goals shared by the labor movement and the civil rights movement but "these are not the goals of Ronald Reagan," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told participants at ceremonies marking the 75th anniversary of the NAACP.

Instead, he said, President Reagan "yearns for the 'good old days' before the Civil Rights Act, before the Fair Housing Act and Voting Rights Act, before the Occupational Safety & Health Act, before the Social Security Act, before the National Labor Relations Act."

Kirkland was the keynote speaker at the NAACP anniversary ceremonies at Mount Olivet Baptist Church to mark the founding in 1909 of the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization. More than 1,500 people attended the New York observance, one of several held around the country, which included tributes to the work of the NAACP woven with spirituals and the music of the civil rights struggle.

Kirkland told the gathering that Reagan "apparently believes that poverty builds character and that affirmative action, job training and even unemployment compensation deprive workers of their self-reliance."

Reagan's bias to rich

Reagan's sympathies "are reserved for the rich, upon whom he has lavished massive tax cuts," Kirkland said. The Administration favors health care, higher education and legal counsel "for those who can afford them. No others need apply."

He warned that it will take years to recover from the damage done by the Reagan Administration, "but if he gets four more years, recovery could elude us until the next century."

Pointing to the coming election, Kirkland told the audience "the important thing about the democratic system is not that people never make mistakes, but that mistakes can be corrected. There's always another chance, another election."

Kirkland stressed that the AFL-CIO intends "to do everything in our power" to work for election of a new President and a new Congress "that will restore the federal government to its proper role as an instrument of, by and for the people."

The labor federation's goal in 1984 "is to involve as many of our members as possible in every stage of the political process, and, together with our allies, to make our voices heard loud and clear."

He cited "a new spirit of hope and determination" that is bolstering election year efforts by labor and the civil rights movement. It is reflected, Kirkland said, in the voter registration drive being conducted by the NAACP with the support of the A. Philip Randolph Institute as well as AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central bodies.

"I am convinced," Kirkland told the gathering, "that we don't have to tell workers, minorities, the jobless and the poor how to vote. We have to tell them where to vote."

All the goals the labor movement and the NAACP have shared and fought for over the last 100 years are at stake in this "critical election," Kirkland declared.

Unfinished work

He also drew a parallel between the labor movement and the NAACP as organizations "built for the long haul" that understand that their work "is never finished."

Kirkland praised the NAACP for efforts that have "transformed life" for Americans.

"Millions of youngsters are growing up without ever having seen a 'whites only' sign over a public drinking fountain, or a fellow citizen turned away from a restaurant, or an employment office or college admission desk solely because of race," Kirkland said.

But while discrimination is no longer sanctioned by law, "it has not disappeared from our land," and 20 years after passage of the Civil Rights Act "inequality still blights the hopes and stunts the lives of black youngsters."

The difference today, he said, is that the "economic roots" of inequality are exposed, and it is clear that objectives like school desegregation and quality education, decent housing and nutrition and full employment cost money and require "economic investment of the highest order."

Goals the same

In his remarks, NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks stressed that the organization's members "are the long distance runners" in the struggle for civil rights progress, and that the NAACP's goals and convictions remain those it held at its founding.

The NAACP marks as its official birthday Feb. 12, 1909, the date of the "Lincoln Day Call" to a conference to discuss discrimination against black Americans. The original call, issued on the centennial of Lincoln's birth, was signed by 60 people—both black and white—among them ministers, educators, journalists, lawyers, politicians and social workers.

The first conference of what was then called the National Negro Committee was held in New York beginning on May 30, 1909, and culminating with a mass meeting at the city's historic Cooper Union building. The organization's name was changed to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in May 1910.

It's illegal, but this garment sweatshop was found in a New York apartment. Industrial homework would be legalized under a Reagan Administration-supported bill being considered by the Senate Labor subcommittee.

Dock workers at 33 seaports approve pact

Longshoremen at 33 Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports ratified a supplement to their already negotiated master contract, leavign only three other ports yet to approve the new provisions.

The supplement, on which agreement by union and management negotiators was reached last month, increases job security for ILA members by requiring vessel operating companies at the 36 ports to use only facilities employing union personnel.

The supplement is part of a master agreement that will expire Sept. 30, 1986. The coastwide accord calls for wage increases of $1 an hour in each year of the agreement and increased contributions to pension and welfare programs.

Ratification of the supplement got temporarily snagged over local issues at four struck ports—Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Wilmington, Del.—but ILA reported that progress was being made and the disputes appeared headed for resolution.

Four of five ILA locals in Baltimore voted overwhelmingly to accept the agreement and members began returning to work after a federal court ordered the fifth local to call off its walkout.

Philadelphia vote

Meanwhile, a ratification vote on a tentative agreement on local issues in Philadelphia and Wilmington, Del., was submitted to the members.

In Philadelphia, where negotiators also represent ILA members in Wilmington, the last remaining issue was that of hospital benefits.

Boston negotiators met Feb. 14 for the first time since they began their strike a week earlier. The key issue in dispute there was the guaranteed annual wage system.

Some 50,000 dockworkers are covered by the new master contract. Longshoremen in the bistate port of New York and New Jersey were the first to ratify the agreement. The port employs the largest number of ILA members.

Negotiations on both the master and local contracts were delayed last year by a dispute over the handling of containerized cargo. The union had previously negotiated measures to preserve members' jobs in handling the containerized cargo.

ILA members have been working under an interim contract that went into effect last Oct. 1. It had been scheduled to expire Jan. 31 but was extended to Feb. 8.

Coalition opens national campaign for protection against toxic risks

By Arlee C. Green

A nationwide campaign to petition Congress on "guaranteeing all Americans the right to be safe from harmful exposure to toxic substances" is being spearheaded by a coalition of more than 100 labor, consumer and environmental groups.

The National Campaign Against Toxic Hazards kicked off Feb. 13 in 55 cities and 25 states.

Labor's key concern in the coalition effort is to reduce workers' exposure to toxic substances.

"Every day, workers are exposed to potentially lethal doses of toxic substances on the job," Steelworkers Legislative Director John L. Sheehan told a press conference on Capitol Hill. "Guaranteeing our members the right to know and the right to be safe from toxic hazards is among the labor movement's most pressing concerns."

Sheehan charged that under the Reagan Administration, there has been a deliberate dismantling of "proven programs and measures" enacted to regulate injurious substances.

"The toxic crisis still exists, not only because we are in need of greater and more comprehensive measures to control the unregulated exposures, but because we are witnessing undercutting, underfunding underadministrating and, in some cases, outright malfeasance in the implementation of occupational and environmental laws," he warned.

AFL-CIO industrial hygienist Margaret Seminario pointed out that an estimated 100,000 American workers die each year and another 390,000 suffer illness from exposure to toxic hazards on the job.

"The AFL-CIO and its affiliates are working to reduce these threats to the health and safety of our members," she said. That effort includes a drive for effective state and local laws giving workers the right to know the hazards and identities of the chemicals they are exposed to in the workplace.

Coalition participants include the Service Employees, Electronics Workers, Machinists, Fire Fighters, Communications Workers, the State, County & Municipal Employees, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Industrial Union Dept.

Local union involvement

Hundreds of local unions are also participating as part of the coalitions that make up Citizen Action, Clean Water Action Project, plus dozens of other consumer, energy and environmental coalitions.

The goal of the campaign is to channel people's concerns into positive legislative and political action.

"We are launching a grass-roots education and petition drive, reaching into some 300 congressional districts. We will knock on doors in 1984 and ask people for their support for the campaign," said David Zwick, director of the Clean Water Action Project.

Labor's major concerns about toxic chemicals are contained in the coalition's 'bill of rights' petition which will gather signatures supporting legislative guarantees.

The coalition wants laws enacted to guarantee compensation for injuries caused by toxic substances, timely cleanup of toxic waste sites, elimination of hazardous emissions and wastes at their source, the right to participate in the decision-making process and the right to know the presence and effect of toxic chemicals in the workplace.

A legislative agenda of the national campaign calls for strengthening existing laws and enactment of comprehensive measures to reduce the hazards of toxic substances through recycling, resource recovery and other methods.

The campaign supports new Superfund measures requiring health studies and the release of information so the public can better participate in the decision-making. It also calls for amending of the Pesticide Act and Safe Drinking Water Act to require more testing.

Coalition representative at the Washington briefing branded the Reagan Administration's response to the threat from toxic substances "appalling."

Jacqueline Warren, of the Natural Resources Defense Council which is working with the AFL-CIO to gain effective standards for ethylene dibromide, said the Administration has failed to press for Superfund reauthorization or to strengthen toxic-related legislation. She charged that it has derailed efforts to regulate EDB and require cleanup of asbestos in schools, cut funding of the agencies charged with regulating toxic substances and set up weak regulations designed to preempt state and local right-to-know laws.

Mondale caucuses in Ohio elect union-backed delegates

Columbus, Ohio—Ninety-nine of the 105 delegates who were elected in the Ohio Democratic pre-primary caucuses and pledged to the presidential candidacy of Walter F. Mondale, are either union members or endorsed by labor.

Full labor slates were elected in 16 of the 21 congressional districts as more than 5,000 trade unionists took part in the Mondale caucuses on Feb. 9.

Of the 99 Mondale delegates, 83 are union members, and of the 34 alternates selected, 24 are union members and another five were backed by labor.

Among the delegates elected in Akron's 14th congressional district were Milan Stone, president of the Rubber Workers and Frank Martino, president of the Chemical Workers.

In all, two dozen AFL-CIO unions are represented among the Mondale delegates.

State federation President Milan Marsh noted that a broadly coordinated COPE effort helped put together an effective political program for the caucuses.

Ohio will have 175 delegates attending the Democratic National Convention in July. The state Democratic Party will appoint the 70 remaining delegates with some being at-large delegates based on the percentage of the vote Mondale receives in the May 8 primary election.

Caucuses were also held Feb. 9 for delegates committed to presidential contenders Sen. John Glenn, Sen. Alan Cranston, Sen. Gary Hart and Jesse Jackson. Ohio presidential primary will be held May 8.

Meanwhile in New Hampshire, labor volunteers for Mondale were staffing telephone banks in preparation for the Feb. 28 primary.

The state federation said some 4,000 members would be contacted in their workplaces before the primary by shop stewards and union leaders.

Screen Actors vote on merger plan

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild is conducting a new referendum on a merger with the Screen Extras Guild. SAG members narrowly defeated a similar proposal last year.

The merger plan was approved by the Screen Extras by better than a 3-to-1 ratio in March 1983.

At least 60 percent approval is needed from the 48,000 SAG members voting in the referendum. Last year, 56.7 percent of the ballots favored merger.

The merger plan has the support of the Actors & Artistes, a federation of nine AFL-CO performer unions including SAG and SEG.

The Council of Actors' Equity voted its unanimous support of the SAG and SEG merger. The boards of both those unions also have endorsed the merger.

Labor fights bid to kill broadcast 'fairness doctrine'

The AFL-CIO opposes repeal of the fairness doctrine and equal time requirements for television and radio broadcasts, Special Counsel Laurence Gold testified at Senate Commerce Committee hearings.

Gold opposed a bill by Committee Chairman Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) to repeal the requirement that competing candidates get an equal opportunity to present their views or buy time, and that persons or organizations criticized on the air get a reasonable opportunity to reply.

Labor's position is based "on hard, practical experience," Gold testified.

Best hope

"Over the years," he said, "trade unions have found that the fairness doctrine, though feeble, is the best hope of assuring that commercial television and radio stations air labor's side on controversial issues," especially bargaining disputes and issues of worker rights.

Without such a requirement, he saw nothing to justify the "pious belief" that labor's position will continue to be heard.

Gold challenged the free-speech issue raised by supporters of the Packwood bill, who contend that the "free speech" of the owners of broadcasting stations is restricted if they have to let the other side be heard.

The determining factor, he suggested, is that the government initially selects a broadcast licensee from among applicants competing for broadcast frequencies and then bars all but the chosen licensee from using the assigned frequency.

In practice, Gold insisted, the fairness doctrine enhances rather than restricts the principle of free speech.

Fairy tales and arithmetic at the new Chinatown day care center.

Union day care in Chinatown

New York—Ladies' Garment Workers Local 23-25 is meeting its members' family needs through the Garment Industry Day Care Center of Chinatown, the first in the city to serve workers in a single industry and the first operated here with a combination of private and public funds.

The center provides care Monday through Friday for 70 pre-school children whose parents work in shops organized by the ILGWU local.

The program is the fruit of 10 years of effort by the local to get day care services for its members' children. The center provides food, entertainment and instruction with funds from the Greater Blouse, Skirt & Undergarment Association, an industry group, along with the Oriental Garment Manufacturers Association, individual employers and through a federal grant obtained by New York City's Human Resources Administration.

Local 23-25 represents about 18,000 workers—mostly women—in New York's Chinatown garment shops. Talks with employers about launching a center began in 1974. Finally, management agreed that funding a center would help stabilize the area's workforce, the ILGWU said.

The union said garment shops provide income to six out of every 10 Chinese families in Chinatown and to 40 percent of the Chinese families in New York City.

The city's human resources agency estimates that day care for a child in New York costs about $82 a week. The ILGWU said that about $44 of a week's care at the garment industry center comes from public funding, $32 from private resources and an average of $6 from the parents, who pay a small fee linked to family income.

The center admitted its first children last November, and the current enrollment was selected by a lottery from about 200 applicants. The staff includes a teacher, an assistant teacher and four aides.

UAW signs pact covering 4,800 aircraft workers

Long Beach, Calif.—Members of the Auto Workers returned to their jobs at the McDonnell Douglas Corp. aircraft assembly plant here after approving a new three-year contract providing for wage and pension hikes.

Acceptance of the pact ended a strike by 4,800 aerospace workers that began last Oct. 17. The settlement is identical to a contract approved last fall by the Machinists at Torrance and Huntington Beach, Calif., and in addition includes an agreement by the employer to negotiate over a profit-sharing plan.

The settlement calls for lump-sum payments of 3 percent of annual pay each year, plus pay increases of 8 to 72 cents an hour for skilled workers, and an increase from $15 to $17 in monthly pension benefits multiplied by an employee's years of service.

The contract terms accepted by both IAM and the UAW at McDonnell Douglas follow a pattern in the current round of aerospace negotiations set last October with the Boeing Corp. The Machinists, however, later negotiated a more favorable agreement with Lockheed that preserved cost-of-living protection for all employees, provided eventual wage parity for new employees hired at lower rates, and raised monthly pension benefits slightly higher than at Boeing.

The new UAW pact at McDonnell Douglas limits full COL protection to about 70 percent of the workforce and calls for lower rates for new hires. The agreement is similar to ones accepted late last month by smaller UAW units in Tulsa, Okla., and Melbourne, Ark.

Congress urged to halt purge of needy on disability benefits

Congressional action is needed to stop the unjustified cancellation of social security disability benefits, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged in a letter to Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.).

A purge of disability insurance beneficiaries launched early in the Reagan Administration as a cost-cutting measure resulted in abrupt cutoff of benefits to many thousands of seriously disabled persons—and spurred congressional and public protest.

Denison noted that stopgap legislation and some administrative improvements helped relieve the situation, but he stressed that "serious problems remain." He found "particularly disturbing a recent statement by Health & Human Services Sec. Margaret Heckler that 23 percent of disability insurance recipients whose cases are scheduled for review will be removed from the benefit rolls as ineligible.

"Legislation is imperative to ensure fair, accurate and humane review for all disability insurance beneficiaries," Denison insisted, for "new applicants as well as for the victims of the Continuing Disability Investigation program."

Denison said the AFL-CIO supports the thrust of a House bill sponsored by Rep. J. J. Pickle (D-Tex.) and a more limited Senate bill by William S. Cohen (R-Me.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.). He urged that the legislation commit the Social Security Administration to the following standards in evaluating disability:

- No benefits should be ended unless the recipient's medical condition has improved or the original decision to grant benefits was fraudulent or clearly in error.
- The disability evaluation should consider the combined efforts of all impairment, even if no single condition would be considered disabling. Also, there should be a "realistic evaluation" of the person's ability to function in a competitive work environment.
- The evaluation should consider evidence as to intensity and persistence of pain.
- A moratorium should be imposed on further investigations of persons listed as mentally disabled until there are fair and appropriate procedures for such an evaluation.
- Benefits should be continued during an appeal of a disqualification through the administrative law judge level and a face-to-face interview should be held at the start of a review.

New guide published on union scholarships

A 1984 guide to union-sponsored scholarships, student financial aid and awards has been published by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. The 88-page guide lists more than 2,000 scholarships worth $2.5 million, including some individual scholarships that range up to $10,000.

Although most scholarships are reserved for union members and their families, some are available to the general public.

Single copies are available to AFL-CIO union members without charge. For all others, the cost of the guide is $3. Orders are being handled by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Labor backs plan to curb medical costs

The legislation would require physicians to accept the Medicare reimbursement in full payment, for both in-hospital and outpatient care. They would be barred from billing Medicare patients for additional amounts. The restriction would not apply to out-of-hospital treatment of non-Medicare patients.

A fact sheet in support of the Kennedy-Gephardt bill noted that health care costs amounted to 5.3 percent of the gross national product in 1960, reached 7.5 percent of GNP in 1970 and jumped to 10.5 percent in 1982.

Without legislation, it warned, the Medicare fund would be heading toward a cumulative deficit of more than $1 trillion by the year 2005 "under the most likely economic assumptions." With it, the sponsors asserted, there would be a net surplus over the same period.

The National Council of Senior Citizens said its state affiliates have already launched campaigns in support of the Kennedy-Gephardt bill. Its enactment is needed, Executive Director William R. Hutton said, to control health care costs without raising taxes or cutting the health care programs for the elderly and poor.

Douglas A. Fraser, speaking as chairman of the Health Security Action Council, said the Reagan Administration's approach to rising health costs is to cut back coverage and increase patient fees. Fraser, who is president-emeritus of the Auto Workers warned of "even more drastic cutbacks . . . if the present Administration is re-elected."

U.S. district judge swats phony 'bug' of non-union firm

Providence, R.I.—A non-union printer using a phony union label was ordered by a federal judge to stop putting the bogus "bug" on its products.

Judge Bruce M. Selya of the U.S. District Court for Rhode Island ordered Arrow Printing Co. to stop using an illegal "union label" sold to the firm by the so-called American Independent Lithographers Union, Inc. (AILU). Judge Selya held that using the phony label, which is similar in shape to bona fide printing trades union labels, infringed on trademark protections because it was deceptive and confusing. The suit was brought by the Graphic Communications Union.

Selling labels

AILU, a private company, was in business for several years, selling "union labels" to non-union printers for an annual fee so they could put a "bug" on their work without having any union contracts.

But in 1982, in another suit brought by GCIU and the Allied Printing Trades, a federal court ordered the company to stop selling the bogus labels and inform anyone who had bought one about the injunction against its further use.

Arrow Printing Co. said it never got the notice and continued using the bug, but it was spotted last May by GCIU Local 39P on an invitation to a political fundraiser in Providence. When the company refused an answer to the union's inquiries about the label, GCIU sued.

In his decision, Judge Selya pointed out that the appearance of a legitimate union label on printed materials is very important to many potential customers, and the company's use of a phony label amounted to a "course of conduct calculated to deceive and mislead prospective customers into thinking that his goods are the products of a unionized establishment."

The judge ordered Arrow to stop using the AILU mark, or any other mark that looks like any GCIU label, and he told the company to turn over the AILU bug and any printed goods it appears on to GCIU so they can be "squashed."

A small local thwarts union-busting attempt

nize the union, or deduct union dues from paychecks.

Meanwhile, the company reopened a second plant in Midvale that it had closed in April and advertised for new workers without notifying the union. One of those who had been laid off—a shop steward and a member of the union's negotiating team—applied and was told her employment would be conditioned on her refraining from union activity. The NLRB later found this warning to be "inherently coercive and violative" of the National Labor Relations Act.

Legal claim

Next the company called a meeting of employees at which Burket introduced Blankenship as a labor lawyer, "very experienced in labor law." In fact, Lightell says, Blankenship is not a lawyer at all.

At any rate, Blankenship told the workers that Local 662 no longer represented them and claimed that through a "disclaimer by silence" it had indicated its unwillingness to represent the employees. He indicated that Flex henceforth would deal with the workers through the new shop committee. The committee reached a new three-year agreement with the company in January 1981, and in a certification election four days later, it defeated the union by two votes.

After a series of appeals, the NLRB found in February 1983 that Flex's "unfair labor practices were widespread, touched all of the employees, and spanned virtually the entire period from the withdrawal of recognition in July 1980 to the decertification election in February 1981.

Rights violated

"They demonstrated a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights and therefore warrant the imposition of a broad injunctive order," which included a directive to dissolve the shop committee and restore recognition of Local 662 as the workers' exclusive bargaining agent.

Instead of complying with the NLRB order, Flex kept Blankenship on the payroll and appealed to the courts.

In upholding the NLRB, the 6th Circuit Court ruled that a union once certified as a bargaining representative is presumed to have majority support among unit employees. The court added that to rebut the presumption of majority status, an employer must demonstrate that it has a "bona fide belief that the union no longer has the support of a majority of employees." In this case, the court said, Flex had no basis for such a belief.

"The fact of stalled contract negotiations cannot be the basis for the good faith belief that a union has lost majority support," the court added. "Neither does the fact of the filing of a decertification petition alone justify the belief that the union has lost majority support."

The court specifically upheld NLRB's finding that Blankenship's speech to the Flex workers constituted illegal coercion.

Blankenship is still serving Flex management as a "consultant" and may sit in on new contract talks that are set to begin Feb. 24.

Lightell estimates the company has paid Blankenship more than $100,000 in the past four years, though he says the exact figure is hard to pin down. Company figures filed with the Labor Dept., however, show he was paid more than $33,000 in 1980 and 1981 alone. Data for the past two years are not available.

Lightell sees recognition of Local 662 and the order to the company to bargain as a solid victory for the union and says the lengthy litigation was well worth the effort.

"We've got to defeat these people in every way we can," he said. "We're running into them all the time. Blankenship is the third union-busting 'consultant' I've run into during the past two years.

"Their style may be different, but they're up to the same thing as Blankenship—to break us."

Long history

Blankenship has a union-busting record in the Midwest dating back more than a decade. But his past seems to be catching up with him. Another Blankenship client, Mark Twain Marine Industries, Inc., of West Frankfurt, Ill., paid him $18,000 for "legal services" but ended up paying $200,000 in backpay growing out of unfair practices against members of Laborers Local 87.

And in federal court early last year, Blankenship signed an unusual consent decree in which he promised not to hold himself out to be an attorney and not to "induce any employer to violate or repudiate its collective bargaining agreement with a labor organization representing its employees."

25,000-member Ohio union votes AFSCME affiliation

Columbus, Ohio — A special convention of the 25,000-member Ohio Association of Public School Employees (OAPSE) voted to affiliate with the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The 700 delegates approved affiliation by a 9-1 margin and presentation of an AFSCME charter to OAPSE officers concluded the Feb. 11 convention.

The union is the largest public employee unit in Ohio and represents school bus drivers, clerical workers, food service workers and custodial employees in some 350 school districts across the state.

The affiliation boosts AFSCME's membership in Ohio to 75,000. Last June, the 17,000-member Ohio Civil Service Employees Association voted by referendum to become part of AFSCME.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said the union plans to launch a statewide organizing campaign to unionize other school board workers throughout Ohio.

McEntee pointed out that when Ohio's new public employee collective bargaining rights law takes effect Apr. 1, there will be a flurry of organizing activity and representation elections in the state. He called Ohio "our number one organizing priority nationwide for 1984." About 500,000 people work for state and local governments in Ohio.

Talks that led to the affiliation of OAPSE began late last year following passage of the new bargaining law. The OAPSE executive board voted last December to seek the affiliation and issued the call for the special convention. OAPSE has represented school board employees for about 50 years. The union said a key consideration in seeking affiliation with an AFL-CIO union was the "no-raiding" protections offered by Article XX of the federation's constitution.

Survey finds teacher pay still lags

The average public school teacher's salary in 1982-83 rose 8.5 percent to $20,547, but the increase has not offset earlier losses to salary erosion, a study by the American Federation of Teachers found.

AFT President Albert Shanker attributed the gains in the last school year to a long-overdue "catchup period we are experiencing in teacher salaries."

AFT Research Director James Ward noted that in terms of real, or constant, dollars, average teacher salaries have fallen 3.6 percent over the last five years and 10.6 percent since a decade ago.

The AFT report is based on the latest available information from state departments of education and other data sources.

Ward said the average salary figure overstates salary gains made by typical teachers because of layoffs in many school districts that affected less senior and thus lower-paid teachers.

Teachers also have fallen behind in comparison to median family income, the AFT study revealed. In 1971-72, the average teacher salary was 93 percent of the U.S. median family income for 1971. By 1982-83, the figure had dropped to 86 percent.

Highlights of the new AFT study show that:

- The highest average classroom teacher salary was found in Alaska, $35,297, where the cost of living is one-third higher than in the rest of the country. After Alaska was the District of Columbia, $25,610; Hawaii, $25,308; New York, $25,000; Michigan, $25,304, and California, $23,935.
- Mississippi had the lowest average salary, $14,230, followed by Arkansas, $15,029; Vermont, $15,328; New Hampshire, $15,360, and South Dakota, $15,592.
- In only three states did the average salary for teachers go up more than $3,000 since the last school year: Minnesota, from $19,480 to $22,875; Alaska, from $31,986 to $35,297, and Wyoming, from $20,550 to $23,822. By contrast, the average went up only $185 in Mississippi and $193 in West Virginia.
- Teacher salaries in the South Atlantic region were generally below the national average, while the east south central region had the lowest figures. No state in the west south central region exceeded the national average. Teachers in the Pacific region led the country in average earnings.
- Between 1978-79 and 1982-83, average teacher salaries went up $5,577, or 37.3 percent. The largest dollar gainers were Alaska, $24,150 to $35,297, and Wyoming, $14,469 to $23,822.

In Alaska and Wyoming, teachers benefited from windfall state revenues resulting from severance taxes on gas and oil extraction, Ward said.

Massachusetts took the greatest dive in rank comparisons since 1978-79, AFT noted. It fell from sixth highest in the nation to 22nd, largely because of a tax and spending limitation law passed four years ago.

Copies of the report are available from AFT's Research Dept., 11 Dupont Circle, NW, Washington, D.C. 20036. A more detailed study of teacher salaries, with comparisons to other professions and district-by-district data for over 75 school districts will be published in March.

Black unionists spur Mondale support

The first phase of an election year strategy to increase the participation of black union members in the presidential primaries and caucuses has been kicked off by AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84.

The committee of black trade union leaders scheduled the first of a series of strategy sessions and workshops for union officers and staff in key regions with early Democratic events.

The committee's national coordinator, Velma Hill, said the focus at each of the meetings will be on internal activities to bolster support for Walter Mondale among black AFL-CIO union members and their families.

The first formal meeting in Washington earlier this month drew nearly 200 black unionists from 35 AFL-CIO affiliates.

The committee scheduled its first regional meeting for Feb. 19 in Jacksonville, Fla., to plan activities leading up to the Mar. 13 primaries in Alabama, Florida and Georgia.

Meetings are also set for Mar. 4 in Fresno, Calif., Mar 24 in Nashville, Tenn., and Apr. 3 at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md.

Hill said the committee will also meet during the AFL-CIO regional conferences on Mar. 2 in Miami and Mar. 9 in Chicago.

Strategy sessions

The strategy sessions, Hill noted, will bring together AFL-CIO black trade union leaders along with the committee's congressional district coordinators and local union representatives.

Workshops at the sessions will focus on union voter education, information and get-out-the vote activities.

Hill said the committee has targeted many of its activities to key congressional districts with large black AFL-CIO union memberships. It will also focus on districts where the black AFL-CIO population is smaller, but where increased participation by union members can affect the outcome of a primary or caucus.

She pointed out that the committee's efforts will be coordinated by COPE throughout the election process.

The cochairs of AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84 are AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson of the Government Employees, Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees, Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch, AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, president of the Actors & Artistes, and Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp.

Food prices key factor in wholesale rise

Wholesale prices rose six-tenths of 1 percent in January, their biggest increase in 14 months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The January increase, which was as much as the entire increase in the government's producer price index for all of 1983, "was principally due to a substantial advance in consumer food prices," BLS said.

The consumer foods component of the producer index jumped 2.7 percent in January, a sharp acceleration from the seven-tenths of 1 percent rise posted in December.

Prices for capital equipment rose only one-tenth of 1 percent, and prices for non-food finished goods were unchanged over the month, BLS said.

Prices for intermediate goods, which still require some processing, rose one-tenth of 1 percent in January after rising at the same rate in December. Prices for crude goods rose seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month, after rising one-tenth of 1 percent in the previous month.

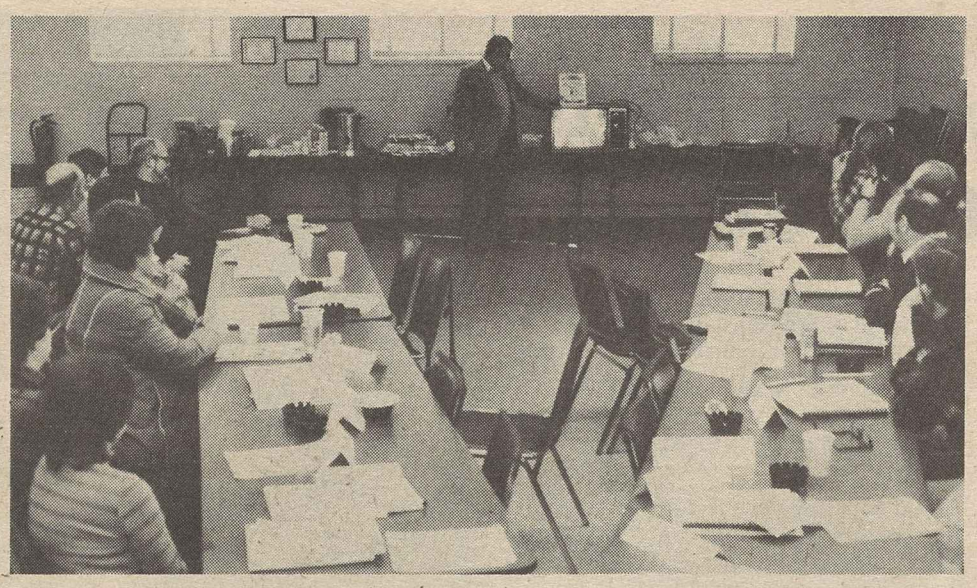
The bulge in food prices was the largest one-month jump since August 1980. Pork prices climbed 9.2 percent, compared to a rise of 5.2 percent in December. Beef, veal and fish prices also were up. BLS attributed the higher meat prices to cold weather which killed cattle or kept their weight down and disrupted the delivery of hogs.

Prices for processed fruits and vegetables also rose rapidly last month, in part because of crops damaged by the late-December freeze in growing areas.

Energy prices declined 1.2 percent in January, the sixth drop in the last seven months, and prices of other goods held relatively stable.

The big jump in food prices is expected to boost consumer prices in the coming months.

The producer price index measures changes in prices of goods that are ready for retail sale. The price changes at this level generally foreshadow changes that will be seen at the consumer level, although it is hard to pinpoint how fast these changes appear.



Communications Workers stewards at a training session in Buffalo, N.Y., watch a segment of "America Works," the AFL-CIO's weekly public affairs television program, for a discussion on the use of television to communicate with both union members and the general public.

Labor television programs draw high viewer ratings

Studies conducted for the Labor Institute of Public Affairs found that a large proportion of cable television viewers—both union and non-union households—would watch a labor-oriented cable TV program.

One survey also showed that union households account for one of every five current cable TV subscribers.

The viewer studies were conducted for the AFL-CIO's television production arm by two national television research firms, the ELRA Group and Arbitron Ratings.

The ELRA Group's "CableMark Probe Survey" studied the reactions of 2,008 television viewers in 100 cable systems nationwide, including both subscribers and non-subscribers. The study, designed to be representative of national viewing patterns, found that 22 percent of cable subscribers are union households.

LIPA Executive Director Larry Kirkman said this finding points to a significant and continued interest in cable television by union members since many large, urban areas where most of the nation's 20 million union members live are not yet served by cable franchises.

The ELRA Group research also showed that 47 percent of all the households surveyed expressed interest in a cable television series "specially produced for working people," and 53 percent of cable viewers said they would like to see a labor news program on their systems. LIPA said the data on viewer interest compare favorably with viewer interest in such services as contemporary music, women's programming, culture, education courses and financial news.

The ELRA study also focused on specific viewer reaction to LIPA's 10-week experimental labor cable series, "Cableline," which was seen on cable channels in Atlanta, Pittsburgh and Seattle last fall.

In a sample of 800 actual viewers, ELRA found that a high percentage of viewers gave the daily series high marks, including 87 percent of union members and 73 percent of non-members who found the weekly newscast interesting and informative. Of those viewers, 71 percent said the "LaborVision" news program was "as good or better" than any other cable programming on their systems. CableLine's "Images of Labor" documentary series was praised by 90 percent of union viewers and 79 percent of non-member viewers.

These results parallel findings from Arbitron Ratings which studied reactions to "America Works," LIPA's half-hour weekly public affairs program broadcast in 1983 and early 1984 on 36 commercial stations reaching about 60 percent of U.S. viewers.

In that study, 87 percent of 314 actual viewers in Detroit, Cincinnati and Nashville rated "America Works" interesting and worth watching again, and the viewers said they would also be likely to watch other television programs that discuss the concerns of workers.

Kirkman said the results from the two studies confirm that "there is an audience of union members and other workers who want television that reflects their concerns, problems, hopes and dreams as workers." He said LIPA will use the findings in planning new labor-oriented television programming.

14 states post double-digit jobless rates

The states with double-digit unemployment—three more than the month before—were Alabama, Alaska, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Washington, West Virginia, plus Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia.

Among the states, West Virginia posted the highest rate—at 15.7 percent. Puerto Rico still led all major jurisdictions with a rate of 20.4 percent. The lowest rates were reported by Connecticut, 4.5 percent, Kansas, 4.9 percent, and New Hampshire, 4.3 percent. State and local employment data are not adjusted for seasonal variations.

Michigan reported a jobless rate of 11.9 percent for December. The state has registered unemployment rates of 10 percent or more for four full years, making it the state with the most prolonged period of high joblessness.

West Virginia has had double-digit rates for the past three years.

The most widespread employment gains last year were in services and wholesale and retail trade, where most states posted increases, the government said. Employment in mining, construction, transportation and public utilities was higher in about half the states.

Rate declines

Unemployment rates fell by 2 percentage points or more in 23 states between December 1982 and December 1983, the Labor Dept. said. In contrast, during the recession year of 1982 jobless rates increased in all 50 states and the District of Columbia.

Jobless rates fell by 2 percentage points or more over the year ended last December in 101 of the 231 metropolitan areas for which data were available. Areas with the largest decreases were Youngstown, Ohio, and Racine, Wis. The area with the largest over-the-year increase was Lubbock, Tex.

The highest area jobless rate last December was in Laredo, Tex., 22 percent. The McAllen-Pharr-Edinburg, Tex., area was next at 19.2 percent. Both rates reflected the continuing labor market problems on the U.S.-Mexican border, the government said.

Health coverage continued for Crucible Steel retirees

Midland, Pa.—The Steelworkers reached agreement with Colt Industries on maintaining health care coverage for several thousand pensioners and their families that the company threatened to cut off.

The agreement extends the benefits through June 30, 1985, and defers a USWA lawsuit that accused the company of breaking its contract with the union.

Colt theatened to eliminate medical benefits for 4,118 retirees, 3,168 spouses and 1,180 dependents on Feb. 4 if no new plan could be negotiated to curb health care insurance costs. Colt claimed it was no longer contractually obligated to pay health benefits after 1983 for workers who retired from the company's Crucible Steel plants in Midland, Pa., and Pittsburgh.

Under the new agreement, the company will continue to fully pay for medical insurance through March 1984, at which time each family will incur monthly premiums ranging from $5 to $25 depending on whether one or both spouses are eligible for Medicare. In addition, $25 deductibles have been instituted for the first four emergency room visits, a $100 deductible for the first day of a hospital stay and a $300 deductible limit for each family.

The new agreement, which was approved by pensioners, was added as a stipulation to the union's suit before the U.S. District Court for Western Pennsylvania. The stipulation calls for the union and the company to "use their best efforts to implement a second opinion for surgery and pre-admission certification requirements."

A grass-roots campaign by the union, the pensioners and their families focused public attention on the company's efforts to end the medical coverage as national media offices were flooded with handwritten letters describing the retirees' plight.

Had the company been successful in ending the benefits, the pensioners would have had to pay more than $210 a month for comparable health insurance coverage.

Ohio unionist named to state employee board

Columbus, Ohio—William P. Sheehan, executive secretary-treasurer of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO, has been appointed to the State Employment Relations Board by Gov. Richard Celeste.

The three-member panel will administer the state's new public sector collective bargaining law which goes into effect in April 1984.

Sheehan is taking a leave of absence from the city central body to serve on the state board and Rep. Dan Radford of the Firemen & Oilers is serving as acting secretary-treasurer.

Three other unionists were appointed to the Public Employment Advisory & Counseling Effort Commission in Ohio. They are Joyce Wollenberg of the Auto Workers, Robert Brindza of the State, County & Municipal Employees and Richard Loy of the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Frank Fernbach dies, noted labor economist

Frank L. Fernbach, a highly regarded economist with a lifelong commitment to the labor movement, died of cancer Feb. 15 at the age of 73.

Before his retirement in 1976, Fernbach served as assistant to former Steelworkers President I. W. Abel. His ties with the union date back to 1937, when he joined the staff of the new CIO Steel Workers Organizing Committee after receiving his economics degree from the University of Wisconsin. He worked as an organizer and as a union educator.

After World War II, he joined the CIO staff as assistant research director and held the same post after the AFL-CIO merger.

Fernbach returned to the Steelworkers in 1967.

Survivors are his wife Ann and two sons.

UAW, Ford offer worker education, training programs

Dearborn, Mich.—The Auto Workers and Ford Motor Co. are providing an education and training program for the company's 109,000 active employees represented by the union, as well as an expansion of educational aid to laid-off workers.

UAW members at Ford plants may choose from six "personal development" programs including pre-paid tuition assistance of up to $1,000 for formal education, career and educational counseling, basic skills education, a college-level associate degree program, pre-retirement counseling and other specialized education and training opportunities.

The UAW and Ford will also establish three new re-employment assistance centers to help some 13,000 laid-off Ford workers in Michigan.

The centers will offer vocational and educational counseling, retraining programs, job placement and referrals to community agencies.

Similar centers are already in place in Sheffield, Ala., and San Jose, Calif., where workers have lost their jobs to plant closings.

The UAW said about 5,000 laid-off Ford employees in other areas have participated in the employee development and training programs that have been funded by the company under the 1982 UAW-Ford contract.

A Radical-Right Bomb

IT'S TIME to defuse a ticking bomb that could wreck the economy, demolish the Constitution, or both.

The threat comes from a decade-long effort by right-wing groups to get an absolutely phony "balanced budget amendment" written into the U.S. Constitution.

It is a clear and present danger because 32 of the required 34 states have petitioned for a constitutional convention to initiate such an amendment. And there are heavy pressures to get legislatures in two more states to go along.

So phony is the amendment that President Reagan gives it his enthusiastic support—even as he sends Congress budgets that project deficits vastly greater than those of any previous administration. So much for right-wing rhetoric.

The threat, of course, is not from the rhetoric. The very real danger is that:

(1) A constitutional convention with uncertain powers will be convened under an amendment procedure authorized by the Constitution but never before used. Not even constitutional scholars agree on whether there are any limits on the type of constitutional changes that a runaway convention could initiate.

(2) To avoid the perils of a constitutional convention, members of Congress who know better will nevertheless approve an amendment that would be unworkable and mischievous at best, counting on the good sense of state legislatures to refuse to ratify it.

(3) Whether proposed by constitutional convention or by Congress, such an amendment will be ratified by the states. With all the clamor about huge Reagan deficits, what legislator wants to be stuck with a vote against a balanced budget?

IN 1982, the AFL-CIO Executive Council launched an emergency grass-roots campaign that was instrumental in defeating the balanced budget amendment in the House of Representatives —after it had sailed through the Senate. But the nature of the beast makes this a perpetual battle.

True, most of the 32 state resolutions for a constitutional convention were adopted in 1975 or soon thereafter, before the threat was fully recognized. But they remain in effect, nevertheless.

Constitutional amendments adopted by Congress and submitted to the states for ratification normally carry a time limit. But there is no such limit on petitions for a convention. So the bomb keeps ticking.

One solution, which AFL-CIO central bodies are pushing in states where it seems feasible, is action by legislatures to withdraw petitions for a constitutional convention that were adopted years ago.

That makes sense—much more sense than for Congress to let itself get blackmailed into approving the amendment as supposedly a "lesser evil" than a constitutional convention.

The members of state legislatures and of Congress know or should know by now that they are endangering both the Constitution and the prospect for economic stability by supporting such an amendment.

They should also be made aware that a big hunk of their constituents know this also.

No Price Tag

SOME POLITICAL writers have tried to put a dollar figure on the supposed "value" of the AFL-CIO's endorsement to Walter Mondale's presidential candidacy.

Several of the estimates have been highly flattering, but they all miss the point.

It is not dollars that the trade union movement brings to the Mondale campaign. It is the enthusiasm of working men and women.

That enthusiasm cannot be purchased or traded. It must be earned.

And Fritz Mondale has earned it.

New Reagan attack likely on social security benefits

By Press Associates, Inc.

If President Reagan is re-elected, will he continue to beat up on the elderly and the disabled by attacking their social security health and disability benefits?

That would appear to be in the cards.

There will be a search for big cutbacks in 1985 to try to bring Reagan's record deficits under control and avert another severe recession. It was Reagan's 1981 tax cuts of $750 billion for business and the rich, depriving the government of revenue, along with the military build-up and deep recession that sank the nation into red ink.

So now, just as Reagan and budget chief David Stockman saw the old age pension crisis as an opportunity to carve out billions in cutbacks in 1981, they see the Medicare crisis and disability programs as new opportunities.

They miscalculated the political factor on social security in 1981. A storm of protest swept the nation. The Senate rejected the Reagan cutback proposals, 96-0.

Still, Stockman confessed in the famous Atlantic magazine interview in late 1981 that Reagan "believed it was the right thing to do" to cut social security. If it could be done over, Stockman said, "you should have the President go on TV and give a 20-minute fireside chat, with some nice charts . . . You could have created a climate in which major things could be changed."

Bipartisan reforms

In 1983, bipartisan reform of the old age insurance program was achieved through difficult compromises.

In a recent issue of Fortune magazine, Stockman offered his assessment of budget problems.

Asked what went wrong, Stockman said: "Our biggest failure was that we didn't create a much bigger and better package of spending cuts in the beginning. We should have gone after the big boulders—the social insurance programs. The rest of the budget is thousands of little pebbles."

If Reagan is re-elected, will he attack the entitlement programs? Stockman told Fortune, "There are a lot of dreamers on this point, including in the Administration."

Next year's targets

Stockman recently told Congress that targets for cutbacks in 1985 should include Medicare and Medicaid, veterans' health care, federal jobs and pensions, student aid and farm price supports.

For his part, candidate Reagan may be a dreamer but he is keeping mum. In a Wall Street Journal interview, Reagan recalled that his social security snafu "became the political issue of 1982." The Democrats gained 26 House seats, with voters citing high unemployment and the threat to social security as their chief concerns.

Reagan has been carrying on a "war on social security" for 20 years, according to Ronnie Dugger in his book, "On Reagan."

"If he is re-elected, he can be expected to continue to carve away on it," Dugger writes. "He favors a new system; he wants social security cut down to the poor and then, no doubt, the remnant transferred to the states or anyplace else where it will disappear. . . . He would like to see it destroyed."

But Reagan may have been outsmarted by Franklin D. Roosevelt, who regarded the Social Security Act as one of his greatest achievements. He favored a payroll tax for social security for a reason.

"We put those payroll contributions there so as to give the contributors a legal, moral and political right to collect their pensions and their unemployment benefits," Roosevelt said. "With those taxes in there, no damn politician can ever scrap my social security program."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Issues Are Moving in Congress on a Fast Election-Year Timetable

Congress is not expected to get much accomplished between summer and the November election, because members will wish to be back home campaigning as much as possible. So the House and Senate are focusing their attention to conclude action this spring on the top priorities.

Please urge your legislators to support labor's point of view on the following issues. Write now, while there is still time to affect the outcome.

CORPORATIONS' 'FAKE 'BANKRUPTCIES': AFL-CIO WORKS TO SEE LAW CLARIFIED, INJUSTICES ENDED

Continental Airlines Chairman Francisco Lorenzo, after he declared the airline bankrupt, fired two-thirds of its unionized employees, cut wages and benefits by 50 percent for the remaining workers, and tore up the pension plan and other collectively bargained rights, now says that the situation has improved. By the end of 1984 the airline will no longer be bankrupt, he says.

Apparently Lorenzo thinks bankruptcy is like a light switch. Flick, bankruptcy on, rip up your contracts, hire strikebreakers, flick, bankruptcy off, all better.

This is not the way the law was designed to work. The law has held that a simple desire to fire a unionized work force and replace it with non-union workers is not a good enough reason to declare bankruptcy. Bankruptcy is meant as an escape hatch for companies in terrible financial shape. If that is the case, unions are willing to negotiate in order to save jobs. And if the company does file for bankruptcy, union contracts should have priority over the company's bills.

The case of Continental and a few others are aberrations; the question is how to get a Republican Senate to do something to clarify the law. The AFL-CIO is working to find an acceptable way to prevent any more end-runs around the law.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative and Senators to support clarification of corporate bankruptcy law to prevent abuse in cases like Continental or Wilson Foods.

KIRKLAND SPEAKS OUT AGAINST DEATH SQUADS, FOR HUMAN RIGHTS IN EL SALVADOR

The Reagan Administration has drawn a hard anti-Communist line in Central America, but is very quiet regarding political murders occurring in El Salvador at a rate of about 40,000 since 1979. The AFL-CIO has been in the forefront of efforts to promote agrarian reform in that country while putting a stop to the bloodshed.

AFL-CIO President Kirkland, as a member of the so-called Kissinger Commission, broke the polite protocol when he had a chance to confront Roberto D'Aubuisson, currently a top candidate for President of El Salvador and by almost all accounts a key figure in the esquadres de muerte--death squads.

Kirkland stood up to D'Aubuisson, and later insisted that the Central American Commission's official report back "conditioning." That is, conditioning U.S. dollars, without which the Salvadoran government could not survive, on a real--not just rhetorical--end to the murders.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: The House already has voted to hinge U.S. military aid to Salvador on a crackdown against the death squads. Urge your Senators to do the same.

FAIRNESS IN BROADCASTING UNDER ATTACK

Under the "fairness doctrine" and equal-time rules of the Federal Communications Act, television and radio stations, when they discuss a controversial matter, must attempt to deal fairly with all sides of the issue. And when they present an editorial opinion, they must provide free air time to those with opposing viewpoints. Labor unions have made use of these rules to air workers' views of controversial issues, particularly collective bargaining disputes.

The reason broadcasters are subject to such requirements, while newspapers and magazines are not, is that broadcasters enjoy monopoly rights on their particular broadcast frequencies. In exchange for an exclusive license to use a frequency, the TV or radio station agrees to the fairness doctrine and equal time rules.

Sen. Bob Packwood (R-OR) has introduced legislation (S. 1917) that would repeal the fairness doctrine and equal time rules. His argument is that the advent of new cable channels makes it unnecessary to require any single broadcaster to be fair, because those with opposing views can go to another station. Obviously this is not practical, especially in the many communities that do not have any access to cable.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose S. 1917 and to maintain the equal time and fairness doctrines.

PENSION PROTECTION BILL INTRODUCED FOR TELEPHONE COMPANY EMPLOYEES

Legislation has been introduced to guarantee that telephone company employees won't lose their pension rights if they are transferred from AT&T to a new regional telephone company under the court-ordered divestiture of "Ma Bell." Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-NJ) has said he will introduce the pension protections, possibly as an amendment to another bill, and Rep. Matthew Rinaldo (R-NJ) has introduced H.R. 4636 on the House side to offer the service credit protection.

Without such legislation, phone company workers with as much as nine years of service could lose credit for those years in applying for a pension. Those with 10 years or more who are already vested would find that two small pensions--one from AT&T and another from the new phone company--would not add up to what they had been promised in their collective bargaining through all their years of employment.

The legislation also would protect other length-of-service-based benefits, such as job bidding rights and seniority.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to support H.R. 4636, and your Senators to support the pension protections for phone company employees to be offered by Sen. Lautenberg.

First Step To Rebuild U.S. Industry Clears House Panel; Additional Cosponsors Are Needed

The AFL-CIO-backed industrial policy bill cleared its first hurdle as it passed the House Banking Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization. It now goes to the full Banking Committee. The odds of favorable action in full committee and on the House floor will improve as more members cosponsor the bill, so you can help by urging your Representative to sign on. This issue will receive much attention in coming months, but time is short for Congress to begin action on a bill.

H.R. 4360 would create a high-level advisory council composed of labor, management, government, academic, and public-interest group officials to recommend long-term strategies to improve American industry. It also would provide loans and loan guarantees to help older industries modernize their plants and help new, high-growth industries with research and development.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to cosponsor H.R. 4360, the LaFalce industrial policy bill. Particularly important at this juncture are members of the House Banking Committee, listed at right. Subcommittee members' votes are indicated.

Council warns Reagan policies pose long-term economic peril

House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill reviews prospects of labor-backed legislation for AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and the Executive Council.

Kirkland condemns failure to address basic problems

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Reagan Administration was roundly denounced by the AFL-CIO Executive Council for pursuing "unrealistic" budget and economic policies that "threaten the soundness of our economy for years to come."

In a statement adopted at its winter meeting here, the council pointed particularly to the Administration's huge budget deficits—projected at $180 billion to $200 billion a year over the next several years.

Deficits of that size, the council warned, "may soon tip the economy into yet another Reagan recession. The deficit must be reduced by stronger economic growth, increased federal revenues and lower military expenditures."

Federation President Lane Kirkland, at a news conference on the opening day of the council meeting, told reporters that the huge federal deficit is a "time bomb" the Administration has left ticking away that ultimately will exact a price. Charging that the Administration since taking office has failed to address any of the "really basic" economic problems facing the country, Kirkland said:

"We have 8 percent official unemployment in the midst of what is advertised as a boom, which is about a million more people unemployed than at the depths of what was a recession in the previous Administration.

Deficit reasoning

"We have a deficit of enormous and mounting proportions. We have an Administration which somehow—after having campaigned for many, many years on the proposition that the deficit is the root of all evil and promising its elimination—this year has magnified the deficit and multiplied it beyond all comprehension."

In separate statements, the council detailed the impact of the record U.S. trade deficit and the high real interest rates that have resulted from policies of the Administration and the Federal Reserve Board.

Meeting with the council at its opening session, House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill, Jr., reviewed the differences the Democratic leadership in Congress has had with the Reagan White House and discussed the prospects for pending legislation of interest to organized labor.

Also visiting with the council was Andre Bergeron, secretary general of Force Ouvriere, the French labor federation, who noted the long history of cooperation between his organization and the AFL-CIO and discussed economic developments in France and other European nations.

Kirkland reported to the council on his work as a member of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, known more familiarly as the Kissinger commission, and a council statement ac-

Bankruptcy decision guts contract rights

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO will press Congress to tighten federal bankruptcy law so as to repair the damage done by a Supreme Court decision that allows employers to tear up union contracts almost at will—without first demonstrating that such a drastic action is necessary for the firm's survival.

Just hours after the Supreme Court decision, House Judiciary Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) introduced legislation to reverse the court's misreading of the intent of Congress. The AFL-CIO Executive Council, meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., welcomed Rodino's move and committed the federation to an all-out effort "to assure that Congress corrects the Supreme Court's mistake and vindicates national labor policy."

Employer abuse of the bankruptcy process to break union agreements "has the gravest implications" for the collective bargaining system, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told reporters.

Under the Supreme Court's unanimous decision, the justification required by a bankruptcy judge for the abrogation of a collective bargaining agreement would be somewhat greater than that required for cancellation of a business contract—but not much.

Too strict a standard of justification, the court contended, would be at odds with the "flexibility" it said Congress intended for the bankruptcy process. It concluded that the only strictures of federal labor policy that need to be served is that the bankrupt company make "reasonable efforts" to reach a voluntary agreement with the union. But it would not be necessary for the parties to have "bargained to

Human rights tie termed essential for Salvador aid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Reagan Administration is undermining bipartisan efforts at achieving basic social, economic and political reform in Central America by not insisting that military aid to El Salvador be linked to "demonstrated progress" toward ending human rights abuses in the strife-torn country, the AFL-CIO charged.

An Executive Council statement scored the Administration for seeking to evade a recommendation of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America calling for such conditionality. The commission, headed by former Sec. of State Henry A. Kissinger, submitted its recommendations in a report last month which closely parallels the position of the AFL-CIO.

Union foes to set up spy network

The National Right to Work Committee says it plans to spend at least $100,000 to hire private detectives to infiltrate and spy on union political operations.

This unusual public announcement of an espionage operation was made by the committee's president, Reed Larson, at a Washington news conference.

Incredulous reporters wondered if it were a spoof. But Larson insisted that his organization was prepared to make "a major commitment" that would run to "six figures" in order to penetrate "Big Labor's massive political apparatus."

The National Right to Work Committee raises money through contributions from employers and other foes of what it terms "compulsory unionism." It campaigns for state laws to make union shop agreements illegal.

In response to questions, Larson said he saw nothing wrong with using employer contributions to spy on unions. It would be illegal only if directed against union organizing efforts, he contended.

But Larson insisted that labor support for Walter Mondale's presidential campaign is "clearly immoral," even when union spending is lawfully confined to activities involving only union members and their families.

Complaint filed

Larson said his committee is backing a complaint filed with the Federal Election Commission alleging that the AFL-CIO, various state federations, and the unaffiliated National Education Association overstepped legal boundaries in assisting the Mondale campaign.

The complaint, which was based largely on newspaper clippings quoting political opponents of Mondale, was filed by Bud Hettinga, whom Larson identified as a former Democratic member of the New Mexico legislature who was defeated for re-election because of union opposition.

At Bal Harbour, Fla., AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told reporters covering the federation's Executive Council meeting that the AFL-CIO has been "quite scrupulous in observing the requirements of the law."

The Right to Work Committee's allegations, he suggested, were "tactical moves" to try to create a cloud over labor's legitimate political activities.

At the Washington news conference, Larson said he has talked to two firms of private investigators about his planned infiltration campaign. But he would not identify them and said he will not make any announcement of a selection.

Larson said the investigators would use "all lawful means" to gather information. He said a "blue-ribbon panel of legal experts" recruited by the National Right to Work Committee will review the findings and consider further steps.

Executive Council addresses issues ranging from the economy to aid to El Salvador and international trade.

Progress on human rights demanded as condition of arms aid to Salvador

In its report, the 12-member panel clearly stated that military aid to El Salvador should, "through legislation requiring periodic reports, be made contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections, freedom of association, the establishment of the rule of law and an effective judicial system, and the termination of the so-called death squads, as well as vigorous action against those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders. These conditions should be seriously enforced."

Convention position

This was also the position adopted by the federation at its 1983 convention in a resolution that said:

"The AFL-CIO reiterates its insistence that aid to the government of El Salvador be contingent upon its progress in implementing the land reform program, protecting trade union rights, establishing a just judicial system, and bringing the right-wing 'death squads' under control. Until we are satisfied that progress is being made in these areas, the AFL-CIO will not support military aid to the government of El Salvador."

The Administration, however, has opposed legislation requiring President Reagan to certify progress in these areas as a condition for providing military aid to El Salvador. Its request for a fourfold increase in such aid this year skirts this condition, and thus violates a central principle of the Kissinger report, the council charged.

"The AFL-CIO is not convinced that the government of El Salvador has met the conditions set forth in the report, and we therefore do not support military aid to that government at this time."

Federation President Lane Kirkland was a member of the Kissinger commission, which also called for prosecution of those involved in the January 1981 murders of Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The council said that human rights violations in Central America were rooted in "indigenous and long-festering social, economic, and political injustices," and that these injustices were perpetuated by violent right-wing extremists and exploited by forces backed by the Soviet Union and Cuba.

Similarly, the Kissinger report observed, that "until rapid progress can be made on the political, economic, and social fronts, peace on the military front will be elusive and fragile."

The council said it supported the Kissinger commission's proposal that a Central American Development Organization (CADO) be created to provide a continuous approach on economic and social development in the region.

Limited membership

CADO's membership initially would be limited to the seven countries of Central America—Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama—and to the United States, with each country's delegation including representatives of a labor, business and/or government.

Such a tripartite structure, similar to that of the International Labor Organization, would strengthen the role of the democratic trade union movement throughout Central America, the Executive Council said.

In addition, the Kissinger commission stipulated, Central American participation in CADO would "turn on acceptance of and continued progress toward the protection of personal and economic liberties, freedom of expression, respect for human rights, and an independent system of equal justice and criminal law enforcement."

Unified task

CADO's operating body, in which each member country would be represented, would have the task of promoting establishment of a Central American common market and encouraging assistance to the region from western European nations, Canada, Japan and other Latin American countries in much the same way the foreign ministers of the so-called Contadora group of nations—Venezuela, Mexico, Panama and Colombia—have sought solutions to the region's problems over the past year.

The Executive Council noted in its statement that the Kissinger commission was conceived not by the Administration but by congressional leaders, notably the late Democratic Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), Sen. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) and Rep. Michael Barnes (D-Md.), who understood the importance of free trade unionism in the development of political democracy and social justice in Central America.

In participating in the work of the commission, the council said, the AFL-CIO sought to ensure that the views and interests of the trade unions of Central America with which it has warm fraternal relations were effectively represented.

"The Executive Council believes that the commission's report reflects their—and our—hopes for the region's progress," the council statement said.

High interest rates seeding new recession

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council warned that high real interest rates, currently running at their highest levels since World War II, are "sowing the seeds of the next recession."

The council, in a statement adopted at its winter meeting here, called on the Reagan Administration and the Federal Reserve Board to reverse the policies that are keeping interest rates high and thus distorting the economy.

"Excessive interest rates are a tax that Americans pay to bankers instead of to their government," the council said. Such rates, the statement stressed, contribute to the overvaluation of the dollar, the curtailment of public and private investment and the pricing of houses out of the reach of most workers.

"The result is the loss of existing jobs and persistent high levels of unemployment," the council observed.

It noted that the overvaluation of the dollar has been a major factor in the record U.S. trade deficit.

The council attributed continuing high interest rates to the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policies and the Reagan Administration's huge budget deficits. It urged a reversal of the Fed's policies and reduction of the deficits through action to raise federal revenues and curb the build-up of military spending.

The statement also called on Congress to re-establish the standby credit control authority that expired in June 1982 and to broaden the membership of the Federal Reserve Board to include representatives of organized labor, small business, agriculture and consumer groups.

ILA members approve settlement in Boston

Longshoremen in Boston overwhelmingly ratified a supplement to the union's new master contract, ending the last of several strikes by ILA members at East Coast ports.

The Boston settlement, approved by a vote of 260 to 30, provides for a guaranteed annual income over the next three years. The pact calls for 1,500 hours of guaranteed pay in the first year, 1,600 in the second year, and from 1,650 to 1,800 in the final year.

Contract settlements in Baltimore, Philadelphia and Providence, R.I., earlier ended walkouts by ILA members at those ports.

The supplement, part of a master agreement reached last month with Atlantic and Gulf Coast shippers, increases job security for ILA members by requiring vessel operating companies at some 36 ports to use only facilities employing union personnel.

Job-gutting import surge tied to faulty policy

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Reagan Administration's outdated policies have intensified the nation's foreign trade crisis and left the U.S. economy "virtually defenseless" against the surging tide of imports, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

A statement by the council cited the record trade deficit of $69 billion in 1983, including a $38 billion deficit in manufactured goods. It noted that despite the resulting loss of jobs and income, the Administration continues "to oppose positive action" to defend the interests of American workers.

Lip service

The Administration's "free market" rhetoric "does not reflect the trading practices of other countries and does nothing to solve America's trade problems," the Executive Council declared.

"The AFL-CIO continues to advocate a system of fair trade among nations," the council said. "Those who denounce our fair-trade proposals as 'protectionism' contribute nothing to the solution of the international trade crisis. We insist that all nations play by the same rules."

The council pointed out that last year's record U.S. trade deficit was caused in large part by the overvaluation of the dollar, which since July 1980 has risen nearly 57 percent against the currencies of other major trading nations.

"While these distorted exchange rates have had a devastating impact on the domestic economy, the Reagan Administration nevertheless continues the same monetary and fiscal policies that caused this situation," the council charged.

"Although tariff and non-tariff barriers are all but universal among America's trading partners, the U.S. economy remains virtually defenseless, and the Reagan Administration's fixation with 'free trade' hinders the adoption of realistic policies."

The council reiterated the federation's call for policies "that reflect international trading realities" and for the abandonment of outdated economic theories "before the industrial base of our country is totally undermined."

It reaffirmed labor's opposition to the Reagan Administration's requests for more tariff-cutting authority and its proposals for renewal of the Generalized System of Preferences, which permits duty-free imports from some countries.

Council recommendations

On specific foreign trade issues, the council urged:

- Legislation to tighten and streamline relief for industries and workers harmed by imports and to strengthen and enforce curbs on unfair trade practices.
- Passage of domestic content requirements to preserve the American automobile and auto parts industries.
- Adoption of steel import quotas coupled with steps by the U.S. steel industry to modernize its operations.
- Congressional action to reduce the job-destroying influx of garments, textiles and footwear now inundating U.S. markets.
- Legislation to revive the U.S. maritime industry by assuring a strong shipbuilding base and a fair share of cargoes for U.S.-flag shipping.
- Funding of the Export-Import Bank to reflect the needs of domestic industry in the export arena and also to provide for domestic purchase of U.S. products to offset foreign subsidies.
- Assurance that a significant portion of raw materials destined for export, such as grains and logs, are processed in this country.
- Adoption of policies to re-establish and maintain domestic electronic and television industries.
- Continued prohibition of Alaskan oil exports along with continued use of U.S.-flag vessels to distribute the oil to all regions of the country.

Council blasts Reagan policy failures

cused the Reagan Administration of seeking to evade the commission's recommendations on conditions for military aid to El Salvador.

Also in the area of international affairs, another council statement deplored the plans of West Germany to supply sophisticated weapons to Saudi Arabia and urged the U.S. government to seek reversal of the decision.

The council expressed its sorrow at the death of Vice President Lloyd McBride on Nov. 6, 1983. It described the late president of the Steelworkers as "a tireless fighter for human rights, collective bargaining, fair trade and worker health and safety."

On the second day of their five-day meeting, the council members took a turn on an informational picket line in Miami Beach. Led by Kirkland and President Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., they joined members of the Miami area Building Trades, the South Florida AFL-CIO and other trade unionists in demonstrating against the anti-union policies of the Associated Builders & Contractors who were then meeting at a Miami Beach hotel.

Internal affairs

In other action, the council unanimously declined a request for a charter from the National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, which is a division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and is known more generally as District 1199. In response to reporters' questions, Kirkland stressed that the responsibility for resolving controversy between the divisions of an affiliated unit and the parent union rests with the officers of the parent union. The federation can intervene in such a controversy only on request of the national union, he noted, and the RWDSU's position is that the union's own constitutional procedures "are sufficient to effect a fair resolution of the matter."

Reports were presented by Vice President Gerald W. McEntee for the council committee on the federal budget; former Vice President William Sidell, who represents labor on the commission dealing with issues growing out of the Panama Canal treaties; International Affairs Director Irving Brown on the outlook for the annual conference of the International Labor Organization in Geneva next June; COPE Director John Perkins on the results of the Iowa Democratic Party caucuses, and Research Director Rudy Oswald on the outlook for the U.S. economy.

In its statement on the national economy, the council charged that President Reagan is putting his re-election above the fundamental issues for workers—"jobs, fairness and a future with opportunities for all."

Failed experiment

The Administration's "supply-side, trickle-down experiment" has failed, the council said, adding:

"It is time to face reality by restoring adequate tax revenues, returning the corporate income tax as a major contributor of these revenues and closing loopholes that allow the wealthy to escape their fair share of taxes. The rapid buildup in military expenditures must be curbed, and the destruction of domestic programs must be stopped."

To achieve progress toward a full-employment economy, the council specifically urged enactment of legislation to establish a national industrial policy, create a program of public service jobs, finance the reconstruction of vital public facilities, provide protection for workers and communities hit by plant closings, and require that automobiles sold in this country include specified percentages of domestically produced parts.

On the issue of fairness, the council called for reversal of the "tax giveaways" to the wealthy and corporations enacted in 1981. It said a progressive income tax based on ability to pay "must remain a fundamental principle of the tax system."

Burden on workers

"New proposals to heap more of the burden on workers through such regressive devices as value-added taxes, consumption taxes, and flat-rate income taxes must be rejected," the council declared.

A background paper issued with the statement on the national economy outlined the federation's program to recover some $49.3 billion of the $165 billion in revenues that will be lost in 1985 alone because of the Reagan Administration's 1981 tax giveaway. The AFL-CIO proposals call for capping the last installment of the Reagan tax cut for individuals at $700, repeal of the tax indexing provisions, and elimination of some of the worst loopholes that have enabled corporations to escape paying a fair share of the tax load.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland fields questions from news reporters between sessions of the Executive Council's winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Kirkland pointed out at a news conference that no matter who wins the November election, "in calendar year 1985 there's going to have to be a very big tax bill . . . and the real issue is what kind of a tax bill and who's going to be required to pay it."

The council noted that the only significant revenue proposal of the Administration would impose a tax on health insurance of workers and their families, a proposal that will be strongly opposed by organized labor.

Fairness issue

Other aspects of the fairness issue, the council statement said, point up the need for health care protection for the unemployed, containment of the costs of health care while protecting the wages and benefits of health care workers, energy price controls, and an end to sex-based discrimination in pensions and insurance.

The council also called for consumer protection on telephone rates and service with adequate safeguards for the pension rights of telephone workers, amendment of the bankruptcy law to prevent its abuse by corporations seeking to escape their obligations to workers and consumers, and legislation to bar companies that violate the federal labor law from receiving federal contracts for up to three years.

To achieve a better future for all citizens, the council urged Congress to make a start toward the goals of adequate funding of the nation's educational needs, training and retraining of adult workers, particularly those affected by industrial dislocation, and protection of workers' pension rights.

"Congress should start to deal with these issues now, but only with the election of a new Administration can these principles be achieved," the council declared.

At his news conferences, Kirkland dealt with a variety of subjects. Among his responses to reporters' questions were:

- "We advocate a continuing strengthening of America's defense capacity, but at a lower rate of expenditure than that on which the Administration has embarked. And we most particularly favor a more equitable means of financing it, so that those who have enjoyed to the greatest extent the benefits of freedom in this country bear their fair share of the burdens of defending freedom.

"The position of this Administration clearly is that the rich and the fortunate ought to be exempted from those costs, and those costs ought to be borne by the least fortunate in our society. That's been the thrust of their approach to the defense question. And, I believe, as a consequence, this Administration has drastically weakened the body of support among the public for an adequate national defense."

A strong ally

- "The key to progress in the Middle East is, I think, a full and frank recognition that we have an ally—one ally, one dependable ally—in the Middle East, and that is the State of Israel. We ought to do nothing to weaken or undermine the position of that democracy. Contrary to what seems to be wisdom in many quarters of the foreign policy establishment, the problems, the conflicts, the burning issues in the Middle East are in no case the fault of Israel or the result of Israel's presence.

"I know of no conflict, crisis or issue in the Middle East that would be improved or resolved in any way if Israel didn't exist. Iraq would still be fighting Iran; Syria would still be at enmity with many of its other neighbors, probably would have gobbled up Lebanon long since, and would still be a threat to Jordan; and those conflicts would continue."

- "I rate (President Reagan's) performance in the field of foreign policy as unsatisfactory, unguided by any coherent sense of direction or mission, and erratic, and not in keeping with the rhetoric. In many ways, while using a great deal of tough rhetoric, the actual posture has been far weaker—in areas where we feel this country ought to follow a forceful role. For example, in the case of the bank loans to Poland, we believe and have believed consistently that those loans in default should be called. This Administration, at taxpayers' expense, bailed out banks when those loans went into default. That's hardly in keeping with the rhetoric.

"This Administration represents a segment of society—the bankers and the affluent corporations—that I have, on occasion, said represent the soft underbelly of freedom, who would sell the country out for a dollar or a ruble."

West Germany hit on arms sale to Saudi Arabia

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO expressed deep regret over West Germany's decision to sell arms to Saudi Arabia, and called on the Reagan Administration to make known to Chancellor Helmut Kohl the "profound distaste of the American people."

The Saudi Arabian government has proclaimed a "holy war" against Israel and has joined directly and indirectly in every Arab war against Israel's existence since 1948, the Executive Council said. It noted that Saudi Arabia has financed military supplies to other Arab armies and terrorist organizations dedicated to Israel's destruction.

"It is bad enough that any Western government should provide military weapons to Saudi Arabia so long as it holds to its present course," the council statement observed. "In the light of history, the German people should be particularly sensitive to this issue."

Germany's close military relationship with Saudi Arabia reportedly includes briefings on military doctrines, tours of German military-industrial plants, and the sale of sophisticated weapons systems. Among these are surface-to-air missiles, antiaircraft cannons, armored personnel carriers, advanced radar and communications systems, and other high-technology weapons, the council said.

Maritime unions to press for candidate commitments

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. is launching a grass-roots public information program to make every candidate for national office this year aware of the critical need to revive the U.S. merchant fleet.

The MTD executive board approved the program after Department President Frank Drozak outlined the plan at the opening of the board's winter meeting here.

"We must tell candidates that from here on out, we judge them not by promises they make but those they work hard to keep," Drozak declared.

He recalled that President Reagan had made "great promises" to the maritime industry in 1980, but has delivered only laid-up American ships, closed shipyards, thousands of unemployed seamen and shipyard workers and "an Administration of free traders that would trade off maritime and related industries to appease foreign governments."

Network of volunteers

Drozak said the grass-roots educational campaign would make use of port maritime councils to mobilize a network of volunteers from the affiliates to make sure that candidates "know our concerns and are committed to dealing with them."

A resolution adopted by the MTD board called on each presidential candidate to spell out a program for revitalizing the merchant marine and commit himself to carrying it out.

The resolution also called on both the Democratic and Republican party platforms to include a viable maritime program.

"We finally commit ourselves," the MTD said, "to a careful scrutiny of congressional candidates, seeing to it that they understand our concerns and supporting only those candidates who are clear that they support us with more than mere words, that they are firmly committed to the enactment of a solid, positive maritime revitalization program."

Reagan rhetoric

In an address to the MTD board, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joined Drozak in condemning the Reagan Administration's "free trade" posturing.

"Under the Reagan Administration," Kirkland said, "we are left with no viable maritime policy and a trade policy that encourages only imports. The Administration has ended the construction differential subsidy program so that shipbuilding can find foreign havens.

"This Administration, for all its patriotic talk of rebuilding America's defense and improving American security, has left us with a shrinking, aging fleet that cannot carry the men, guns and goods we might need in an international crisis."

Part of the answer, Kirkland suggested, lies in the new national industrial policy board proposed by the AFL-CIO that would link labor, management and government in a program to modernize American industry and make it competitive with any in the world.

"We know American workers can compete," Kirkland said, "but they need the tools and technology to compete on fair terms."

Also addressing the board during the two-day meeting were House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill, Jr.; Rep. Joseph P. Addabbo (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee; Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Merchant Marine subcommittee; Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.), representing the House Democratic Caucus; Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), chairman of the Senate Defense Appropriations subcommittee and the Merchant Marine subcommittee; AFL-CIO Organizing Director Alan Kistler; Research Director Rudy Oswald, and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Among some two dozen resolutions adopted by the board were several detailing the MTD's own program for restoring the U.S. maritime industry, including the enactment of the Competitive Shipping & Shipbuilding Act to promote greater carriage of bulk commodities on U.S.-flag shipping built in this country, stricter enforcement of existing cargo preference laws, negotiation of bilateral cargo-sharing agreements with the nation's trading partners, extension of the Jones Act governing coastal shipping, and funding of port development projects.

Victory for AFSCME

Racial bias suit brings $15 million back pay

Chicago — A major civil rights victory for the State, County & Municipal Employees not only means $15 million in back pay awards to hundreds of black workers in the Chicago area but also reinforces the union's sex discrimination case against the state of Washington, AFSCME declared.

"Having fought hard for the U.S. Civil Rights Act, working people should benefit from its protection," AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said. "These two cases, similar in fundamental ways, are part of AFSCME's commitment to civil rights."

The $15-million back pay award, the largest such award involving public employees, will go to a group of current and former black welfare workers found by a federal court to have been victims of discriminatory employment practices by the Illinois and Cook County Public Aid Departments. At least 1,000 people will share the award.

The case stems from a 1973 federal court suit in which AFSCME Local 2000 charged the state and the county with race discrimination in their employment practices.

In the lawsuit, filed under Title VII of the U.S. Civil Rights Act, the union charged that the two departments shunted blacks into low-paying jobs that had the same duties as higher paying jobs held mostly by whites.

Equal work, unequal pay

The union's action was brought in behalf of workers in two job classifications—case aide and case aide trainee—which were held almost entirely by blacks. These positions required the same duties and responsibilities as the job of caseworker, the union held.

At the time of the lawsuit, more than 80 percent of the case aides and trainees were blacks. Starting pay for caseworkers was $742 a month, while case aides were paid $583 and trainees $472.

Through the efforts of Local 2000, the Illinois Dept. of Public Aid promoted the case aides and trainees to caseworkers in 1975, and instituted a career ladder program for its employees.

In 1979, Judge John P. Crowley of the U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois ruled the state and the county were guilty of racial discrimination in the case. Two years later, he ordered a formula to be used to calculate damages. That decision was upheld last year by the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals here. The newly announced $15 million award represents the state and county application of that formula.

Under the court order, the county must pay its share of the award—about $4 million—by Feb. 29. The state will have to pay the balance through a legislative supplemental appropriation this spring, the court declared.

The back pay awards will be collected by black public aid employees who had worked as case aides or trainees since March 1972.

Sharing the award

"Their day is at hand," Local 2000 President Max Liberles said of those standing to receive a share of the award. "They will finally be getting these large sums of money they rightfully deserve."

In AFSCME's case against Washington state, the union charged the state government violated Title VII by underpaying workers in female-dominated jobs relative to workers in male-dominated jobs requiring the same or less skill, effort, and responsibility.

AFSCME won that case and approximately $700 million in back pay and future salary increases last fall. The state has said it will appeal the decision, but no hearing date has been set.

The union accused the Reagan Administration of an unwelcome intrusion in the legal process after Assistant Atty. Gen. William Bradford Reynolds hinted that the Justice Dept. would join with the state in appealing the decision.

Diana Rock, head of AFSCME's Women's Department said, that in both cases "what appeared to be a non-discriminatory system on the surface actually resulted in separate treatment, separate salaries and separate career tracks."

AFSCME's lawyer Winn Newman said he referred to the Chicago case many times in his presentation of the Washington case.

He said he cited the ruling in the Chicago case that denial of relief in race-based wage discrimination "would undermine Title VII by sending a clear message to state and local governments that they may discriminate against the employees in violation of Title VII and incur no liability."

Victory in Iowa spurs Mondale drive

New Hampshire's Feb. 28 primary will test Walter F. Mondale's status as the clear front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination and strongly influence public perception of the rankings of the seven other candidates.

Mondale's campaign got off to a fast start in Iowa, where he outpolled all other candidates combined in the 2,500 precinct caucuses that marked the first stage in the state's delegate selection process.

State Democratic officials projected the precinct results to yield 48 delegates for Mondale to only two for Colorado Sen. Gary Hart, the runner-up. Eight party leaders and elected officials will be appointed to complete the Democratic convention delegation.

Mondale ran consistently well throughout the state, in farm areas as well as in cities and towns, in college communities as well as in precincts with high turnouts of union members.

So convincing was his victory that the chief issue in dispute was whether Hart had permanently or merely temporarily supplanted Ohio Sen. John Glenn as the number two candidate.

Hart received close to 16.5 percent of the votes cast—far behind Mondale's 49 percent, but sufficiently ahead of the other presidential contenders to bring him a new burst of media and public attention.

Glenn, long considered Mondale's chief rival for the presidential nomination, took less than 3.5 percent of the vote. He was topped by George McGovern, the 1972 presidential candidate who had 10.3 percent, a 9 percent vote for an uncommitted slate of delegates and 7.4 percent for California Sen. Alan Cranston. There were mere scattering of votes for former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew, Jesse Jackson, and South Carolina Sen. Ernest F. Hollings.

The Glenn campaign is looking to bounce back in the New Hampshire primary. That's also the state where Jackson, who made no serious effort in Iowa, has been concentrating his early campaign.

Heavy March schedule

Despite the heavy media attention to the first few delegate selections, the nomination process has just begun. Ahead are a cluster of primaries and caucuses in March, when 26 states and four other jurisdictions will choose delegates. The focus in April will be on the delegate-rich New York and Pennsylvania primaries. And if the nomination is still in doubt, the June 5 windup of the primary season includes the selection of 345 delegates in California and 122 in New Jersey.

Then, on July 16, the 3,933 voting delegates will meet in San Francisco to adopt a Democratic Party platform and choose the party's presidential and vice presidential candidates.

In the Republican Party, the primaries and caucuses are largely formalities since President Reagan has no declared opponent for renomination.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told reporters covering the federation's Executive Council meeting that Mondale's success in Iowa demonstrated his strong appeal across "the full spectrum" of the electorate. It "augurs well for his nomination and success in November," Kirkland suggested.

Despite the labor movement's endorsement of Mondale, Kirkland stressed that the AFL-CIO is not pressing any candidate to withdraw from the primary process.

Each candidate is entitled to a "full and fair chance," Kirkland said. "Nobody should be precluded from running or denied a fair chance to show his full wares to a diverse group of the American population."

But when the choice of the voters is clear, Kirkland suggested, "it would certainly be to the great advantage of the Democratic Party and those who want to see a change in the course of this country" to unite "behind the strongest candidate as soon as possible" and point toward the general election.

State Senate beats R-T-W in Kentucky

Frankfort, Ky.—The Kentucky Senate slammed the door on union foes who tried to tag a compulsory open shop amendment on an unrelated bill defeating the measure by a 27-8 vote. The decisive vote probably squelched any threat of a "right-to-work" bill getting out of the starting gate this session.

A state senator had used a back-door maneuver to shirttail the anti-union amendment to a bill dealing with age discrimination in pensions only one day before the measure was due for a final vote on the Senate floor. The move enabled the "right-to-workers" to bypass the normal committee process.

Kentucky AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Leonard S. Smith credited labor's grass roots legislative action network in the state with quick work that alerted senators to the threat by phone and personal visits and stressed labor's strong opposition to the measure.

Smith noted that the anti-union faction had used the same tactic in an earlier legislative session on the House version of the bill. The House rejected the ploy.

He pointed out that the National Right to Work Committee, based in Springfield, Va., had been active in the state plugging the measure, but Kentucky labor's quick response to the Senate maneuver "handed them the spanking they deserve for this."

Although another compulsory "free-loader" bill has been introduced in the legislature, it is not likely to make it out of the committee to which it has been referred, Smith said.

Part of the groundwork for labor's success in turning back this amendment, Smith said, was laid in last year's statewide elections—including the gubernatorial race—where union members demonstrated substantial strength in turning out support for COPE-endorsed candidates.

Eastern pilots approve stock-for-pay exchange

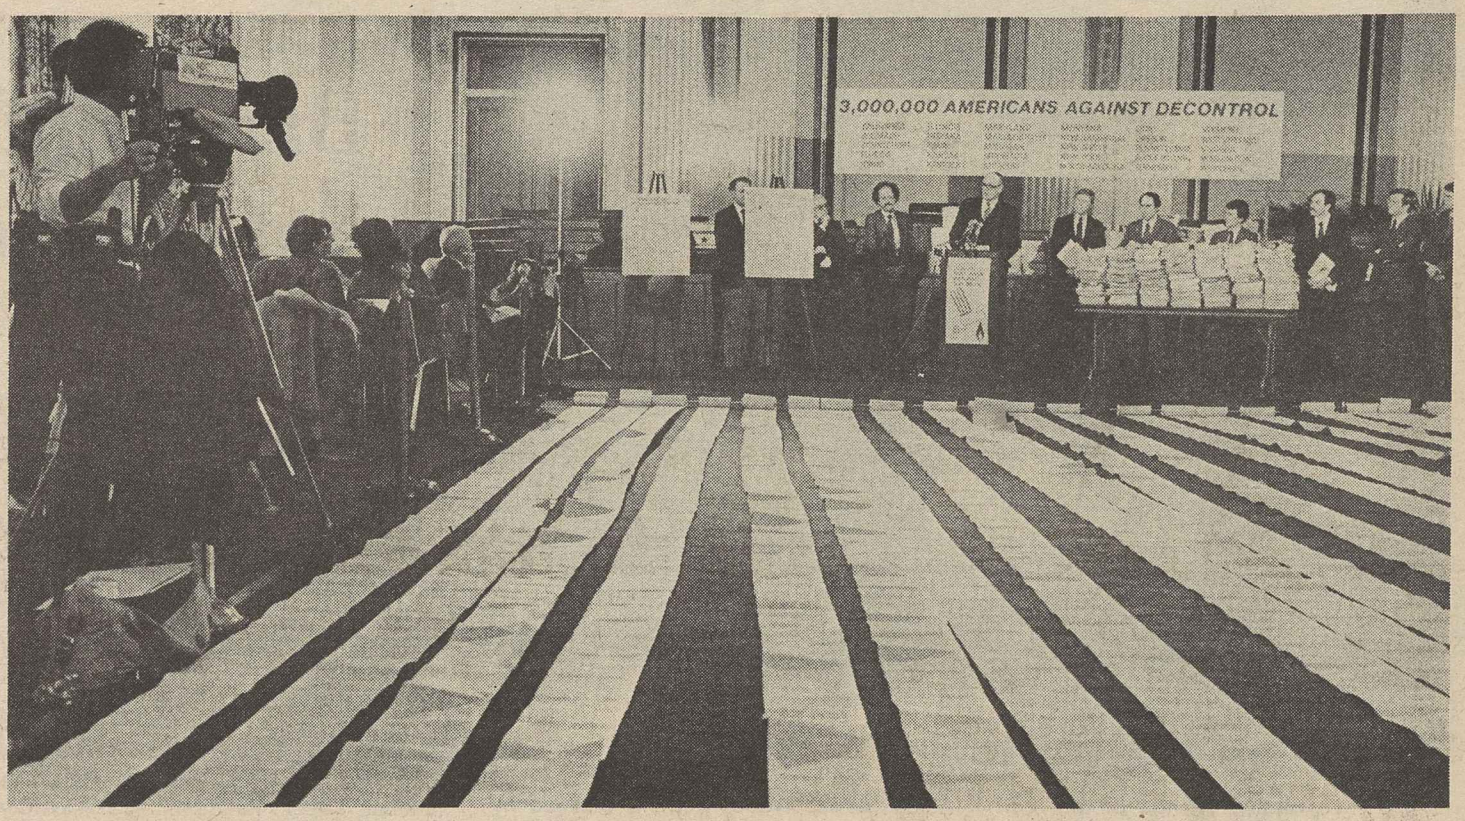
Miami—Eastern Airlines pilots agreed to give up a percentage of their pay this year in exchange for the carrier's common stock and representation on Eastern's board.

The Air Line Pilots joined the Machinists and the Transport Workers in approving the stock-for-pay pact.

For the first two months of 1984, Eastern employees will give up 22 percent of their pay. The percentage drops to 19.7 percent by year's end. In exchange, members of IAM, ALPA and TWU will share 25 percent of Eastern's common stock.

The carrier, which in January reported long-term debt of more than $2 billion, said it needed the wage cutbacks to survive.

ALPA said the agreement was approved by 76 percent of some 3,900 members who voted on it.



Roll out the signatures

Petitions signed by one million Americans opposing the decontrol of natural gas prices were unrolled across the House Caucus room to underscore the drive against skyrocketing fuel bills. The signatures, plus 2 million others submitted earlier, were obtained by the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition and turned over to Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), at the lectern, chairman of the House Energy Committee, and Representatives Philip Sharp (D-Ind.), Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Dan Glickman (D-Kans.), sponsors of a labor-backed bill to roll back gas prices.

Supreme Court's decision upholds exclusive right of unions to confer

The Supreme Court upheld labor's position in cases involving college faculty members covered by a Minnesota collective bargaining law and a city's attempt to set residence requirements for employees of contractors working on city-funded construction.

In the Minnesota case, the National Right to Work Committee had supported a suit brought by non-union faculty members in the state's community college system. They contended that their constitutional rights had been infringed by a Minnesota law which gave unions representing professionals employed by the state exclusive rights both to negotiate on conditions of employment and to "meet and confer" on employment-related issues that were not mandatory subjects of collective bargaining.

On the winning side in the case were the National Education Association, which holds bargaining rights for the state's community college teachers, and the AFL-CIO, which filed a supporting brief even though the NEA is not an affiliate.

A three-judge district court had upheld the exclusive bargaining provision of the law, which the "right-to-work" suit had also challenged and that issue was so clearly established by precedents that the Supreme Court earlier declined to review the challenge to that part of the law. But the district court went on to invalidate the exclusive designation of the union to confer on matters not normally on the bargaining table. It held this infringed on the free speech rights of non-members whose views were not represented. The district court panel held that the traditional "right of expression by faculty members" on academic issues "also holds a special place under our Constitution."

Dissident rights

A 6-3 Supreme Court majority found, to the contrary, that dissident faculty members who chose not to be represented by a union remained free to speak out on issues that concerned them but "have no constitutional right to force the government to listen to their views."

As for the argument that lack of a forum open to non-union members amounted to putting pressure on them to join the union, the court majority found it no more convincing than the argument that non-members are discriminated against in the bargaining process because they refuse to join the union empowered to bargain for them.

The majority decision in the case was written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justices Byron R. White, Harry A. Blackmun and William H. Rehnquist. Justice Thurgood Marshall filed an opinion agreeing with the outcome but on more limited grounds.

The residency case appeared at first glance to contradict a 7-2 decision last year that upheld a requirement by the City of Boston that, on projects funded by the city, at least half the workers in each craft be Boston residents.

The Supreme Court ruled that Boston did not violate the Commerce Clause of the Constitution because the city was a participant in the labor market and not trying to regulate it. The court left open for future consideration, however, challenges to residence rules that might be based on the Privileges and Immunities Clause of the Constitution—a point that the AFL-CIO had raised in a brief challenging the residence rule. The clause bars states from discriminating against citizens of other states.

The new case before the court involved a Camden, N.J., ordinance requiring that at least 40 percent of the employees of contractors working on city construction projects be Camden residents.

The area Building & Construction Trades Council, which includes members living in nearby Pennsylvania, challenged the restriction under the Privileges & Immunities Clause. New Jersey's highest court rejected the challenge, holding that the constitutional issue wasn't valid because most of the persons adversely affected were residents of New Jersey and impact on out-of-staters was only incidental.

Camden not exempt

But the 8-1 Supreme Court decision, written by Justice William H. Rehnquist, found that Camden's ordinance wasn't immune from constitutional challenge.

The decision noted that New Jersey residents at least have an opportunity to seek redress for Camden's actions in the state legislature, but that course isn't open to persons from other states.

It noted, however, the city's contention that special problems of heavy unemployment justified residence restrictions but the court record makes that contention "impossible to evaluate." It remanded the case to the New Jersey Supreme Court for findings of fact as to whether there was "substantial reason" for the city's action.

Paperworkers board elects Defee

Nashville, Tenn.—John M. Defee was elected secretary-treasurer by the Paperworkers executive board to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Sec.-Treas. Nicholas C. Vrataric on Dec. 8.

Defee, a UPIU vice president since 1969, will serve the remainder of Vrataric's term of office, which expires in September 1984.

Defee, 62, began his career in 1941 with UPIU Local 404 in Bastrop, La., and during his 22 years there alternatively held all the local union offices.

He later became an international representative, assistant regional director and regional director covering the states of Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Arkansas and Oklahoma.

For the past five years, Defee was a vice president-at-large and director of the union's human rights program.

He also served on the A. Philip Randolph Institute's planning committee, the UPIU audit committee and on various committees with the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Emergency action sought to remove EDB hazard

The AFL-CIO is pressing the Environmental Protection Agency to "take emergency action to establish an enforceable federal standard" on ethylene dibromide (EDB) residues, charging the agency's "voluntary EDB guidelines have failed."

Special Counsel Laurence Gold joined with representatives of the Natural Resources Defense Council and the Consumers Union in urging EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus to act promptly. They expressed their disappointment with the agency's decision to allow continued use of the cancer-causing chemical on citrus and the failure to establish mandatory standards on residues.

Their letter noted that some states have acted effectively but "the majority simply lack the authority, will or mechanism to remove this dangerous chemical from the food supply."

The agency on Feb. 3 banned the use of EDB on grain products and milling machinery and set voluntary guidelines for states to follow on the maximum acceptable residues of EDB in raw grains, milled grain products and in finished food products.

Lack of uniformity

The federation's letter recommended enforceable emergency standards be set within 30 days, citing the "crazy quilt of individual regulatory action or nonactions" that have occurred since the agency issued its voluntary guidelines. It contrasted stringent restrictions set up by Massachusetts with the inaction of its neighboring state, New Hampshire.

To achieve a uniform federal standard, the letter urged the agency to issue a notice of proposed rulemaking revoking a 1956 exemption granted for EDB "based on the now patently false assumption that no EDB residues would result in finished food products," and appoint an advisory panel from the National Academy of Sciences to review that revocation.

As an additional action, the federation urged EPA to re-examine other exemptions granted to the tolerance requirements of the Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act to determine if other carcinogens have been unlawfully permitted in the American food supply.

In a related effort, Deborah Berkowitz, health and safety specialist for the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. testified at Occupational Safety & Health Administration hearings that the agency's proposed EDB standard "makes a mockery of worker protection" since it sets the engineering and work practices compliance date two years after the approval of the final rule.

She urged OSHA to remove a proposed exemption that would "exclude virtually all our members who handle fumigated citrus cargo and work in the grain industry from the superior protection of work practice and engineering controls."

Berkowitz also called for a lower exposure limit, stressing that respirators be the last line of defense against exposure and not the first as the proposed rule requires, and that medical surveillance be required for all workers assigned to a "regulated area," not just those who are at risk over 30 days per year.

FAST President Robert F. Harbrant, in a letter to EPA, cautioned the agency about a substitute fumigant, methyl bromide, which is now being used in grain elevators and on milling machinery.

He noted uncertainty as to whether EPA's 24-hour requirement for allowing methyl bromide to dissipate from various workplace equipment is adequate.

Also, Harbrant warned, the agency's requirement to use "halide leak detectors" to measure levels of the chemical "would be unsafe to use in elevators and mills" because it is a flame device which could cause an explosion.

Showtime in Memphis

Memphis, Tenn. — Preparations are well under way for the 1984 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show, scheduled to open here May 11, show manager Jack Lutz reported.

Nearly 300 exhibitors are expected to participate in the popular annual show, sponsored by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., in demonstrating the skills and contributions of union workers.

Bankruptcy decision guts contract rights

impasse" before the contract can be cancelled, the court said.

In another section of the opinion, a 5-4 majority of the Supreme Court tilted radically against worker rights and ruled it is not an unfair labor practice for a company to tear up its union contract as soon as it files for bankruptcy—without first persuading a bankruptcy court that the action was justified.

A dissent to this section of the opinion, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., protested that such a disregard of the collective bargaining system was not the intent of Congress and would "spawn precisely the type of industrial strife that the National Labor Relations Act was designed to avoid."

Joining in the dissent were Justices Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall and Harry A. Blackmun.

AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold stressed the disruption of the collective bargaining system threatened by the decision in a briefing for reporters covering the Executive Council meeting.

In most cases where employers made good-faith efforts to renegotiate contracts and were able to document claims of the seriousness of a financial crisis, voluntary agreements have been possible, he noted. But the decision "puts unions in a disadvantageous situation" and favors "the interests of anti-union employers who are looking for ways to destroy union contracts."

Instability predicted

Unions can strike if an employer uses bankruptcy proceedings to unilaterally cancel a collective bargaining agreement, Gold noted. The decision will "increase the number of labor disputes and create greater instability in collective bargaining," he warned.

The case that reached the Supreme Court stemmed from the refusal of a New Jersey building materials supplier to live up to the terms of its contract with a local of the unaffiliated Teamsters after filing for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code.

The National Labor Relations Board ruled this an unfair labor practice, but the 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in 1982 refused to enforce the ruling, holding that the bankruptcy process allowed such action.

The NLRB and the Teamsters local sought Supreme Court review, and the legal battle was joined. The AFL-CIO filed two supporting briefs in the case, expressing special concern over the impact on public policy favoring collective bargaining to resolve industrial disputes.

The appellate court ruling, the AFL-CIO contended, "removes any incentive for a distressed employer to bargain with a union over reductions in terms and conditions of employment. There is no reason to negotiate with the union when the company can unilaterally implement changes" after filing for bankruptcy.

"Sanctioning employer repudiations of collective bargaining agreements," the federation protested, undermines national labor policy without advancing the valid purposes of bankruptcy law.

The Chamber of Commerce contended in a brief supporting the employer position that fears that companies will use the bankruptcy proceedings "in a bad faith attempt to rid themselves of the obligations imposed by collective bargaining agreements are groundless."

Continental action

The AFL-CIO brief noted that while the New Jersey case was moving through the courts, Continental Airlines had seized on the device of filing a bankruptcy petition to abrogate collective bargaining agreements with pilots, flight attendants and machinists, slash wages 45 to 50 percent, and impose new work rules—even though the company was not in dire straits or short of cash. The unions are still on strike and the AFL-CIO has launched a national boycott to support them.

The Continental case is moving separately through the court system and the Supreme Court decision leaves at least the possibility of a different conclusion because airlines are covered by the Railway Labor Act rather than the National Labor Relations Act.

Ironically, the Supreme Court decision notes that the bankruptcy law imposes restrictions on revocation of collective bargaining agreements subject to the Railway Act and uses that as evidence that Congress did not intend a similar restriction on contracts covered by the NLRA, since it did not so specify.

Gold noted at the AFL-CIO press briefing that the reference to the Railway Labor Act in the Bankruptcy Code predates the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act "and we don't think the court drew the right inference from the fact that at that point Congress specifically tended to the railroads as a separate issue."

Telephone union in Pennsylvania votes CWA unity

Philadelphia — A 13,000-member unaffiliated telephone union in Pennsylvania voted to merge with the Communications Workers by better than an 8-to-1 ratio.

The Federation of Telephone Workers of Pennsylvania cast 7,624 votes in favor of the merger to just 951 opposed.

CWA President Glenn E. Watts called the merger approval "a great day for both unions." He said the vote shows "we are united once again to confront the uncertainties facing telecommunications today." Prior to 1947, both unions belonged to CWA's predecessor, the National Federation of Telephone Workers.

Last October, FTWP convention delegates overwhelmingly approved the merger proposal and authorized a membership referendum. FTWP will hold a special convention in June to change its bylaws and dues structure to facilitate the merger, FTWP President William F. Wallace announced.

Under the merger agreement, CWA will form a new District 13 combining members in Pennsylvania and Delaware and the FTWP members will form the new CWA Local 13000. Elections of local officers and delegates to the CWA convention will be held at FTWP's special convention.

In August, CWA convention delegates will vote on steps to form the new district and hold elections for the new District 13 vice president.

Economic Menace

THE UNREALISTIC BUDGET and economic policies of the Reagan Administration threaten the soundness of our economy for years to come. Continuing high federal deficits are pushing up already high real interest rates and may soon tip the economy into yet another Reagan recession.

The deficit must be reduced by stronger economic growth, increased federal revenues and lower military expenditures.

A year after the bottom of the Reagan recession, 9 million Americans are still officially unemployed, 1.5 million "discouraged" workers are no longer even counted among the jobless, and almost 6 million workers who want full-time jobs are working only part time. In January, there were 1 million more unemployed than when Reagan took office, and 2 million more than four years ago. The buying power of the average worker's paycheck is lower than in 1979. More Americans are living in poverty today than at any time since poverty statistics were first compiled in the mid-1960s.

Jobs, fairness and opportunities for the future remain key issues for America's workers and for the nation in 1984.

The AFL-CIO is convinced that the nation can move toward full employment, restore fairness and build a better tomorrow for ourselves and our children. The program we have outlined will move the country toward these goals and at the same time reduce the federal deficit by stimulating the economy and raising needed revenues. Congress should start to deal with these issues now, but only with the election of a new Administration can these principles be achieved.

—From a statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in Bal Harbour, Fla., on Feb. 20, 1984.

With Fairness to All

WHAT DOES labor expect in return for its endorsement of Walter F. Mondale's campaign for the presidency?

If Mondale is elected, a reporter asked Lane Kirkland during the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting, "what are some of the things you expect him to do for labor in his first year in office?"

This was the AFL-CIO president's reply:

"I'll expect him to well and faithfully uphold the Constitution of the United States . . . with specific reference to the duties it imposes upon a President and upon the government to provide for the common defense and for the general welfare.

"I'll expect him to discharge those duties, honorably, fairly, with favor and bias toward none, but with fairness to all of the people, including the working people of this country."

Not Irreversible

THE SUPREME COURT decision allowing employers to use the Bankruptcy Code as a means of ignoring a union contract without facing unfair labor practice charges is deplorable. But, fortunately, it is not irreversible.

No constitutional issue was involved in the case decided by the Supreme Court. The court justified its conclusions solely on its interpretation of the intent of Congress.

Now the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., thinks the Supreme Court is way off base. Rodino, who has had a lot to do with the shaping of federal bankruptcy law, insists that it wasn't the intent of Congress to throw collective bargaining out the window whenever a company gets into difficulties.

The bill he introduced on the heels of the Supreme Court decision would get the bankruptcy law back on track. It deserves the active support of everyone committed to making collective bargaining work—labor and management alike, Democrats and Republicans.

It's not the first time the Supreme Court misread the intentions of Congress. And it won't be the first time that Congress has passed legislation to set the court straight. The pregnancy disability law, to remedy an aspect of discrimination against women workers, is just one such example.

Let this be another.

Reagan policies stymie control of toxic hazards

By Press Associates, Inc.

Industrial progress has a price—as working people know, more than any other group. Now society is facing the full cost.

For decades, the nation's industries spewed forth mountains of waste into the air and waters or buried it in the earth as if these life-sustaining natural resources were without limit. Agriculture was likewise heedless in its massive use of chemical fertilizers and pesticides.

During the past two decades, a growing public awareness about the poisoning of the planet and the job site resulted in the enactment of protective legislation. This included the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Safe Drinking Water Act, the Toxic Substances Control Act, the Resource Conservation & Recovery Act, federal controls on insecticides and fungicides and, finally, the Superfund law to clean up hazardous waste sites.

During the 1970s, when most of these laws were enacted, progress often was painfully slow, but a start was made in cleaning up and a framework erected on which to build.

Progress halted

Ronald Reagan's election in 1980 brought progress to a screeching halt. The Environmental Protection Agency, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and their congressionally mandated programs were drastically underfunded, understaffed and undermined by Reagan appointees. Protective regulations were withdrawn, weakened or delayed.

In late 1981, a Midwest Republican congressman dubbed Reagan's EPA the "Environmental Degradation Agency." In 1983, EPA Administrator Anne Burford and her deputy Rita Lavelle left the agency in public disgrace following their mishandling of the Superfund toxic waste cleanup program.

Meanwhile, OSHA, which actively protected workers' health and safety under Eula Bingham in the late 1970s, was transformed into a pawn of industry and a hostage of the White House enforced "cost-benefit analysis."

The Administration's backpeddling, with the consequence of increased toxic-related illness and death, galvanized more than 100 of the nation's major labor, environmental, and consumer organizations to form the National Campaign Against Toxic Hazards. The AFL-CIO and a dozen affiliated unions are participating as are many local unions through various coalitions.

Visiting voters

By the November elections, the activists plan to visit millions of voters, lay out the environmental and workplace health records of their elected representatives and gain support for the petitions which state these basic rights: the right to be safe from harmful exposure to toxic substances, to know what toxics are present in the workplace and community, to a reduction in hazardous wastes, to timely cleanup of waste sites, and to compensation for damages from exposure to toxic substances.

The campaign was announced at a Capitol Hill news conference, where John T. O'Connor, its coordinator, said: "The invasion of toxic chemicals into our bodies is America's Number One hidden health problem. Toxic hazards may be killing upward of 1,000 citizens a day. We need stronger laws and vigorous enforcement."

O'Connor grew up near a Stratford, Conn., asbestos plant. "The company knew since the early 1930s that asbestos was killing people, but it refused to tell anyone," he said. "I've seen childhood friends die of cancer at an early age. I've seen many of my neighbors made seriously ill by asbestos contamination. My own body is contaminated, but so far I've been one of the lucky ones."

MEMO FROM COPE

Registration: Everybody's Doing It!

Voter registration.

The labor movement has done it for decades among its members. Now, Moral Majority is doing it. Both political parties are pouring more resources and planning into it than ever. Minority groups, women's organizations—all kinds of politically concerned groups at all points on the spectrum are doing it.

Everybody's figured it out by now: Elections are often settled—certainly always affected—weeks before voters go to the polls, when registration rolls are closed in most states.

Thus, there is more registration activity, more attention given to it in the media, more money being spent and more sophisticated approaches and equipment being used than in any previous election.

Four years ago, 74 million eligible citizens did not vote, only a few million less than the number who did. Most observers feel now, however, the decades-long decline in voter participation has bottomed out and the November presidential vote turnout will far exceed the roughly 53 percent in 1980.

Much of the credit for this falls to President Reagan, though not by his design. His policies have succeeded in polarizing the electorate. His supporters and support groups passionately want him back, and are getting into registration to enroll Reagan voters.

His opponents and opposing groups passionately want him out. They're into registration to enroll voters who share their goal.

The consequence could be 13 million more voters in 1984 than four years ago and a turn-out higher than any since the 63 percent in the 1960 Kennedy-Nixon contest.

Registration objectives differ. Republican committees have earmarked $8-$10 million for a selective registration effort aimed at adding 1.5-2 million sure-fire Reagan voters to the rolls. A sophisticated computer program will, in several steps, identify and locate their target individuals.

Democrats plan a $4.5 million registration drive aimed at masses of voters in their natural constituency—workers, minorities, the needy.

The parties and their respective allied groups have vested interests in different clusters of potential voters. A recent Washington Post poll broke down income level and party support ratios this way: Persons making less than $12,000 a year back Democrats over Republicans 66-27 percent; $12-$20,000, 58-35; $20-$30,000, 52-38; $30-$50,000 46-45. Only the $50,000-and-up earners preferred the GOP, 55-37 percent.

The challenge for the Democrats and their allies is to motivate their natural constituencies, which traditionally vote in lower percentages than GOP-leaning groups. The challenge for the GOP is to locate the unregistered upper income citizens.

The stakes in the registration race are self-evident. In 16 states, five or fewer percentage points separated Reagan from Carter in 1980—an aggregate vote difference of only 573,000. In eight states, the difference was 5-10 points.

In almost all of the states, at least one-fourth of eligibles were not registered. In most of those where enrollment was heaviest, it was due to election-day registration laws that permit a citizen to go to the polls, register on site and vote.

What They're Saying

Columnist David S. Broder, Washington Post:

Abraham Lincoln never met Ronald Reagan.

When he said, "You can fool all the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all the time; but you can't fool all of the people all the time," the Great Emancipator never imagined the Great Communicator.

It is apparently President Reagan's belief that words can not only cloak reality but remake it. In the space of 48 hours last week, Lebanon was transformed—in Reagan's mind—from a bastion of democracy and an outpost of freedom into a place that was fit only for target practice for the battleship New Jersey's biggest guns.

The "redeployment" of the Marines . . . is supposed to wipe out the memory of the decision that sent them in. It is the same sort of mind-game that allowed Reagan, in the State of the Union address, to brag about the record number of Americans who found work in 1983, without noting that most of them had lost their previous jobs since he got his.

More and more, it is evident that the political calculus that operates in Reagan's mind is that the voters are unable to link cause and effect, or make any connection between general policy and specific effect. He is betting, in short, that most people's minds are like his own, heavily responsive to symbol and almost immune to logic. . . .

It is the same separation of cause and effect, the same denial of logic, the same substitution of symbol for substance that underlie Reagan's approach to the domestic policy disaster called the budget deficit.

Four years ago, in the Republican primaries, John Anderson and George Bush argued that Reagan's numbers did not add up: that you could not increase defense spending and cut taxes as much as he proposed to do without running up huge deficits. He defeated them but did not disprove them. Today, the chairman of his own Council of Economic Advisers, Martin Feldstein, is saying the same thing. Reagan can muzzle him, but not show that he is wrong.

Reagan's response to the repeated demonstrations of the fallacy in his own policy is not what logic would suggest. Rather than reexamine the roots of that policy by rethinking the tax and defense decisions, he prefers to bemuse the public with two symbols—the balanced budget amendment and the line-item veto—as if they would solve the contradictions inherent in his own policy.

Once again, his political advisers base their hopes on removing or avoiding the specific irritant to the public, and hoping that the policy failure will not be noticed.

Deficits are a boring abstraction, Sen. Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.), the Reagan campaign chairman, says. People "can't relate to those huge numbers," he says. As long as interest rates do not rise, the public will not care, the Reaganites hope. They seem to believe that people cannot make the connection between the deficit and the deteriorating position of the United States in international trade—or the inevitable day of reckoning here at home.

The election will tell us whether Reagan or Lincoln has judged the public's credulity correctly. Meantime, shed a tear for those inside this Administration who must try to reconcile the realities of the world with the romantic notions floating around inside the head of Ronald Reagan. It is the belief of these men that Reagan can only be effective in persuading the public so long as he believes that he is being true to his own convictions. "The script has to make sense to him," one of them once told me, using the metaphor of Reagan's movie days.

The script in the Middle East and the domestic economy is shot full of holes. Everybody from Damascus to Dow-Jones knows it. But at the White House, it is important that Reagan not find out.

Columnist George Will, Washington Post:

His (Reagan's) strength is not that he is a great communicator. He is not. He is terrific at making people feel good about themselves and their country. That talent is necessary for any President—necessary, but not sufficient. A great communicator communicates ideas as well as moods, including complicated and sometimes distressing ideas. . . . His most serious potential weakness is the suspicion that he is on automatic pilot, navigating by ideology rather than reality, closed to evidence and unwilling to communicate unpleasant news or decisions.

George Will again:

Republican strength is related to the belief that the party may not be nice but is sensible—that it is hard-hearted, but not hard-headed. The new (Reagan) budget is the Republicans' "Chapter 11," a declaration of bankruptcy of political will and intellectual integrity.

Odds 'n Ends

NOW THE 'CESS POLL,' the ultimate poll. Radio station in Palo Alto County, Iowa, polls voters on presidential preference by reading off names of candidates, asking listeners to flush toilets to vote. Popularity is gauged by measuring drop in water pressure.

OH, TO BE RICH like the National Conservative PAC, which launches $2 million negative campaign against Walter Mondale reminiscent of its smear campaigns against several Senate incumbents past couple of elections. Starts TV/radio and news ads in New Hampshire. Not only does Mondale lash back at NCPAC's "character assassination," but one rival for Democratic presidential nomination, John Glenn, also denounces right-wing group's "lies" and "misrepresentations."

REAGAN STRENGTH IN SOUTH not rubbing off on GOP, New York Times poll finds. Huge growth of GOP strength in south that started with Barry Goldwater's candidacy in 1964 and resulted in fair number of elected Republicans at upper levels has ground to halt in Reagan years. Same poll taken in January 1980 and January 1984 shows GOP support hovering at about 19 percent, not enough to provide party any solid base in local level elections.

FAIR'S FAIR, and who would question the fairness of comforting the wealthy. Joint Committee on Taxation figures all taxpayers making less than $75,000 a year will lose from $95 to $138 as a result of Reagan tax changes. That's the bad news. Good news is the misunderstood rich—those over $75,000 a year—will realize net gains of $403 to $17,403.

WHAT'S ROGER STONE'S role in Reagan reelection campaign? He wears $600 suits, drives a Mercedes, lunches at the most expensive spots. Have you guessed his job yet? He's GOP's resident expert on blue-collar and ethnic voters and is regional director of Reagan campaign in northeast and midwest. Stone comes out of "new right" background, was one of founders of National Conservative PAC.

HOW MANY CANDIDATES for President? If you guessed a number fewer than 156, you're wrong. As of late January, exactly 156 had registered with Federal Election Commission, a number that's expected to double before filing closes. Major proposals of some of the candidates: Move nation's capital to Davenport, Iowa (well, why not?); eliminate Federal Reserve, International Monetary Fund, United Nations (Congress and the Treasury, too, if they don't act fast enough to lower federal deficit); abolish the Constitution; change length of a week to six days, year to 360 days to be "more harmonious with the universe."

CORPORATE SHARE of national tax burden has dwindled to less than 8 percent from the 25-plus of little more than a decade ago. Public is aware corporations aren't pulling their load. In recent Harris poll, 14 ways to help reduce federal deficit were listed. The only ones on which a majority agreed involved increasing corporate taxes. Each of three such options had more than 60 percent support. Two of Reagan's pet notions just don't fly. Only 17 percent back cut in entitlement programs; just 29 percent okay taxing workers for employer paid health insurance premiums.

Which 'Great Communicator' Are We Supposed to Believe?

"President Reagan said today that federal budget deficits were not a serious threat to the economic recovery and were not the cause of high interest rates."

—New York Times 2/16/84

"Only the threat of indefinitely prolonged high budget deficits threatens the continuation of sustained non-inflationary growth and prosperity. It raises the specter of sharply higher interest rates, choked off investment, renewed recession and higher unemployment."

Council cites assault on protections

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Executive Council issued a strong indictment of the Reagan Administration for using the instruments of government to favor employers and the wealthy and undermine the rights of workers and low-income families.

In a series of statements adopted at its winter meeting here, the council charged that the Administration has so crippled the enforcement of labor standards, civil rights, safety and health regulations and consumer protections that "only the election of a new President" can begin to undo the damage.

Specifically, the council charged that the Reagan Administration has:

- Interfered through the Office of Management & Budget with government rulemaking procedures so as to weaken standards and regulations and thus threaten "the health and well-being of workers and consumers."
- "Systematically eroded" worker rights under the Occupational Safety & Health Act.
- "Drastically cut" Medicare and Medicaid benefits for the needy and the elderly while seeking to tax workers' health care coverage but doing "little or nothing" to restrain health care inflation.
- Indicated that the Justice Dept. may intervene during the appeals process to oppose the landmark court victory on pay equity won by the State, County & Municipal Employees over the State of Washington.

In the area of foreign policy, the council said "the President's rhetoric cannot conceal the fact that his Lebanon policy has failed," and it accused the Administration of sending American troops into Lebanon without giving them "a clear sense of mission."

Earlier actions

The statements, detailed elsewhere in this issue, followed earlier council actions denouncing the Administration's economic policy failures and warning that its projected huge deficits "may tip the economy into yet another Reagan recession."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, at a news conference between sessions, expanded on the council's charges. Kirkland accused the Administration of "loading" the National Labor Relations Board with anti-union ideologues and systematically shifting the Labor Dept. from being "an

Poverty rise documented by all tallies

Poverty rose substantially during the Reagan Administration no matter how it is measured, the Census Bureau found.

Earlier, it had reported that the percentage of Americans in households with incomes below the official poverty level had climbed 28.2 percent from 1979 to 1982.

Administration apologists have contended that the poverty data is misleading, since it doesn't take into account the value of non-cash benefits received by some of America's poor—primarily food stamps, subsidized housing and medical care.

Most poor households don't get all these benefits but the Census Bureau nevertheless put together an assortment of alternative measurements of poverty, using different assumptions as to the value of non-cash benefits.

The numbers differed substantially. But when the same approach was taken for 1979 and 1982 calculations, the rise in poverty was even sharper.

Compared with the 28.2 percent rise in the official poverty figures, based on cash income, the increase over the same period under the alternative computations ranged from 34.7 to 47.1 percent.

The highest percentage rise made what most observers consider an unrealistic assumption that the market value of virtually all goods and services available to low-income households translates directly into the same dollar amount of added income.

Official tally

For any one year, this achieves the greatest theoretical reduction in the number and percent of Americans living in poverty. Thus, for 1982, the poverty population would be only 22.9 million or 10 percent of the population instead of the official tally of 34.4 million or 15 percent.

But when the same assumptions are made for 1979, the increase in poverty is 47.1 percent.

Other alternatives, more in tune with what the Census Bureau considered a realistic cash equivalent, were closer to the official poverty figures, both in num-

Protest union-busting

Leading a march to protest the anti-union policies of the Associated Builders & Contractors Association are AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Vice President Charles H. Pillard. A number of other AFL-CIO Executive Council members joined the informational picketing by 1,200 demonstrators at a Miami Beach hotel where the non-union ABC was meeting. The march was organized by the Miami Building & Construction Trades Council and the South Florida AFL-CIO.

Health cost curb urged, 'takeaways' challenged

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for legislation and community action to curb health care costs and urged affiliates to resist "takeaways" of health benefits at the bargaining table.

An Executive Council statement scored the Reagan Administration's punish-the-victim approach to the escalation of health costs—which have been going up about double the rate of the consumer price index.

In the two big public programs, the council noted, the Administration wants to compel the elderly and disabled to pay more for Medicare services and the poor to pay more for Medicaid.

The Administration has again proposed taxing workers on the "excess" value of health insurance provided by their employers to encourage shifts to cheaper limited benefit plans. And it also is pushing a voucher system that would "reward" federal employees who choose the least adequate health insurance, the statement pointed out.

The council gave a strong endorsement to the approach taken by the health care cost containment bill recently introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.).

Strong endorsement

Their bill would tighten existing controls on hospital charges for Medicare patients and apply the controls on hospital and physician charges to non-Medicare hospital patients as well. The intent is to assure that lower costs for Medicare and Medicaid patients won't result in a shift of costs to hospital patients covered by private insurance plans.

The council noted that the AFL-CIO has urged affiliates and union members to take part in community coalitions organized to hold down health care costs while maintaining quality services. Such coalitions can negotiate fees and encourage development of health maintenance organizations, it suggested.

But "we cannot wait" on legislation or local community action, the council stressed, adding:

"Unions must strongly resist health care takeaways at the collective bargaining table. We urge our affiliates, when faced with demands to slash negotiated health care benefits, to propose alternatives which reduce costs without reducing benefits."

As an example, the statement urged,

Unions, nursing home chain agree to improve relations

By Susan Dunlop

The Food & Commercial Workers and the Service Employees signed a letter of understanding with Beverly Enterprises, Inc. that points to improved relations with the nation's largest nursing home chain and smooths the way for organizing and bargaining by Beverly employees.

Under the terms, the unions will end their "corporate campaign" against Beverly in exchange for the company's commitment to recognize the right of employees to choose union representation and its cooperation in providing a "non-coercive atmosphere" during election campaigns.

The agreement also establishes a labor-management task force to resolve disputes.

Early in 1983, the SEIU and the UFCW launched a joint, nationwide campaign to organize Beverly employees and to improve patient care in the company's more than 800 facilities.

Part of the strategy included the corporate campaign—mounted with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.—that used direct contacts with shareholders to put pressure on Beverly to change its anti-union stance.

On the organizing side of the campaign, the unions have won 70 percent of the elections at Beverly-owned or operated facilities, with most of the victories coming in the south. Several successful campaigns

Election-year session of the COPE Administrative Committee was held during a break in the Executive Council meeting. The committee includes the council and political action officials of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Erosion of job safety-health rights tied to deliberate Reagan policies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO accused the Reagan Administration of undermining established job safety protections and interfering with the development of new federal standards.

The Executive Council specifically directed the accusations at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Office of Management & Budget.

It charged that "since taking office in 1981, the Reagan Administration has systematically eroded worker rights under the Occupational Safety & Health Act," and urged that the labor movement "redouble our efforts through collective bargaining, establishment of safety and health committees and union participation in health and safety matters."

Congressional oversight

The council also called for "vigorous" congressional oversight of OSHA to thwart any further regressions in worker protections and to assure that the agency fulfills the congressional mandate.

The council said that under the Reagan Administration, OSHA has:

- Instituted a series of unjustified exemption programs that eliminate the rights to routine safety and health inspections for millions of workers.
- Restricted the right of workers and their representatives to obtain an OSHA inspection in response to oral and written complaints.
- Cancelled a provision guaranteeing pay for workers who participate in OSHA inspections.
- Failed to pursue cases of employer discrimination against workers who exercise their rights under the Act.
- Reduced training grants for worker education from $14 million to $7 million while pressing for a $6-million increase in the employer-only consultation grant program which can exempt employers from general schedule inspections.
- Proposed to eliminate thousands of substances from the list of chemicals covered by the access standard, for which records must be made available to workers and union representatives.
- Proposed to end union access to other health and safety information.
- Inflicted major staffing cuts that greatly reduced OSHA's effectiveness.

The council statement noted that the number of workers exercising their right to request a complaint inspection dropped from 29,000 in 1980 to just 13,000 in 1983 and more than a half of all worker complaints failed to generate an on-site inspection.

OSHA's dismal record under the Reagan Administration includes serious lack of commitment to protecting workers by developing new standards or improving old ones, the council said. Part of this is due to the desire of the White House Office of Management & Budget to put industry's imprint on all new regulatory efforts.

Strong objection

"The AFL-CIO strongly objects to OMB interference in standard-setting, which threatens the health and well-being of workers and consumers," the council stressed. "We will oppose OMB efforts to weaken government standards and regulations and resist legislative initiatives to increase OMB intervention in rulemaking."

It charged that "OMB has used its role as the reviewer of all proposed and final major federal regulations to advocate industry positions and to substitute its political judgments for technical judgments of the responsible agencies."

The council statement pointed out that OMB has "no expertise" in drafting detailed regulations, stressing Congress delegated this responsibility to the various government agencies. "OMB's expertise is limited to cutting costs, not safeguarding American society," it said.

Citing the overruling of proposed OSHA standards as one of many examples of OMB's "interference," the council noted that in cases where scientific evidence and statutory requirements have supported stronger actions, OMB has:

- Objected to a proposed federal "right-to-know" standard on chemical hazards as "unnecessary."
- Pushed for respirator use instead of engineering controls on cotton dust exposure.
- Contended that workers exposed intermittently to the toxic fumigant EDB do not need medical examinations.
- Blocked OSHA from issuing a proposed grain safety standard until OSHA substituted dry sweeping, which is virtually useless in protecting workers, for effective dust-control requirements.

The council also noted the recent rebuke OSHA received from a federal court for delays in enforcing a 1975 court order requiring on-site water and basic sanitation facilities for migrant workers. OSHA in turn pinned the delays on OMB's review of the regulations and its resistance to approval of prior versions of the rules.

The court ordered OSHA to produce a field sanitation standard or face a contempt citation for failing to meet a court-ordered deadline. The order came after OSHA requested more time to develop the standard, which has been in the works for more than a decade.

Florida voters urged to reject spending cuts

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO called for the defeat of a proposed amendment to the Florida state constitution that would require an immediate rollback in state and local government spending to 1980-81 fiscal year levels, and limit future increases.

The measure, called the "Citizen's Choice Amendment," would produce an immediate cutback of about 25 percent of government spending and services in a state with a high proportion of elderly citizens and minorities who must look to government for the support they are unable to provide themselves, the Executive Council said in a statement.

The amendment, which will be voted on in a November referendum, would also cut back on the education of the young, and require a constant shrinking of state and local government services in the future. "It would be devastating to both private and public sector workers," the council said.

"Florida's Amendment 1 goes well beyond California's destructive Proposition 13 and the tax rollback initiative recently defeated in Ohio," the council statement observed. "Victory for the illusionary tax limitation campaign in Florida would give new life to those who claim society has no responsibility for the jobless, the poor and the infirm."

Reagan 'wrong again' on pay equity

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Hints by the Justice Dept. that it may intervene against workers in the appeal of the landmark Washington State pay equity decision are "the latest evidence" that the Reagan Administration is "continually wrong" on civil rights issues, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

In a statement underscoring the AFL-CIO's strong support efforts to win pay equity, the council criticized indications made by Assistant Atty. Gen. for Civil Rights William Bradford Reynolds that the Justice Dept. may join in the state's appeal of a federal district court decision finding Washington guilty of deliberate, sex-based pay discrimination against its employees. The case was brought by the State, County & Municipal Employees as part of a decade-long effort to win equity for state workers.

The court has ordered the state to raise the pay of some 15,000 of its employees, mostly women, and to provide back pay as a remedy for the bias.

The council's statement stressed that "the proper role for the United States is to provide aid and assistance to the victims of sex discrimination, not to the employers whose pay policies exploit women."

The labor movement would appeal to the federal government to change its position and support AFSCME's position "in other times," the council said, "but given the Administration's record, there is little hope for such a change" from the Reagan Justice Dept.

The AFL-CIO will work with AFSCME in the appeal process "to preserve . . . the pay equity victory" in the case, the council said.

Pension fund raids prompt call for action

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Loopholes in the federal pension protection law have allowed companies to manipulate retirement funds for their own profit, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council expressed concern at a trend toward termination of "over-funded" defined-benefit retirement plans so that firms can pocket "excess" fund assets.

A plan is considered over-funded if the value of its assets exceeds the amount that would be needed to pay off the accrued benefits due to its employees. The so-called over-funding usually results from increased interest rate assumptions or fluctuations in the value of securities held by the fund.

The council statement expressed concern at the inaction of the Labor Dept., the Internal Revenue Service and the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. in the face of increased "corporate raids" on pension funds.

Since 1980, it noted, 138 corporations have taken over $517 million from their employees' pension funds in "excess assets." An estimated 2,700 other defined-benefit plans have "excess assets" of over $1 million, providing what the council saw as a "tempting" target.

Fund abuse

The council also voiced concern at abuse of a section of the pension reform law—the Employees Retirement Income Security Act—which allows up to 10 percent of a pension fund's assets to be invested in the stock of the company.

While that isn't necessarily improper if the transfers of stock are at fair market value, the council noted that pension rights earned by workers can be endangered by stock manipulations and transfers made to benefit the company rather than the pension fund.

An accompanying fact sheet noted that stock transfers are made to improve a company's cash liquidity or to protect a corporation from take over. It suggested the need for greater scrutiny and regulation to assure that workers' pensions aren't endangered.

The council called on Congress "to protect the rights of pension participants and to preserve the integrity and promise of the nation's private pension system."

HRDI seeks to make unions 'full partners' in job training

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute got a green light from its board of trustees for a continuing effort to make the trade union movement a full participant in carrying out the federal Job Training Partnership Act.

HRDI President Alan Kistler said the institute has worked with AFL-CIO central bodies in every state and with many of the federation's affiliates "to strengthen organized labor's participation in job training and make HRDI's resources available to the labor movement nationwide."

A report by HRDI Director Mike Arnold stressed the dual goals of making the trade union movement a full partner in JTPA programs, and seeing that training programs aren't used to displace regular workers or undercut their conditions of employment.

In addition to its JTPA activities, Arnold noted, the institute is strengthening its placement assistance to handicapped and disabled workers.

The trustees also reviewed HRDI activities to help workers hit by plant closings and large-scale layoffs—a problem continuing despite improvements in the economy. Programs typically involve cooperative efforts by unions, companies and communities where layoffs take place.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who will again serve as chairman of HRDI's board of trustees, commended the institute for its achievements in the face of severe reductions in federal funding over the past three years.

Kistler, who is director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, was re-elected president and AFL-CIO Comptroller William Collins was re-elected secretary-treasurer.

Three new trustees were elected: Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers President Joseph M. Misbrener, Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell and Plumbers & Pipefitters President Marvin J. Boede.

advocate and defender of the interests of working people" and a new role as "an outpost of employers."

He called the first three years of the Reagan Administration a "bleak" period for workers and the country at large.

In other major actions during the week-long meeting, the Executive Council approved the issuance of an AFL-CIO charter to the Association of Flight Attendants, which previously had been an autonomous affiliate of the Air Line Pilots. The request for the direct charter was presented by AFA President Linda A. Puchala with the support of ALPA President Henry A. Duffy.

Two boycotts

The council also endorsed consumer boycotts being pressed by the Newspaper Guild against Consumers Union publications and services and by the Machinists against Nixdorff-Lloyd Chain Co. of St. Louis. In both cases the unions are engaged in unfair labor practice strikes against the employers.

Three other firms were added to labor's "unfair" list for engaging union busting tactics that have disrupted bargaining relationships. They are the Foss Launch & Tug Co. of Seattle, where the Masters, Mates & Pilots are seeking a new contract; the R-Way Furniture Co. of Sheboygan, Wis., where the Furniture Workers are on strike, and MAPCO Petroleum's Delta Refinery in Memphis, Tenn., where members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers are fighting to preserve their contract.

As an outgrowth of discussions at the 1983 AFL-CIO convention, a delegation of three state federation presidents—Robert G. Gibson of Illinois, Julius Uehlein of Pennsylvania, and Marvin L. Williams of Washington—reported on problems confronting state and local central labor bodies.

Following their presentation, the council adopted a statement strongly encouraging the affiliation of all local unions with the central bodies and calling for creation of a special subcommittee to explore ways of achieving expanded affiliations.

Other council statements adopted in the final days of the meeting called for defeat of Florida's Amendment 1, which seeks to roll back public spending in that state; efforts of unions and their members to achieve a totally voluntary blood donor program that will assure an adequate supply of safe blood; redress of the injustices committed against Americans and resident aliens of Japanese and Aleut ancestry who were interned and relocated during World War II, and action by Congress to preserve the integrity of workers' pension funds against corporate raids.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue presented a series of reports to the council on the federation's finances, the operations of the internal disputes plan, and several resolutions referred to the council by the convention. Donahue also gave an interim report on the activities of the Committee on the Future of Work.

Committee reports were presented by Vice Presidents Charles H. Pillard on housing, Al Heaps on community services, William H. Wynn on relations with United Way of America, John J. Sweeney on social security, J. C. Turner on occupational safety and health, and William W. Winpisinger on retirees.

The council approved grants to cover the budgets of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the following support groups: the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, Concerned Seniors for Better Government, National Council of Senior Citizens, Coalition of Labor Union Women and Frontlash.

Contributions approved

Contributions were voted to the National Urban Coalition, Afro-Asian Institute of Histadrut, Coalition to Protect Social Security, Religion & Labor Conference, Urban Environment Conference, Inc., Conference on Economic Progress, National Council of Negro Women, National Consumers League, Freedom House, University of Oregon Foundation, National Urban League, Southern Regional Council, Consumer Energy Council of America, National Low Income Housing Coalition, Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Foundation, Americans for Energy Independence, National Housing Conference, Full Employment Action Council, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the Samuel Gompers Papers, National Park Foundation, Henry M. Jackson Foundation, Reading Is Fundamental, Committee for National Health Insurance, the New Leader, Joint Council on Economic Education, National Economic Recovery Project, No Greater Love, People for the American Way and the Jewish Labor Committee.

The next meeting of the Executive Council will be held May 7-9, 1984, at the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship at Piney Point, Md.

Focus on France

Sec.-Gen. Andre Bergeron of the French labor federation, Force Ouvriere, addresses the Executive Council winter meeting. He cited the long history of cooperation between FO and the AFL-CIO. Bergeron also discussed economic and political developments in France and Western Europe. He is flanked by AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown and President Lane Kirkland.

Mediation proves effective in settling affiliate disputes

Bal Harbour, Fla. — AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said that mediation continues to prove its effectiveness as a means of settling disputes between affiliates under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution.

In his annual report on the operations of the Internal Disputes Plan set forth in Article XX, Donahue said 51 cases—57.3 percent of those processed during the year — were settled at the mediation level. Since 1962 when the plan was initiated, 1,303 of the 2,281 cases filed have been resolved through mediation.

All cases filed since February 1982 have been handled by a permanent mediator, John N. Gentry. In cases not settled at the mediation level, the impartial umpires, D. Quinn Mills and Howard Lesnick, conduct hearings and issue determinations. Such determinations have been issued in 967 cases since the plan's inception.

New cases

The report showed that 65 new cases were filed in 1983, and 31 remained pending at the end of the year. Umpires' determinations found violations in 21 cases and no violations in eight, with two cases pending at that level.

Seven appeals were pending at the start of the year, and 14 new appeals were filed. At the subcommittee level, determinations were sustained in nine cases. The appeals were withdrawn in four cases and remained pending in 13.

Twenty non-compliance complaints were pending at the start of the period, and eight were filed during the year. Subcommittees achieved compliance in eight cases and found non-compliance in one. Two complaints were withdrawn and 14 remained actively pending while three others were non-active.

Two affiliates remain listed as in non-compliance and subject to Article XX sanctions: the International Typographical Union and the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians.

In other action, the Executive Council granted one-year extensions of Article XX jurisdictional protection in seven situations where active organizing campaigns are under way but election petitions cannot be filed because of contract restrictions or other rules.

The seven cases involve units sought by the State, County & Municipal Employees at Sacramento, Calif., Suffolk County, N.Y., Connecticut Community College, Maine State Employees, Tonawanda, N.Y., and Warm Springs, Mont.

Wider union role pressed to spur blood donations

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A shortage of blood and blood products necessary to meet patient needs makes expanded blood donations by union members and their families critically important, he AFL-CIO said.

"It is vitally important that this shortage be overcome," the Executive Council declared. "While union members voluntarily provide about one-third of the annual supply of blood to the American Red Cross and a large amount to other agencies, we must do more."

The council also urged that affiliated unions enter into specific agreements with agencies for the voluntary donation and distribution of blood in their communities, as some international unions now do.

The AFL-CIO has long called for a totally voluntary blood program that would assure an adequate supply of safe blood and blood products, the council noted. The program calls for:

- The nation's total supply of blood and blood products be furnished by voluntary donors, and any healthy individual who meets nationally uniform health standards be encouraged to donate blood, and that medical need be the only eligibility requirement for receiving blood.
- All blood banks and blood services be federally licensed under uniform federal standards and inspection, and that any uniform national blood resource-sharing program or organization of blood services be required to meet all federal requirements to assure safe blood supplies.

Muddled Mid-East policy assailed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Reagan Administration's inability to distinguish between its friends and foes in the Middle East has opened new opportunities for Soviet involvement in the region, and produced a defeat for American policy, the AFL-CIO charged.

The Executive Council said in a statement at its winter meeting that the President's rhetoric cannot conceal the fact that his Lebanon policy has failed.

"Indeed, the rhetoric only compounds the confusion and uncertainty of purpose that have clouded the Administration's policy from its inception," the council charged.

"American troops should not be dispatched anywhere in the world without a clear sense of mission that they and the American people can understand and support. Instead of defining such a mission, the Administration has issued a stream of contradictory statements and assessments of the situation in Lebanon."

While some Administration spokesmen have said U.S. Marines were sent to Lebanon to defend the Gemayel government, others have said their mission simply was to protect Americans in the Beirut area, the council noted. Some have said the United States would oppose abrogation of the May 17 agreement on Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon, and still others have said that since the United States did not sign the agreement it had no position on the matter.

Contradictions

The council also pointed out that some Administration spokesmen said that the Marines would be redeployed to offshore ships in 30 days, while others said they would leave Beirut earlier. And from the beginning of the U.S. military presence in Lebanon, sharp disagreements between the Pentagon and the State Department over objectives and prospects for success have undermined the Marines' morale and public support for the mission.

"These contradictions suggest that the President has been unable to understand, let alone define and explain, his own policy in Lebanon," the council said. "At issue here is not simply the gross mismanagement of a policy, but the policy itself."

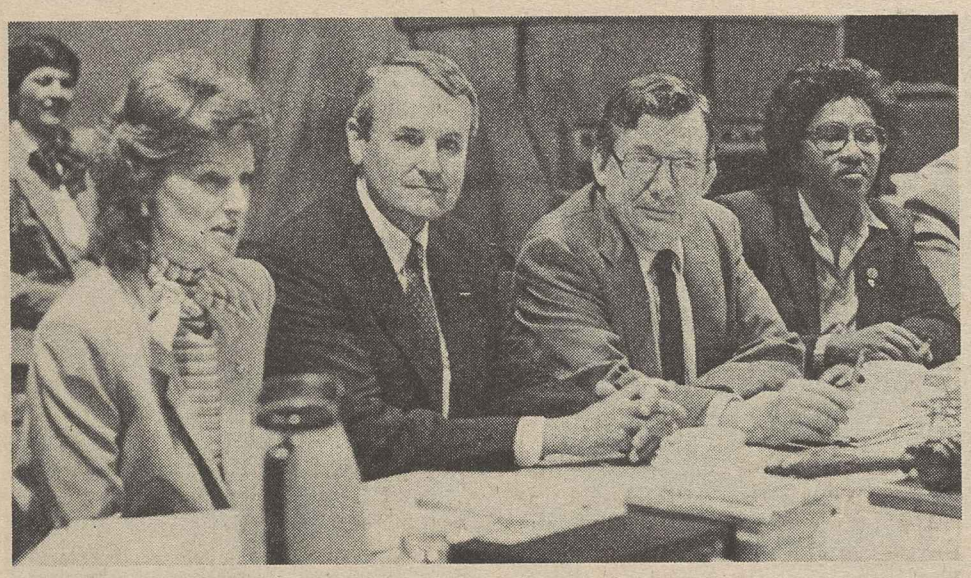
The council was highly critical of the Administration for pressuring Israel to halt its advance into Lebanon and calling for it to withdraw its troops in the assurance that Syria would also withdraw its forces.

"It is clear that the Syrians have no intention of quitting Lebanon and, indeed, see their predominance there as progress toward their dreams of a 'Greater Syria,' " the council said. "Syrian expansionism, funded by other Arab states and backed by Soviet arms, constitutes the chief obstacle to peace in Lebanon—not the Israeli army."

At a press conference, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said that the key to progress in the region is "a full and frank recognition that we have only one dependable ally in the Middle East, and that is the State of Israel."

The United States should do nothing to weaken or undermine the position of that democracy, the council stressed.

"Contrary to what seems to be wisdom in many quarters of the foreign policy establishment, the problems, the conflicts, the burning issues in the Middle East are in no case the fault of Israel or the result of Israel's presence," the council said.



At the Executive Council meeting, Flight Attendants President Linda Puchala, Air Line Pilots President Henry Duffy, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Vice President Barbara Hutchinson. The council approved a charter for AFA.

Gilliam, McGlotten named to key AFL-CIO staff posts

Arleen F. Gilliam has been appointed an assistant to the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer and director of a new federation division of budget and planning, while Robert M. McGlotten has been named to the top associate director's post in the Dept. of Legislation.

In another appointment, Legislative Director Ray Denison announced that Ernest Dubester will join the AFL-CIO staff Apr. 9 as a legislative representative.

Gilliam has been on the federation's staff since 1981 as an assistant director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, specializing in unemployment insurance and workers' compensation issues. Most recently she has been working with Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue on budget matters.

Before joining the AFL-CIO, Gilliam was with the Labor Dept. as executive assistant to the assistant secretary for employment and training. Earlier, she was a budget analyst with the Congressional Budget Office.

Gilliam, who is 35, received a bachelor's degree in economics from Skidmore College and a master's of business administration degree from the Sloan School of Management at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology where she specialized in labor and industrial relations.

McGlotten, who had been an associate director of legislation, has been given new duties as Denison's top assistant. He assumes the post formerly held by Howard Marlowe, who left the federation to form his own government affairs consulting firm.

McGlotten, 46, has been on the legislative department staff since 1974 after serving as executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute and as a staff representative in the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights. During 1973, he was on leave for an assignment with the Labor Dept.

Before coming to the AFL-CIO in 1967, McGlotten was a staff representative with the Transport Workers. He attended St. Joseph's College for Industrial & Labor Management in Philadelphia and holds a law degree from the University of Pennsylvania.

Dubester has been an attorney with the firm of Highsaw & Mahoney since 1981 where he worked with a number of AFL-CIO unions on various issues including employer bankruptcies.

He was on the staff of the National Labor Relations Board for six years, including service as senior counsel to former NLRB Chairman John Fanning. He was on the staff of the Senate Labor Committee and has been an aide for several members of Congress.

Dubester, who is 33, received a bachelor of arts degree in political science from Boston College, a law degree from Catholic University, and a master's degree in labor law from Georgetown University.

Pilots endorse shift

Direct charter voted for Flight Attendants

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Flight Attendants became the newest affiliate of the AFL-CIO with Executive Council's approval of a charter for the 21,000-member union that represents cabin crews on 14 air carriers nationwide.

The AFA is headed by President Linda A. Puchala, Sec.-Treas. Pamela Casey and Vice President Susan Bianchi Sand, making it the first AFL-CIO union whose top officers are all women. AFA is based in Washington, D.C.

The Flight Attendants had been an autonomous affiliate of the Air Line Pilots since 1973, and the council acted on AFA's request for its own charter with the strong endorsement of ALPA President Henry A. Duffy.

At a news conference following the council action, Puchala said AFA's status as an autonomous, chartered union within the AFL-CIO gives it "recognition from the labor movement as the national flight attendant union" that will be a major boost to the union's organizing activities.

Organizing prospects

Puchala said of the nation's 60,000 flight attendants, about 40,000 are organized. In addition to AFA's 21,000 members, attendants on a number of other carriers are represented by the Transport Workers, the unaffiliated Teamsters, and by unaffiliated unions. Of the major national carriers, only Delta Airlines flight attendants are currently non-union.

AFA plans organizing drives among unaffiliated and non-union flight attendants, Puchala said, stressing that emphasis will be put on encouraging existing company unions to affiliate with AFA.

She told reporters that when the first flight attendants union was established in the 1940's within the structure of the pilots' association, its leaders had set a goal of eventually obtaining a separate union charter.

The union operated as a stewards' and stewardesses' division of ALPA until 1973 when it became a self-governing affiliate of the Pilots with separate financial, bargaining and political structure.

Joint efforts by Duffy, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Secy.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Vice President Joyce Miller—who is president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women — helped AFA obtain its new charter, Puchala said.

She stressed that the union's goals today continue to be strong representation of employees' rights in an airline industry that has been "disrupted" by deregulation, accelerated legislative and political activity, stepped-up action to deal with Civil Aeronautics Board and Federal Aviation Administration actions that effect flight attendants working conditions and air passenger safety, and strengthened collective bargaining efforts.

Puchala, who has been president since 1979, began her career as a flight attendant in 1969 on North Central Airlines, and has held local and national posts with AFA since 1973.

Casey, also elected in 1979, became a flight attendant with Alaska Airlines in 1971, and Sand, who heads AFA's organizing, legislative and training programs, began flying with United Airlines in 1969. She was elected in 1979.

The AFA charter brings the number of AFL-CIO affiliates to 96, and marks the fifth charter issued by the merged federation since 1955. Previous newly chartered unions include the Farm Workers in 1966, the Federation of School Administrators in 1976 and the Union of Police Associations and the Federation of Professional Athletes, both in 1979. The number of affiliates has changed frequently over the years, primarily because of mergers.

Redress backed for relocations of World War II

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Legislation to redress injustice suffered by Americans of Japanese and Aleut ancestry interned or relocated by the federal government during World War II is "clearly deserving" of the nation's support, the Executive Council declared.

"The legislation now pending before the Congress to implement the recommendation of the Commission on Wartime Relocation & Internment of Civilians does not seek to place blame or impugn the motives of those who pursued these policies 40 years ago.

"It seeks to redress a constitutional wrong and to resolve that such a violation of basic American democratic principles will not happen again. This unique and tragic national experience requires unique remedy," the council declared.

Proposed remedies

Bills introduced by Sen. Spark M. Matsunaga (D-Hawaii) and House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.) would provide three major remedies: an apology to those who were wrongly interned or relocated, pardons to those who violated laws while refusing to accept racially discriminatory treatment, and compensation to those still living.

The Wright bill, backed by 80 cosponsors, and the Matsunaga bill, supported by 13 cosponsors, differ only in the compensation they would award the Aleutian Islands natives.

Trust funds would be set up for educational and humanitarian purposes under both measures. Each surviving internee of Japanese ancestry would receive $20,000 in compensation. The House bill would give $5,000 to each surviving Aleut, while the Senate bill would give each surviving Aleut $12,000.

The congressionally appointed Commission on Wartime Relocation & Internment of Civilians concluded after a two-and-a-half year investigation that a "grave injustice was done to American citizens and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry who, without individual review or any probative evidence against them, were excluded, removed and detained by the United States during World War II."

Two new consumer boycotts backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed consumer boycotts against publications and services of Consumers Union and products of Nixdorff-Lloyd Chain Co.

The council also condemned three companies—Foss Launch & Tug Co., R-Way Furniture Co. and MAPCO Petroleum Inc.'s Delta Refinery—for union-busting tactics that have disrupted bargaining relationships.

The boycott against Consumers Union of Mount Vernon, N.Y., which includes its monthly magazine, Consumer Reports, was launched by the Newspaper Guild after management's refusal to bargain on anything but rollbacks forced employees to strike Jan. 9. The Guild had been trying to bargain a new agreement for three months.

The union represents 140 employees including writers, editors and artists, engineers, technicians and researchers who study, test and evaluate products, and CU's professional and clerical office staff. Ironically, the council noted, CU was founded 47 years ago by striking employees of Consumer Research magazine.

The council urged union members to cancel subscriptions to all CU publications, to refuse financial support to CU legal advocacy offices and to urge television and radio stations and local newspapers to drop CU information services.

Publications in addition to Consumer Reports and the annual buying guide include a children's magazine, Penny Power, a newsletter, Advance Alert, and new books entitled "Love, Sex and Aging" and "Consumer Reports Guide to Electronics in the Home."

CU films are shown on Home Box Office cable television, its tv, radio and newspaper features are distributed nationally, and its legal aid offices operate in several cities. A new service, "Dial Consumer Reports," is being tested in Los Angeles.

In its statement on the Nixdorff-Lloyd Chain Co. boycott, the council pointed out that Machinists have been on strike against the St. Louis firm since August 1982.

Union-buster at work

The company has hired strikebreakers to replace the 177 IAM members, the council noted, stressing that Nixdorff-Lloyd has been using a union-busting consultant to direct its strategy.

The company has refused to make any effort to resolve the 17-month-old dispute since it forced the strike, the council said.

Nixdorff-Lloyd heavy duty chain, identifiable by the company name on the spool, is sold to consumers in hardware stores, the council pointed out. The company also manufacturers welded and unwelded chains for buses, trucks and farm equipment.

The three companies were placed on the AFL-CIO Unfair List to call attention to their anti-labor tactics. The firms are:

- Foss Launch & Tug Co., which forced members of the Masters, Mates & Pilots to strike the Seattle firm Feb. 2, after management abandoned a 50-year history of constructive bargaining and refused to enter negotiations to renew the agreement that expired Jan. 31.

- R-Way Furniture Co. of Sheboygan, Wis., which dumped a 40-year bargaining relationship with the Furniture Workers and demanded that union members accept a "final offer" package of concessions ranging from a cut in the wage rate for piecework to a limitation on the union's ability to file grievances. The 135 UFWA members walked off the job on Jan. 11.

- MAPCO Petroleum's Delta Refinery in Memphis, Tenn., where management rejected a proposal by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers to extend the then-current contract beyond its Jan. 7 expiration date and instead unilaterally cut wages and medical benefits, consolidated and eliminated some job classifications and increased use of unskilled workers employed by outside contractors. The company has ignored a cease-and-desist order from the National Labor Relations Board.

The Executive Council asked the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to work with the Newspaper Guild and the Machinists in publicizing the consumer boycotts throughout the labor movement, and urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to inform their members of the union-busting activities of the firms on the unfair list.

Appeals court orders aid restored to disabled

A decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordering the Reagan Administration to restore disability payments wrongfully denied to thousands of former social security receipents could have nationwide impact.

The decision, affecting between 50,000 and 80,000 people in the court's nine-state jurisdiction in the West, came on Feb. 22 as Health & Human Services Sec. Margaret M. Heckler was defending her handling of the disability benefits program at a Senate Budget Committee hearing.

The appellate court in San Francisco rebuked Heckler for not complying with two of its earlier decisions ordering the department to prove that a recipient's medical condition had improved before it cancelled benefits. In its latest decision, the appeals court said that Heckler had undermined the Constitution's separation of powers principle by defying a court order.

Attorneys handling the class action suit filed in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles in behalf of a number of disabled workers and poor people said that about 400,000 Americans have lost their benefits since the Administration began its review of disability cases in March 1981.

While the 9th Circuit decision is binding only in California, Washington, Montana, Oregon, Idaho, Alaska, Hawaii, Nevada, Arizona, and Guam, it sets a precedent that courts in other parts of the nation may cite in ruling on similar cases.

Defying the court

The appeals court noted in its decision that "far from raising questions of judicial interference in Executive actions, this case presents the reverse constitutional problem: the Executive Branch defying the court and undermining what are perhaps the fundamental precepts of our constitutional system — the separation of powers and respect for the law."

At issue in the case, filed by the Legal Aid Foundation of Los Angeles and several other public interest groups, was how the Social Security Administration evaluated a recipient's medical condition in cutting off benefits. In 1981 and 1982, the 9th Circuit ruled that the Administration could not cancel the benefits unless it first presented evidence that a person's medical condition had improved.

In its wholesale purge of people from social security disability insurance and supplemental security income rolls, HHS did not submit such proof. When the appeals court issued its rulings, Heckler defied them and refused to acquiesce in agreeing to an injunction.

Judge William Gray of the Los Angeles federal district court, where the class action suit originally was filed, had ordered Heckler to restore the benefits.

The case went to the Supreme Court, where Justice William Rehnquist stayed Gray's order until the 9th Circuit ruled on the government's appeal. That ruling has now been issued. The government has not indicated whether it will further appeal the decision. It has two weeks to do so.

In testimony before the Senate Budget Committee, Heckler defended the HHS reviews of social security disability payments, insisting they were "totally fair," and that there was no need for evidence of "medical improvement" to terminate benefits.

Legislative redress

The AFL-CIO has pressed for congressional action to stop the unjustified cancellation of the benefits. In a letter to Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Legislative Director Ray Denison called for enactment of a measure to ensure "fair, accurate and humane review" for all disability insurance beneficiaries.

Denison said the AFL-CIO supports the thrust of a House bill sponsored by Rep. J. J. Pickle (D-Tex.) and a more limited Senate bill by William S. Cohen (R-Me.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) committing the Social Security Administration to certain standards in evaluating disability.

All measurements show sharp rise in poverty rolls

bers and in the percentage of increase from 1979 to 1982.

In 1972, a family of four was considered poor with a cash income less than $7,486. The 1982 equivalent, after adjustment for inflation, was $9,862.

Unemployment and inflation were principal factors in the rise in poverty over the survey period, but Reagan program cuts also resulted in less non-cash assistance for many low-income households.

The Census Bureau report showed that the average market value of non-cash benefits received by poor families declined by 10.4 percent from 1979 to 1982.

Inclusion of the value of non-cash benefits brought about a substantial reduction of the number of older people counted as poor, since they are the most frequent users of medical care. Adding the value of Medicare and Medicaid services to their cash income thus had a large impact even though the medical care didn't make them any more affluent.

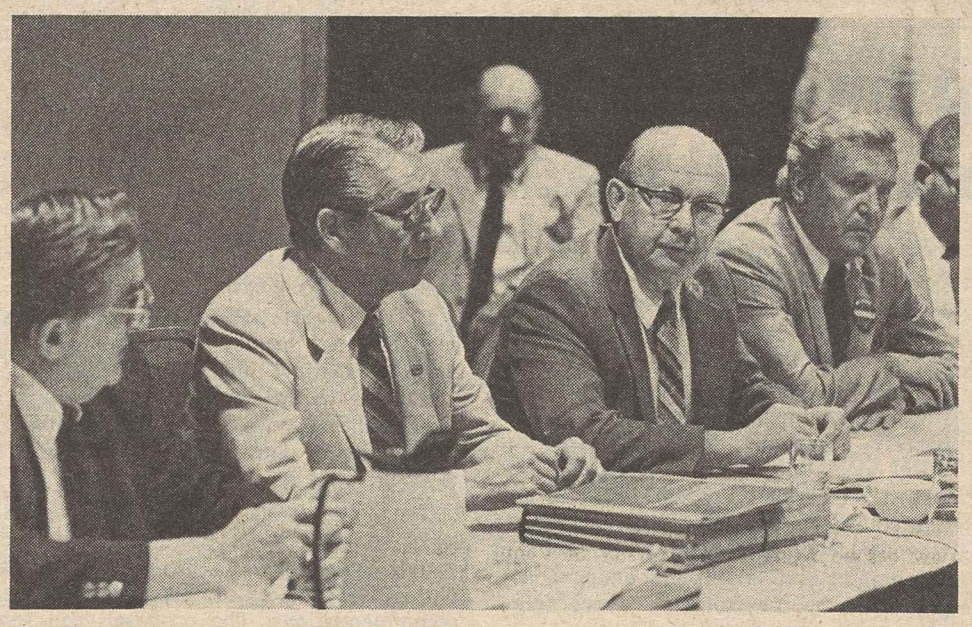
Unemployment also more than offset the stimulus of the first year of the Reagan tax cut, another new Census Bureau report showed.

In 1981, the latest year for which data is available, the after-tax income of the average household dropped 2.6 percent in constant dollars from the previous year.

For most people below the upper-income brackets, higher social security taxes offset the first-stage drop in income taxes. And even considering only the income tax, the proportion of poor people paying taxes rose from 7.7 percent in 1980 to 10 percent in 1981, the report showed.

The census study found that households with incomes of $75,000 or more had paid 41.3 percent of their incomes in taxes of some sort during 1980. But in 1981, the rate was only 38.9 percent.

Because social security benefits are adjusted for inflation, the after-tax income of the elderly rose by 1.7 percent from 1980 to 1981. But this was more than offset by a 3.2 percent drop in the income of households headed by a person under 65.



Role of central bodies

State and local labor bodies are the lifeblood of AFL-CIO programs, and local unions should be urged to affiliate with them, AFL-CIO Vice President Robert F. Goss stressed during the Executive Council meeting. Goss, who chaired the convention committee on state and local councils, was joined in his report by three state federation presidents. From left are Marvin L. Williams of Washington, Julius Uehlein of Pennsylvania, Goss, and Robert G. Gibson of Illinois.

Retail price index registers sharpest rise in five months

Retail prices in January posted their sharpest increase since last August, rising five-tenths of 1 percent as food, fuel, and telephone rates all cost consumers more.

About half of the January jump in the government's Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W) was due to higher prices for food, particularly for beef, pork, poultry, eggs, fresh fruits and vegetables, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

By another measure — the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U) — the January price rise was even greater, six-tenths of 1 percent. CPI-W is used for indexing social security and some other federal payments.

Severe winter weather was the cause of much of the rise in food prices, BLS said. The cold winter also pushed up home heating oil prices sharply.

The rise in local telephone rates because of rate restructuring following the breakup of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., also contributed to the CPI rise, the bureau said.

The overall January increase in prices compared with a one-tenth of 1 percent increase in December, and was the highest since August when there was an identical rise in the CPI.

Food tops price rise

Food prices rose 1.5 percent in January, after rising four-tenths of 1 percent in December. Medical care charges increased seven-tenths of 1 percent after rising four-tenths of 1 percent the previous month, and other goods and services rose eight-tenths of 1 percent compared with a rise of four-tenths of 1 percent a month earlier.

The Labor Dept. also reported that "real" average weekly earnings rose 1 percent in January, after rising six-tenths of 1 percent the month before. That reflected a six-tenths of 1 percent increase in average hourly earnings and an eight-tenths of 1 percent rise in average weekly hours worked, which were partially offset by the five-tenths of 1 percent rise in the CPI.

Over the year, the inflation-adjusted earnings were up 2.1 percent, but still below the 1979 level. Real weekly earnings expressed in constant, uninflated 1977 dollars averaged $174.91 a week in January.

The lower rate of inflation is largely the result of the long Reagan recession, as well as more stable world oil prices and a rising dollar that helped cause an actual decline in energy prices.

'Safety net' repair bill introduced

Three Democratic House members, all chairmen of subcommittees concerned with "safety-net" programs for the poor, joined in introducing an omnibus anti-poverty bill which includes a number of features that have been urged by the AFL-CIO.

The bill, by Representatives Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), Harold E. Ford (Tenn.) and Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), was proposed in the wake of Census Bureau reports documenting a sharp rise in poverty, no matter how it is measured.

They said their bill's "primary purpose" is to reverse that trend and its ingredients include a federal floor under AFDC benefits—for families with dependent children. It would require all states to provide assistance to two-parent families where both parents are unemployed. Only 25 states do so under the present optional program.

Other proposed changes would be designed to restore work incentives by avoiding an abrupt cutoff of assistance when a parent goes to work, mandate health insurance coverage for the unemployed and adopt various measures to reduce federal taxes on the working poor.

Council supports state, local bodies in affiliation drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council pledged to step up its efforts to encourage affiliations by local unions with state and local central labor bodies.

The council, in a statement that praised the central bodies as "the vital links" between the AFL-CIO, local unions and communities, pointed out that it is the central bodies "that coordinate and implement labor's programs by protecting and advancing the interests of working men and women at the state and local levels."

Stressing its commitment to strengthening the state and local councils by encouraging all eligible local unions to affiliate, the council endorsed appointment of a special AFL-CIO subcommittee on affiliation from the Ad Hoc Committee on State and Local Central Labor Bodies. The subcommittee will explore programs to expand affiliations, including "special efforts" by national and international union officers in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Members of the subcommittee, named by Federation President Lane Kirkland, are Vice Presidents Wayne E. Glenn, chairman, and Kenneth T. Blaylock, John DeConcini and Charles H. Pillard.

The council adopted the statement after hearing a report on the current condition of central bodies and a rundown of their common problems by the presidents of three major state federations—Robert G. Gibson, Illinois; Julius Uehlein, Pennsylvania, and Marvin L. Williams, Washington.

The report grew out of discussions of the Committee on State & Local Central Bodies at the 1983 convention. Vice President Robert F. Goss, who chaired the convention committee, presented the state AFL-CIO leaders to the council.

Voting rights

Sec.-Treas. Edward Fire of the Electronics Workers took exception to a remark by NBC's John Chancellor after the Iowa primary and wrote a letter to set the television commentator straight.

Chancellor suggested that a union member at a political caucus might have cause to worry that his shop steward would know how he voted. The implication was that retribution awaited a member who strayed from labor's political line.

Fire pointed out that shop stewards and union officers are elected by their fellow union-members and stand regularly for re-election. If there's any political backlash, it would be the steward who takes the heat, not the rank-and-file member.

So much for "labor bosses."

Newest officer

Sec.-Treas. Calvina S. Little of the United Garment Workers is formally sworn in as a vice president of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. at its winter meeting by President James E. Hatfield, center, and Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara. Little was elected last fall and her term began Jan. 1.

in Texas were aided by the AFL-CIO's Houston Organizing Project.

The joint campaign, the Beverly Employees Cooperative Action & Reform Effort, or BEVCARE, has been widely supported by a number of senior citizen, patient advocacy and nursing home reform groups.

Although all terms of the agreement were not made public, UFCW President William H. Wynn, SEIU President John J. Sweeney, Beverly Chairman Robert Van Tuyle and President David Banks said in a joint statement that the understanding "defines guidelines for an on-going relationship and provides a framework for cooperation on programs for employees and patients."

The union and company officials said a number of long-standing disputes were resolved under the terms of the agreement, and they agreed that the pact is based on recognition that both labor and management are committed to providing quality health care for residents and dignity and decent standards for employees.

Sweeney stressed that the agreement will aid the union in fulfilling "our commitment are committed to providing quality cency for employees." He said the understanding "is really the beginning of our full-fledged organizing effort," and he pointed out that the election victory rate "confirms the success" of the strategy of a unified effort on the part of the unions "to put our resources together to mount a more effective organization campaign."

The effort has also demonstrated the value of innovative new techniques in organizing, including use of communications media, the corporate campaign and extensive use of polling, Sweeney said.

Wynn said the unions are "very pleased" with the agreement, noting that when the Beverly campaign began, UFCW and SEIU local unions were up against "an almost impossible situation" both in getting collective bargaining agreements after winning elections at Beverly facilities and in retaining their rights in nursing homes purchased by the company where agreements were already in place.

Will seek pacts

With the understanding in place, Wynn said, the unions will get contracts in newly organized facilities, "and our contracts will be honored, our members retained and their rights will be respected" in homes acquired by Beverly.

Both union presidents said that the several months of talks leading to the formal agreement had resulted in settlement of a number of disputes, including an end to litigation, and a number of other disagreements are expected to be resolved.

The first meeting of the labor-management task force is scheduled for Mar. 13 and will be between the two union presidents and the company's top officers.

The unions said other meetings are planned for the rest of the year, and among the key topics that will be discussed along with labor relations issues are employee concerns about improved patient care.

Through new agency

Rights role stressed for Central America

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO gave a strong endorsement to the creation of a Central American Development Organization that would channel U.S. assistance to the region and be empowered to cut back aid to countries that fail to comply with basic human rights and democratic guarantees.

It could become "the most important achievement for democracy in this century," Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr. of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development testified at House hearings.

Establishment of the agency, generally referred to by its initials CADO, was proposed by the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, the so-called Kissinger commission. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was a member of it.

As the commission conceived it, one-fourth of U.S. aid to the region would be channeled through CADO. Its members from both Central America and the United States would consider economic policies and respect for human rights in allocating funds. It would cut off aid for violations of basic rights by majority vote.

Essential to reform

Doherty told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee headed by Rep. Michael Barnes (D-Md.) that establishment of CADO is important to achievement of the social, economic and political reforms in the region that should be integral to U.S. foreign policy.

The Administration has sent Congress legislation to implement the Kissinger panel's recommendations. For the most part, President Reagan's plan follows those recommendations. The proposals call for a six-year program of economic, development, and related aid to Central America totaling $8.3 billion.

The Administration's plan, however, would not directly establish CADO, but merely set out "a series of principles to guide the negotiations" among the United States and the other countries that would lead to its creation.

The Reagan proposal would not give CADO direct control over any U.S. aid. Instead, it would allow the new agency to make general recommendations on aid programs in the region, and to veto up to 25 percent of the economic aid allocated by the United States for any country in the region.

The Administration plan did not spell out many of the specifics of the CADO concept, and Doherty testified to the AFL-CIO's views on its role.

"We see its function as recommending and obtaining credit for campesinos (peasants), recommending and obtaining budgetary support to improve cooperative management, recommending and obtaining funds for low-cost housing, recommending and obtaining the funding of trade union apprentice and vocational training programs and, in short, effecting positively the requirements for social change contemplated in the report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America," he said.

"In any other form, the program would simply encourage a continuation of the defunct 'trickle-down' theory of economic and social progress."

As to structure, the AFL-CIO recommends that the agency model itself after the tripartite representation embodied in the International Labor Organization, a concept strongly backed by Kirkland as a member of the Kissinger panel. The ILO is made up of government, business, and labor representatives.

Doherty said the AFL-CIO envisions a CADO general assembly of probably 32 delegates from eight countries, including the United States, which would meet no fewer than six times a year to monitor and evaluate the progress of each member country in human rights, social, trade union, and political reform and economic development. The agency would be chaired by an American, with a Central American vice chairman.

Military aid condition

Doherty said the AFL-CIO applauds the concept of "conditionality" that runs throughout both the Kissinger commission report and the Administration's proposed legislation. The concept provides that all aid, but more importantly military aid, be conditioned on social, trade union, and political reform.

Such conditionality should apply not only to El Salvador, where blatant human rights violations occur almost daily, Doherty said, but throughout the region.

"Aid provided by the taxpayers of the United States should go only to those countries which are making a sincere and honest effort to control and eliminate human rights abuses and to promote democratic reforms," he said.

Senators warned about reciprocity in trade measure

A trade bill awaiting Senate action should be purged of provisions that would endanger American jobs, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged in a letter to senators.

Denison's criticism was aimed at the so-called reciprocity bill which the Senate Finance Committee added to a House-passed tariff bill.

Instead of true reciprocity, he cautioned, it is likely to lead to a unilateral reduction in U.S. tariffs and the export of American jobs.

The measure would grant the President five-year authority to reduce or eliminate U.S. tariffs on seven high-technology items related to semi-conductors. Its implementation, Denison suggested, would encourage U.S. companies to move abroad. "The result will be more export of highly skilled jobs."

Denison noted that the legislation also would encourage direct U.S. investment abroad—"at a time when the United States is suffering from a severely weakened industrial base."

The "reciprocity" would be to encourage additional foreign investment in this country, but without safeguards against takeovers of essential energy sources and other natural resources, Denison said.

"This nation cannot afford a U.S. trade policy that uses the word 'reciprocity' as mere window-dressing for additional negotiating authority that will give away more of America's substance," he insisted.

Reagan and Labor

The following is from remarks by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a news conference, Feb. 23, 1984, during the Executive Council's winter meeting at Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE EXPERIENCE of the past three years has been a bleak one in terms of the concerns and interests of working people and, we think, of the country at large. Vast areas of national concern have been neglected. Things that ought to have been done have not been done; and things that ought not to have been done have been done. And, as the litany goes, there is no health in us.

With respect, particularly to certain areas of trade union concern, this Administration has placed new tools in the hands of employers to attack trade unions.

It has, of course, sent out a message and a signal, beginning with the case of the Air Traffic Controllers, where the response of this Administration was far more harsh and unforgiving than the circumstances warranted. That was the signal, I think, to employers of this country that if they were to follow suit, they would have the support of this Administration.

THEY HAVE helped set up a more hostile legal climate—as well as a very, very adverse economic climate—by loading the National Labor Relations Board with advocates not just of employer interests, but of the most narrow, retrograde employer interests.

They do not represent just the generality of employers, but that sector of the employer community which is most hostile to trade unions and most reactionary in their desire to achieve a throwback to the days of the Mohawk Valley formula and the bitter conflicts of the past. That board is now an asset to that element of the employer community.

There used to be a sort of tacit understanding, as vacancies on the NLRB were filled by various Administrations, that there were limits beyond which you wouldn't go. The trade union movement, for example, never sought to have placed on that board persons who had been engaged on behalf of trade unions in the active advocacy of their cause.

We would never have dreamed of putting forward, let's say, a full-time staff attorney for one of our unions as a candidate for the NLRB. By and large, although there were shifts in philosophy and point of view, those limits were broadly respected by the other side.

THIS RADICAL Administration has just totally abandoned that understanding. It has set an example that I think does not commend itself to the future of civilized labor-management relations in this country.

They've put forth ideologues—"right-to-work" advocates and anti-labor ideologues—in those positions.

They have put forward people who have been in the employ of corporations, devoting their services to the express purpose of resisting trade union organization and depriving working people of their own choosing, experts in devising ways to skirt the law or even find ways to safely lead an employer beyond the limits of the law in the light of the weakness of the penalties.

That has created a terrible climate for labor relations in this country, one that serves no one's interests except the most narrow and the worst end of the employer community. It will do the country at large considerable damage.

THIS ADMINISTRATION has stripped the Dept. of Labor, systematically shifted its role from being and advocate and defender of the interests of working people—as its enabling statute gives it the duty to be—and it has become an outpost of employers.

That's only a small recital of what we've experienced. And that's at a time when the Administration has faced the prospect of going to the public and seeking re-election.

Without those constraints, I believe, it would be that much worse. In the words of the old phrase, "If they've done these things in the green wood, what would they do in the dry?"

Needy infants, mothers victims of harsh budget

By Press Associates, Inc.

One of President Reagan's favorite responses to charges that his budget cuts have caused a rise in hunger is that he hasn't really cut food programs but merely slowed the rate of increase in spending.

Reagan often cites this slowdown in food program spending as one of his Administration's accomplished goals. But a particular federal program clearly shows how this statement should be a source of shame, not pride, especially during the deep Reagan recession.

The supplemental food program for women, infants and children (WIC) provides food to about 3 million pregnant, postpartum and breast-feeding women and infants and children who are at nutritional risk because of inadequate incomes.

Congress established WIC in 1972 as a preventive program against infant mortality, premature and low birthweight babies, and mental and physical birth defects, such as blindness, deafness and retardation, all of which can be linked to inadequate nutrition among poor pregnant women and infants and children.

Mortality rate

The Massachusetts Dept. of Health found the mortality rate for infants born to mothers in WIC was only one-third of that for non-participants in a study of 8,000 mothers.

The Harvard School of Public Health found each dollar invested in WIC saves three dollars in postnatal health care costs, like intensive care, institutionalization or special education programs for the physically and mentally disabled.

WIC has been one of the food programs least affected by budget cuts—but not because the Reagan Administration hasn't tried. It wanted to cut WIC by 25 percent and fold the program into maternal and child health care block grants to the states.

When Congress rejected this, the Administration sat on surplus WIC funds in some states, rather than allocating them to states in need as prescribed by law.

A court suit brought by the Food Research & Action Center and the Georgia Legal Services program blocked this maneuver as a federal judge ruled that hunger pangs cannot be repressed until the end of a fiscal year.

But now the Administration is trying again. According to an analysis by the Center on Budget & Policy Priorities, Reagan's budget proposal would cut about one million participants from WIC in July, August and September and cut 300,000 to 450,000 persons from its rolls next year.

Actual reductions

These would be actual reductions in WIC funding and participation levels of 3 million persons Congress ordered last autumn.

In fact, the Center notes that Congress warned the Administration last fall that any attempt to spread out the $1.06 billion appropriated for WIC beyond July 10, which Reagan wants to do, "thereby reducing participation, would be in direct violation of the intent" of Congress.

Witnesses appearing at field hearings on hunger held by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said the increase in recession-caused poverty has vastly overtaken WIC's funding levels. Medical experts reported sharp increases in failure-to-thrive cases brought on by poor infant nutrition over the past three years.

Fortunately, it appears the Administration will not get away with thumbing its nose at Congress where WIC is concerned.

Republican Senate leaders are pushing for full funding and Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Calif.) is leading House efforts to hike WIC funding levels.

This strong bipartisan support for WIC speaks for the program's effectiveness and the recession-caused rise in need, even if the President refuses to acknowledge it.

Workers' boycott right buttressed by dismissal of Coors antitrust suit

San Francisco—The right of workers to engage in consumer boycott activities against anti-union employers was reinforced when a federal judge here dismissed an antitrust suit that Adolph Coors Co. filed against two coordinators of the Coors Boycott Committee (CBC).

The $145,000 damage suit stemmed from a boycott committee's successful efforts to get a publicly supported local television station to cancel a "Coors Day" during its annual fund-raising auction May 29-31, 1981.

In its nationwide boycott, CBC has accused Coors of union-busting, requiring its employees to submit to lie detector tests, and other abuses of employees' rights.

In dismissing the suit, U.S. District Court Judge Spencer Williams said the CBC's activities are protected by the labor exemption in both the Clayton Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Act and that the injury for which Coors sought redress is not covered by antitrust laws, namely the Sherman Act.

Coors had offered to "donate" $13,000 to station KQED TV in exchange for what it later claimed as $84,000 worth of "lost promotional and advertising opportunity afforded by the 1981 auction."

Named in the suit were David Sickler, an AFL-CIO field representative and national coordinator of the boycott, and Howard Wallace, coordinator of the Northern California CBC.

The boycott of Coors beer has been in effect since 1977 when a directly affiliated local of the AFL-CIO struck the Coors bottling plant in Golden, Colo., over nonmonetary issues.

Sickler said the lawsuit was "frivolous" from the outset. He charged that it was designed from the beginning to accomplish two goals for Coors: To intimidate community organizations and citizens who were volunteers to make them refrain from supporting the boycott or face being sued; and through the discovery processes of the lawsuit, to find out what ingredients were making this boycott tick, what was making it successful.

Sickler said Judge Williams pointed out in his decision that the boycott effort was not undertaken to drive Coors out of business and would end "if Coors would halt its offensive practices."

Far-fetched theories

The court also held that the CBC "is entitled to immunity from plaintiff's far-fetched theories both because plaintiff's lack of standing to sue under either the damage provision . . . or the injunctive relief provision . . . of the Clayton Act, and because it is squarely within the statutory 'labor group' exemption to the antitrust laws provided by the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia Acts."

Judge Williams rejected Coors's contention that since CBC joined with non-labor groups in the boycott effort, it loses the protection of the statutory labor exemption under antitrust law.

A number of citizens' organizations throughout the country have endorsed the AFL-CIO boycott.

Wallace hailed the decision as a demonstration "that when working people band together they have tremendous might. Corporate bullies don't always win."

He said the decision appears to be making landmark law and reinforcing first amendment rights of both free speech and freedom of association.

Wallace said the boycott is stronger than ever because of support from organizations such as the National Organization for Women, the Latino community and other groups. He reported that since the start of the boycott Coors's share of the California beer market has plunged from 50 percent to 16 percent.

Health care Rx asks cost curb, not benefit cut

"hospital utilization and physician services should be monitored to ensure that only necessary care is provided." Further, wherever possible, testing and surgical procedures should be performed on an outpatient basis. "Unions with programs that mandate second opinion" procedures for surgery have achieved significant savings, the council said.

It noted that workers and unions "are being pressured by employers to accept cutbacks in negotiated health care benefits that would wipe out decades of progress made through collective bargaining."

In the face of health insurance premium increases of 25 to 30 percent a year, the council said, "many employers are putting health care takeaways at the top of their collective bargaining agenda. They seek to 'redesign' health care benefit packages by increasing out-of-pocket payments by workers for essential services or dropping benefits altogether."

The statement emphasized that "patients are not to blame for rising health care costs." It is physicians, not the patients, who decide the course of treatment, the council noted.

It stressed that effective control of health care costs requires reimbursement standards under private as well as public health insurance programs.

"The AFL-CIO remains convinced that the only way to assure all Americans access to quality health care they can afford is through the enactment of a universal comprehensive national health care program," the council said.

"Until that goal is won," it pledged, "we will do all in our power through legislation, collective bargaining and community action to control costs, fight cutbacks in benefits, and improve health services for all Americans."

The bad taste of Coors

Denver—Sales of Coors beer have plummeted under the AFL-CIO's consumer boycott, and now a string of racially derogatory remarks by Coors Chairman William K. Coors has prompted black religious and community leaders to get behind labor's "do not buy" campaign.

Coors was quoted by the Rocky Mountain News as telling a group of minority business owners that "one of the best things (slave traders) did for you is to drag your ancestors over here in chains." He also attributed economic problems in black-governed African countries to a lack of "the intellectual capacity to succeed."

Bishop H. H. Brookins of the 200,000-member Fifth Episcopal District of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said he will urge his people "white and black, brown and yellow" to stop drinking "Mr. Coors's beer . . . to stop his profits and stop his mouth."

Bishop Brookins said he will press for a boycott by the entire 3.5 million-member AME Church nationwide.

Denver City Council members Hiawatha Davis and William Roberts said their black constituents are incensed over Coors's remarks. Davis told the paper he was urging people to vent their anger "at the cash register."

NAACP and Urban League officials in Denver and a number of Colorado legislators called Coors's comments "stupid" and "shocking."

Presidential candidates head for 'Super Tuesday' states

Survivors of New Hampshire's media-drenched Democratic presidential primary scattered across the country, criss-crossing the vote-rich states that will select convention delegates this month.

Walter F. Mondale, still holding a commanding lead in committed delegates, looked to a Mar. 4 caucus in neighboring Maine to rebound from his setback in New Hampshire.

His chief competitor there, Colorado Sen. Gary Hart, will be seeking to build on the momentum of a second-place finish in Iowa that propelled him to an unexpectedly strong first-place showing in New Hampshire.

Of the early candidates, California Sen. Alan Cranston, Sen. Ernest Holling and Reuben Askew, the former Florida governor, formally dropped out of the presidential contest after the New Hampshire results. A further shakedown is possible after "Super Tuesday" on Mar. 13, which will be the first big test of the early primary season in terms of convention delegates.

Mid-March events

Five southern and New England states with 432 delegates will hold primaries on Mar. 13. On the same day, western state caucuses will begin the selection of an additional 170 delegates.

With all its media attention and heavy commitment of organization efforts on behalf of all of the candidates, the Hart victory in New Hampshire was significant in terms of public perception of the strengths and weaknesses of the candidates rather than the actual outcome.

Hart won 10 delegates, to go with the two he earned in the Iowa caucuses and five among the "super delegates" chosen by their Democratic colleagues in the House.

Mondale picked up eight delegates in New Hampshire and will have an estimated 48 delegates from Iowa when the caucus machinery is complete. He is the declared choice of 67 of the congressional super delegates.

The Mar. 13 round of primaries may determine whether Ohio Sen. John Glenn, once considered the only serious rival to Mondale, can move back up. He finished deep in the pack in Iowa and in New Hampshire polled only 12,041 votes to 27,710 for Mondale and 39,062 for Hart. Jesse Jackson and George McGovern each had slightly over 5,000 votes, trailed by Hollings, Cranston and Askew.

Maine shares many of the characteristics of New Hampshire as relatively small population states that normally vote Republican in presidential elections, although the GOP dominance in Maine has slipped since it shared with Vermont the dubious distinction of never having cast its electoral vote for Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mondale handily won a straw vote of Democratic Party activists at a state conference last fall. The Mar. 4 caucuses will elect some 3,300 delegates to a state Democratic convention in May. The state will have 27 delegate votes at the national convention.

On Mar. 6, Vermont's annual Town Meeting Day, voters will be able to take part in a non-binding "beauty contest" to show their presidential preferences. But the state's 17 convention delegates won't be chosen until the entirely separate Apr. 24 caucuses. Both Jackson and Hart have actively campaigned for preference votes but neither Glenn nor McGovern chose to be listed on the ballot.

Delegates at stake

The biggest prizes in the Mar. 13 primaries will be Florida with 143 delegates and Massachusetts with 116. Georgia with 84 delegates, Alabama with 62 and Rhode Island with 27 round out the list. The biggest of the caucus selections will be 70 delegates from Washington and 53 from Oklahoma, 27 from Hawaii and 20 from Nevada. Wyoming, with 15 delegates, will caucus Mar. 10.

A series of Mar. 17 caucuses include a key state for Mondale—Michigan, with 155 delegates.

Beyond the Mondale, Hart and Glenn campaigns, McGovern and Jackson are struggling to maintain political credibility with the voters.

McGovern told reporters that he will pull out if he doesn't do well in Massachusetts—the state that bucked the national trend to support him in the 1972 presidential election.

Jackson is counting on a solid share of the black vote in the southern states to keep him a factor.

Cranston, the first declared candidate for the nomination, bowed out gracefully the morning after the New Hampshire primary. And Hollings and Askew followed suit.

High interest called peril to recovery

High interest rates can choke off the nation's economic recovery while unemployment is still at recession levels, AFL-CIO Economist Henry Schechter warned at House hearings.

Schechter, who is director of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, credited a dip in interest rates in late 1982 with seeding an economic upturn. It made housing and automobiles more affordable, releasing "a layer of pent-up demand."

The durability of the recovery is threatened by a return to tight money and by the continued depressed level of manufacturing employment, he testified.

Schechter told the House Domestic Monetary Policy subcommittee that the most useful action that could be taken to achieve needed economic growth would be to:

- Reduce the federal deficit by holding down defense spending and raising revenues.
- Persuade the Federal Reserve to set money targets designed to lower interest rates.
- Re-establish standby credit controls to provide an alternative monetary tool.

Revenue-raising tax reforms, besides lowering the deficit and the interest burden associated with it, would help fund government programs that can bring down unemployment and meet needs for low-income housing, he suggested.

High interest rates have contributed to America's trade imbalance, Schechter noted, by overvaluing the U.S. dollar in relation to foreign currencies. A 15 percent overvaluation of the dollar means that the price of foreign imports is reduced by that same amount and American goods are that much more costly in other countries.

For young American workers, mortgage interest rates determine the possibility of home ownership, Schechter pointed out. He cited the rise in mortgage interest rates from 9 percent to 13 percent in 1983 as adding $180 to the monthly payments on $60,000, 30-year mortgage.

The nation's brief use of standby credit controls in the spring of 1980 proved its effectiveness as a tool to bring down interest rates, Schechter said. It should be restored as part of the nation's economic arsenal, he urged.

Endorsement earned by record on basic issues

Organized labor's support of Walter F. Mondale's quest for the American presidency flows directly from the former Vice President's support of federal programs and policies benefitting workers and their families.

As the endorsement resolution at the 1983 AFL-CIO convention put it, Mondale "has been an ally of the trade union movement in the struggle to meet the needs of our people for jobs at decent wages, for better public education and medical care, for equal rights and civil rights, and for decent housing in healthy communities."

Mondale has keyed his campaign to the themes of jobs, fairness and the future, and the AFL-CIO has analyzed his record and compared it with that of President Reagan in each area.

First, on the jobs issue and the various elements of economic policy it involves, the federation's analysis points out that the Reagan Administration's actions have only exacerbated the situation.

First of Three Articles

More than 23 million Americans experienced unemployment at some time during 1981, Reagan's first year of office—and more than 26 million in both 1982 and 1983.

Official unemployment reached 9 million by the end of 1981 and more than 12 million by the end of 1982. After a year of improvement, unemployment earlier this year remained at 9 million—far above levels of joblessness in any of the prior seven administrations.

If the number of workers too discouraged to look for work and those forced to work part-time because they cannot find full-time employment were considered, total unemployment would come to more than 16 million.

Because the Reagan Administration has done nothing to deal with the problem, the job shortage persists and threatens the stability of the nation's economic, social and political institutions.

The AFL-CIO has called on America's leaders to launch the nation immediately on a course of a full employment, a strategy endorsed by Mondale. His commitment to the concept of full employment as the key to a healthy economy and a healthy society is reflected in his congressional

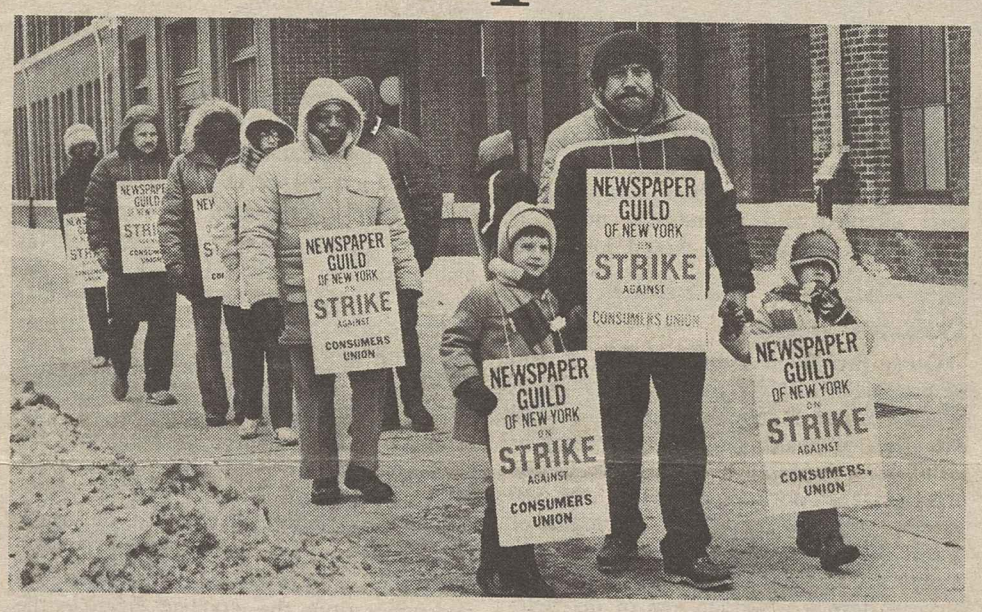
Labor spurs drive for Mondale



Consumers Union tested

Striking employees of Consumers Union of Mount Vernon, N.Y., got some help from the younger set on the picket line. The Newspaper Guild's two-month-old walkout was triggered by management's refusal to negotiate anything but rollbacks. The Guild had been trying to bargain a new agreement for three months before the strike began on Jan. 9. The AFL-CIO endorsed a consumer boycott against CU publications and services at last month's Executive Council meeting.

Fired-up rally touches off new phase in campaign

By David L. Perlman

A fired-up trade union movement reaffirmed labor's strong commitment to Walter F. Mondale's presidential candidacy as his campaign sought to regain momentum.

This was dramatically reflected in Miami, where an overflow rally of active and retired union members responded to Mondale's freshiy sharpened campaign message with repeated ovations and shouts of encouragement.

At the rally, which concluded a seven-state AFL-CIO regional conference, Mondale continued his main focus on the inequities of the Reagan Administration—its tilt to the rich and its lack of fairness.

But he also took some well-aimed jabs at the record and rhetoric of Gary Hart, the Colorado senator who broke away from the pack of presidential candidates to score upset victories in New Hampshire and Maine.

Hart, like Ohio Sen. John Glenn, has sought to portray Mondale as beholden to the "special interest" groups that have endorsed him, including the AFL-CIO.

Mondale hurled back the charge.

Since when has the Democratic Party considered workers, schoolchildren and the elderly as standing apart from the public interest, he demanded to know. It is the "rich and powerful" who have been the beneficiaries of President Reagan's policies and who represent the real special interests, Mondale declared.

The fairness issue is what the presidential campaign is all about, he reminded his Democratic colleagues.

As for Hart's attempt to portray himself as the candidate of "new ideas," Mondale retorted that newness isn't always the test of quality.

"Reaganomics is a new idea and it's as lousy as it can be," he said.

"Medicare is an old idea, but it is right." And Mondale reminded the audience that the health care cost containment bill which Hart voted against in the Senate was both a new idea and a good idea.

The Miami rally was the concluding event of a regional conference that brought together participants from seven southern states for workshops covering a broad range of labor concerns. They were joined by union members and retirees from the Miami area.

Labor's endorsement

At the Miami rally, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland preceded Mondale to the speaker's stand and had some barbs of his own for Democratic presidential candidates who "reacted with spite and malice" to labor's endorsement of Mondale after themselves having "sought and failed to win support."

Kirkland said a united labor movement entered the political process earlier than ever before "because for too long the voice of working people has not been heeded in the political arena."

Administration scored for inaction on sex bias

The Reagan Administration and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission have failed to act against sex-based wage discrimination, the State, County & Municipal Employees charged at House hearings.

Winn Newman, who has represented unions in a generation of precedent-setting sex discrimination cases, testified as special counsel for AFSCME at hearings before a Government Operations subcommittee headed by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.).

Existing law, backed by a relevant Supreme Court ruling, makes clear that pay discrimination based on sex is illegal, Newman testified.

He charged that the present EEOC has sidetracked complaints of sex-based wage disparities pending further studies of the "comparable worth" issue. But in fact, Newman insisted, pay discrimination can be challenged and overcome on the basis of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act without creating new legal concepts on the value of a job.

A 1981 Supreme Court decision—the so-called Gunther case involving the pay claims of a group of matrons at a county jail in Oregon—established that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act gave women workers broader rights to challenge pay inequities than the stricter Equal Pay Act that had already been in effect.

This decision made clear, Newman insisted, that the EEOC can act effectively against sex discrimination without carving out new legal doctrines.

"The ultimate issue in a wage-discrimination case is whether sex or race was a factor in wage setting," he testified, and "a comparison of the duties of different

'New' firm's hiring rule held subterfuge for blacklisting

By James M. Shevis

A divided National Labor Relations Board ruled that a company that purchases an existing plant is free to hire a new workforce, but can't discriminate against union members in its hiring practices.

The long-awaited 2-1 decision backed charges that the Food & Commercial Workers brought against Spencer Foods, Inc. of Spencer, Iowa, after it was taken over as a subsidiary by Land O'Lakes, Inc., in 1979.

The NLRB held that Spencer Foods wrongfully established hiring rules designed to disqualify laid-off workers from future employment "and by applying those criteria in a discriminatory manner in order to eliminate the union as the employees' collective-bargaining representative" violated federal labor law.

The case stems from unfair labor practice charges filed in May 1979 by UFCW Local 152 which had represented the 420 employees of the beef slaughtering and fabrication plant.

The board ordered the company to offer reinstatement and back pay to the UFCW members who would have been hired to jobs at the meat packing plant but for the unlawful discrimination.

The delays in obtaining a decision in the case were the focus of a House subcommittee hearing last November about the NLRB's case backlog. John McGirl, an attorney for Land O'Lakes, a Minne-

Steelworkers Acting President Lynn Williams and Legislative Director Jack Sheehan call for federal remedies at House hearings on plant closings.

Congressional action urged to repair scars of factory shutdowns

Union and community leaders pressed for federal legislation to slow a spreading epidemic of plant closings that have scarred the industrial landscape and the lives of stranded workers.

Steelworkers Acting President Lynn R. Williams told members of the House Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities of the "catastrophic" consequences of the shutdown of a factory that has been a major source of employment to a community:

"Homes and life savings are lost," he testified. "Small businesses are bankrupt. Families are broken. Suicide and disease rates increase and once vibrant communities are ruined. Proud men and women, many of whom are highly skilled industrial workers, are reduced to a permanent underclass of structurally unemployed."

He told Subcommittee Chairman Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.) during the question period that it is "heartbreaking" to visit steel communities that have been affected by shutdowns.

Williams, who testified on behalf of the Industrial Union Dept. as well as the Steelworkers, supported a bill known as the National Employment Priorities Act. It would require a business to provide six months notice of plant closings or permanent layoffs if fewer than 100 workers were affected and a one-year notice if more than 100 workers would lose their jobs.

Transfer rights

Other provisions would require a firm to provide transfer rights to other plants it operates and both severance pay and extension of health benefits to employees terminated. Federal assistance would be provided for worker retraining and job search, with the possibility of loans or grants to help a business continue or to enable a community to continue essential services despite a sudden loss of tax revenue.

The bill cleared another Education & Labor panel, the Labor-Management Relations Subcommittee, last year. But under a multiple referral system, it also will be considered by a House Banking Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization.

Williams said 600 Steelworkers locals, most of them outside the basic steel industry, were dissolved last year because of plant closings.

Nationwide, he testified, "less than 20 percent of plant closings involve actual bankruptcy. About one-third of the plants closed are less than six years old, which means that forces other than financial hardship are at work, including corporate decisions to move production to low-income areas overseas."

Search for alternatives

Enactment of the bill would also encourage a search for ways to avoid a plant closedown, Williams said. He pointed to a provision for public hearings by the Labor Dept. to determine the reasons for the proposed closing and to explore alternatives to a shutdown.

Also testifying for the labor-supported bill were:

- The Rev. Thomas J. Harvey, executive director of the National Conference of Catholic Charities, who spoke from first-hand experience as a long-time pastor in the Pittsburgh area.

From personal experience as well as health studies, Father Harvey cited the impact of stress following unemployment in terms of marital discord, problem drinking, drug use and family abuse. A study showed the suicide rate 30 times higher after plant closings, he testified.

Tax laws have made it advantageous for companies to close down plants that have been able to earn 9 or 10 percent profit, a policy that should be changed, he urged.

- Mayor Angelo R. Martinelli of Yonkers, N.Y., told the panel of the assistance and concessions the city had given to the Otis Elevator Co. to keep its plant from moving. But after a takeover by the United Technologies Corp., he testified, the plant closing was ordered and top UTC officials refused to even discuss alternatives to the shutdown.

"Approximately 70 percent of those who were laid off since 1982 are not yet working again and have used up unemployment benefits," the mayor testified. And most of those who did get jobs are working for lower pay.

Bank deregulation proposals termed threat to consumers

Proposed changes in federal laws that would loosen key banking industry regulations and let bank and savings and loan holding companies get into a wider variety of financial activities will deprive consumers of important protections and aggravate the economy's most serious problems, the AFL-CIO warned in testimony before the Senate Banking Committee.

Henry Schechter, the federation's director of housing and monetary policy, told the committee that two bills now in the Senate each contain provisions that could lead to dangerous concentrations of economic power in the hands of a few large financial institutions.

Among the results, Schechter asserted, will be continued high interest rates, higher inflation, decreased protection of consumers from coercion by lenders, lesser availability of money for the kind of large, long-term loans needed to revitalize American industry and decreased competition in the financial industries.

Tougher penalties

Schechter said that certain specific provisions of the bills—such as language that would stiffen penalties for credit card fraud—would benefit consumers and should be pursued.

But overall, he stressed, the AFL-CIO finds little benefit to the public interest in the bills.

Basically, both bills would eliminate a spectrum of regulations and restrictions now placed on banks, savings and loan associations, financial institution holding companies and related subsidiaries.

The so-called deregulation would let those financial institutions get into real estate, insurance, securities sales and other business ventures that the Federal Reserve Board finds are "closely related to banking or, under a new standard, are of a financial nature." Restrictions on purchases of certain types of banks by financial instition holding companies would also be loosened, permitting them to buy up more banks across state lines.

Need to compete

The banks and thrift institutions say they want the changes in order to compete with other sectors of the economy—such as retail department store chains and securities dealers—who have branched out into other financial enterprises.

Schechter said that the lessons of the depression of the 1930s make it clear that government safeguards over banking activities are essential. He pointed out that recent relaxations of lending restrictions, and the advent of bank holding companies, have let banks get into other financial ventures.

The trend has been accompanied by an increase in risky business deals by the banks, including massive loans to foreign countries, a sharp increase in the number of bank failures, and by skyrocketing interest rates that have had serious consequences for the economy.

If the nation's "financial powerhouses . . . are let loose in the new entrepreneurial pastures," the economy faces significant potential dangers, Schechter asserted.

For example, he said, the big banks and their affiliates will be able to direct their large financial resources into those activities that are now being served by other companies. While some short-term savings might be realized by consumers, the long-term effect will be higher costs as smaller competitors are driven out of business.

Schechter also stressed the AFL-CIO's concern that permitting banks to go into such ventures as selling insurance could increase pressure on consumers to buy from the banks' subsidiaries.

The jobs of union members employed by insurance carriers could be lost as a result of that unfair advantage enjoyed by bank insurance affiliates, Schechter warned.

Murray-Green-Meany Award goes to Rep. Claude Pepper

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.), a staunch supporter of social programs in Congress for 36 years, was chosen by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to receive the 1984 Murray-Green-Meany Award, the labor movement's highest honor for humanitarian service.

The council voted to honor Pepper's lifetime of "outstanding contributions and services to the working men and women of America."

The award, which includes a medallion and a $5,000 grant, will be presented to the congressman at a May 17 dinner held in conjunction with the AFL-CIO's Community Services national conference in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Rep. Claude D. Pepper

Pepper, who is 83, earned wide union backing in his bids for Congress through his consistent support of labor's positions on economic and social issues, and he is known as an outspoken advocate of the needs of the elderly.

Pepper, who was born in Dudleyville, Ala., began practicing law in Florida in 1925, and he was elected to the Florida legislature in 1929.

He was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1936 where he served until 1951. Since 1962, Pepper has represented Florida's 18th Congressional District, which includes Miami.

In Congress, Pepper chairs the House Rules Committee, and the subcommittee on health and long-term care of the House Select Committee on Aging, which he has also chaired. Pepper is also a member of the Democratic Policy and Steering Committee, and he was appointed to the 1982 National Commission on Social Security Reform.

The Murray-Green-Meany Award is presented annually as a memorial to William Green, Philip Murray and George Meany, who led the AFL, the CIO and the merged federation.

Last year's recipient was David Dubinsky, the late president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Council acts on 4 items referred by '83 convention

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its winter meeting here completed action on four of the resolutions referred to it by the 1983 convention.

Approving recommendations of a committee headed by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, the council voted non-concurrence with a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to govern congressional and legislative districting. The council cited rules already in existence as set forth by the Supreme Court.

Non-concurrence also was voted on a resolution calling for the re-establishment of the Hawaii-Pacific area office of the AFL-CIO, with the council stressing that the establishment of area offices is a responsibility of the federation's executive officers.

Two resolutions were referred to the executive officers to watch developments and give further study to the questions raised. One measure urged legislative remedies for the takeover of U.S. banks by foreign interests, and the other called for creation by the AFL-CIO of a computerized reference facility on state labor statutes and other relevant laws.

OSHA chief quitting, says 'job is done'

Thorne G. Auchter, head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for the past three years, will resign as Assistant Secretary of Labor for OSHA effective Mar. 30.

In announcing his resignation, Auchter declared, "I was put here to fix the agency. Frankly, I feel like the job is done."

He is leaving the post to become president of a Topeka, Kan., holding company of developers and construction firms, including B. B. Andersen, a unionized firm, and its non-union counterpart, Anco.

Although no successor has been named, Patrick R. Tyson, a deputy assistant secretary for OSHA, will assume the duties on an acting basis. He previously worked in the Labor Dept.'s Office of the Solicitor.

Stalled actions

Under Auchter's direction, OSHA has either weakened or delayed standards covering cotton dust, grain dust, lead and noise. It refused to issue emergency standards on ethylene oxide, formaldehyde, benzene and ethylene dibromide. It delayed issuance of a temporary standard on asbestos for a year and a half after a risk assessment showed a high level of expected deaths for workers exposed to asbestos.

The AFL-CIO, at congressional hearings and at other forums, has detailed numerous charges against Auchter's spearheading of the Reagan Administration assault on workers' rights and protections. The Executive Council last month scored OSHA for having "systematically eroded worker rights."

Among the first actions taken by Auchter was the banning of worker training materials and the destruction of thousands of booklets and posters alerting workers to the hazards of cotton dust.

The agency proposed a major overhaul, and possible revocation, of its cancer policy, a reduction of more than 90 percent in the number of toxic chemicals covered under the access rule, and elimination of the right of workers to exposure records.

The agency recently proposed a "hazard communication" standard, after killing a Carter Administration proposal for a strong "hazard identification" rule. The new proposal would pre-empt more stringent local and state laws.

Staff reductions

The agency's inspection staff has been reduced by more than 25 percent, its budget cut and dozens of field offices closed.

Under a series of exemption programs, some three-fourths of all manufacturing firms are now exempt from general schedule inspections. The agency has restricted its guidelines for responding to worker complaints and it has loosened its definition for serious job hazards.

Auchter's resignation was seen by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) as an opportunity for the Administration to appoint "someone who would restore OSHA to its traditional role." He charged that "Auchter consistently violated the traditional spirit of OSHA by dragging his feet on efforts to protect workers. . . ." Miller is chairman of the House Labor Subcommittee on Labor Standards.

At Miami rally, Walter Mondale responds to a standing ovation . . .

. . . and some of the active and retired union members who came to hear him.

Labor steps up Mondale support, sparks new phase of campaign

Both Hart and Glenn have been helped by labor's endorsement in their Senate campaigns, Kirkland noted. Yet now, he said, "they suggest that Fritz Mondale's sympathy for working people and their organizations is a liability and a handicap, not an asset."

The Democratic Party has been most successful "when it was seen by working people as their natural home," he said, and "least successful when it was perceived as the instrument of narrow and elite fashions."

As for the "sensible center" thrust of Glenn's campaign, Kirkland suggested that the so-called center "is like that thin white line running down the middle of the highway. It may be very useful as a point of reference, but not many people think it very sensible to drive there."

Union members are prepared "to work our guts out and our hearts out" for a Mondale victory, President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees said at the rally.

On the dais to show their support of Mondale's candidacy were Miami area Democratic congressmen — Claude D. Pepper, chairman of the House Rules Committee and champion of the nation's elderly; House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Dante B. Fascell, and Lawrence J. Smith, who is serving his first term.

Florida, with 143 convention votes, is the largest single prize in the Mar. 13 "Super Tuesday" round of primaries and caucuses. Other primary states that day are Massachusetts, Georgia, Alabama and Rhode Island, while caucus selections will be made in Washington, Oklahoma, Hawaii and Nevada.

The following week will see a dozen other primaries and caucuses. The list includes Michigan, with 155 delegates, the first major industrial state to begin the delegate selection process. Its first-stage caucuses will be held Mar. 17.

Illinois and Minnesota

Close on its heels will be the Mar. 20 primary in Illinois, which has 194 convention votes, and a caucus the same day in Mondale's home state of Minnesota, with 86 delegates.

On Apr. 3, most of New York's 285 delegates will be chosen in a primary. Pennsylvania, with 195 delegates, will hold its primary a week later.

The concentration of media attention on the traditionally Republican New England states that have early primaries propelled Hart into front-runner status even though he trails substantially in the relatively small count of committed delegates. Besides his impressive upset victories in New Hampshire and Maine, Hart easily won Vermont's non-binding preference poll held in conjunction with the state's Town Meeting Day. But that win had been discounted in advance since only Hart and Jesse Jackson had campaigned actively in the state.

The New England victories, nevertheless, gave the Hart campaign a strong momentum. It brought in money to continue a strong television campaign and attracted an influx of youthful volunteers, reminiscent of the college brigades that Hart used effectively to propel George McGovern to an unexpected victory for the 1972 Democratic presidential nomination.

Ironically, McGovern has been concentrating on running against Hart in Massachusetts—the state he picked as a test of whether to remain in the presidential race after the Mar. 13 primaries. McGovern told Massachusetts voters that his former campaign manager is "not as liberal as Mondale on domestic issues" and "more cautious about getting out in front on controversial positions."

Glenn, long considered the chief rival to Mondale, slipped to a poor third after the early primaries and is looking to the southern tier of states to rehabilitate his candidacy.

Also looking South is Jackson, who was at least temporarily cut off from federal matching funds by falling below 10 percent of the vote in two successive primaries. Jackson has been campaigning among southern blacks as a civil rights figure and is looking for his first elected delegates in the Mar. 13 primaries.

Hart's surge did not help him with the congressional "superdelegates" who had expressed a conference for one of the three candidates who have dropped out of the primary contest — California Sen. Alan Cranston, South Carolina Sen. Ernest Hollings, and former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew.

Congressional Quarterly magazine recontacted the 15 House-elected convention delegates who had been on record for one of the drop-out candidates. Eight said they were uncommitted and the other seven said they now support Mondale.

Glass union wins pay for bias victims

Reserve, La.—A plastics company with an anti-labor reputation and 35 of its employees learned that unions really mean it when they say they will fight for the rights of all workers regardless of whether they are union members.

As a result of a suit filed by the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers, 35 former employees of Sewell Plastics Co. will share a $167,500 court-approved settlement stemming from charges that the company discriminated against them because they are black.

Although GPPAW does not have a contract at the plant, the union's president, James E. Hatfield, said GPPAW "fought for them because they were right and needed representation."

The workers and the union filed the suit in the U.S. District Court for Eastern Louisiana, charging that Sewell practiced race discrimination in its segregated hiring, promotion and transfer policies, as well as in job and shift assignments, discipline policies and other terms and conditions on the job. Although the employees had been fired by Sewell, they did not seek reinstatement.

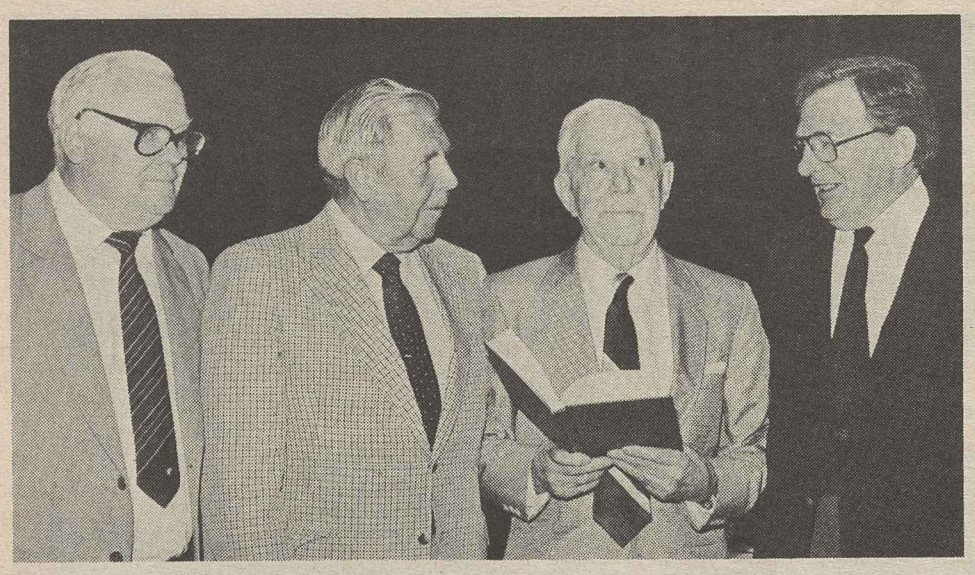
The Sewell facility is one of about 20 owned by the company, mostly in southern states and GPPAW has one contract at the firm's Charlotte, N.C. plant. The union said Sewell has a long history of bitter resistance to organization, including such practices as firing workers for union activity, questionable tactics in elections, and attempting to provoke decertification at the Charlotte plant.

Kenin named to post with Mondale campaign

The Mondale for President campaign has named Frances Kenin to handle liaison with labor. Kenin goes to the Mondale campaign from a similar position at the Democratic National Committee, a post she has filled since early 1982.

The DNC post will now be filled by Mary Goddard Zon, the long-time research director of COPE who retired in 1977. In addition, Marlene Neve, who had been legislative and political director of the Alaska AFL-CIO, will serve as the labor liaison representative with the House and Senate Democratic campaign committees.

Affiliated unions needing to reach the Mondale labor desk can do so by calling Kenin at 202/625-1670.



Salute to Keenan

Life and times of Joseph D. Keenan, secretary-emeritus of the Electrical Workers and a former AFL-CIO vice president, are chronicled in a newly published biography released at a luncheon during the Executive Council meeting. Written by Francis X. Gannon, the book offers insights into labor's role in mobilizing the nation's defenses and in transforming post-war America. Keenan served as vice chairman of the War Production Board during World War II. With Keenan, second from right, are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents J. C. Turner and Charles Pillard, and President Lane Kirkland.

Ban on export of Alaskan oil upheld in Senate vote, 70-20

The Senate squelched by a decisive 70-20 vote a labor-opposed attempt to allow the export of 200,000 barrels of Alaskan oil a day to Japan.

A ban on the export of crude oil from Alaska's North Slope has been in effect since Congress authorized construction of the Alaskan pipeline, with exceptions allowed only through a presidential finding that it would be in the national interest, result in lower costs to refiners and assure that savings are passed on to consumers.

The AFL-CIO has strongly opposed any relaxation of these standards as detrimental to the goal of U.S. energy self-sufficiency and destructive to jobs.

Alaska's two senators sponsored the 200,000 barrel-a-day exemption as an amendment to the Export Administration Act. But it was killed by a tabling motion after Sens. John Heinz (R-Pa.), Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) and other foes warned that it would work against America's interests and increase reliance on the volatile Middle East as a source of oil.

In other congressional developments:

- The bill introduced by House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) to nullify the Supreme Court's interpretation that a company can abrogate its union contract if it files for bankruptcy picked up 54 cosponsors, and the AFL-CIO urged other House members to sign on.

Legislative Director Ray Denison also urged House members to press for inclusion of legislation along the lines of the Rodino bill as part of any bankruptcy measure brought to the floor.

- House and Senate committees continued working on legislative proposals to make a significant down payment on debt reduction, but there was no movement on the formal bipartisan congressional-White House talks that have sputtered on and off.

- The Senate devoted the week to debate on differing versions of a proposed constitutional amendment to allow "voluntary prayer" in public schools. A two-thirds majority of both the House and Senate is needed to initiate a constitutional change.

- Before taking up the constitutional amendment issue, the Senate dropped from its calendar—at least temporarily—a trade reciprocity bill supported by the Reagan Administration but opposed by unions as a threat to jobs. Meanwhile, at House hearings, the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions stressed that barriers other nations have imposed to U.S. goods can be challenged under authority the President already has under existing law—without a tradeoff of new concessions in the U.S. market.

The proposed legislation "will serve the foreign interests of U.S. multinationals and will have a negative impact on domestic employment and industry," AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan testified.

Service Employees prevail

EPA agrees to issue asbestos cleanup plan

By Arlee C. Green

The Environmental Protection Agency agreed to act under prodding from the Service Employees to develop regulations to abate asbestos contamination in public schools and other buildings.

EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus said that "EPA is in full agreement with the goals of the (SEIU) petition and intends to insure that human health is protected to the fullest extent possible where asbestos is concerned."

SEIU President John J. Sweeney termed the action "the most significant development to date in our campaign to rid our schools of this killer." He noted that "the rules we are asking for were mandated by Congress long ago." SEIU launched a national campaign last June to force removal of asbestos from schools and released a study showing over 10 percent of the nation's schools could contain asbestos materials which are not being removed or cleaned up.

Since that time, Sweeney noted, the EPA and the Dept. of Education have released information indicating that the problem may be much worse.

"We hope the EPA action will help us in lobbying Congress to provide federal funding for the removal of asbestos and to fully implement the Asbestos School Hazard Detection Act of 1980," he said.

The SEIU concern over the deaths of several members due to asbestosis and related lung diseases prompted its national campaign and petition to get the EPA to begin its rulemaking procedure.

The SEIU petition, filed in November under the Toxic Substances Control Act, pressed the agency to:

- Set standards for determining when flaking asbestos-containing materials in schools and public buildings are hazardous.

- Establish requirements for corrective action when these materials are determined to be hazardous.

- Develop inspection and abatement regulations for buildings containing flaking asbestos.

- Set performance standards for abatement activities, including protections for persons performing the abatement work.

Current EPA regulations only require that schools be inspected for flaking asbestos and report those inspection results to school workers and parents.

Hearings to be set

The EPA published a notice in the Federal Register on Mar. 7 granting the union petition. The agency will have to hold public hearings within 60 days of that notice.

In a statement, EPA said additional workplace regulation under the Toxic Substance Control Act "is not necessary to protect health or the environment against unreasonable risk," citing current regulations under the Clean Air Act and the Occupational Safety & Health Administration as being sufficient to protect workers doing asbestos removal and abatement.

OSHA is currently being pressed for stricter asbestos regulations, especially for workers on construction jobs.

Stricter rule sought to curb rubber industry cancer risk

The AFL-CIO and several of its affiliates petitioned the Labor Dept. for an emergency standard limiting worker exposure to butadiene, a toxic substance used in the production of synthetic rubber.

The federation joined the Industrial Union Dept., Chemical Workers, Rubber Workers, and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers in urging that the worker exposure limit for the substance be reduced to one part per million parts of air—down from the current standard of 1,000 ppm.

In a telegram to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan, the AFL-CIO said an emergency standard is needed "to protect employees from the significant carcinogenic and reproductive risks caused by current levels of exposure to butadiene which exist in the workplace." It pointed out that two recent animal studies have proven the substance to be a carcinogen.

Some 70,000 rubber and chemical workers are potentially exposed to the substance which is used as a chemical intermediate in the development of synthetic rubber compounds used in the manufacture of tires, tubes, plastics and many other consumer products.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration joined with the Environmental Protection Agency in early January in seeking public comments as part of their initiation of a review of the substance.

Rubber Workers President Milan Stone, in a letter to OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter, warned that if OSHA denies the joint petition, such an action "could dilute the credibility and responsibility of OSHA."

In a separate letter to EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus, Stone questioned the Administration's motives when it held a meeting last month on butadiene to which it invited representatives of OSHA and the chemical and rubber industries but not "the real representatives of your constituency—workers and organized labor—whose members are faced with the additional cancer risk of exposure." He insisted that labor's input must be considered in any future meetings.

Jobs drive pressed for handicapped

Houston—A coalition-building conference here brought together labor, business and vocational rehabilitation representatives to explore ways of improving job opportunities for handicapped and disabled workers.

The session was cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Human Relations Development Institute and the Labor Subcommittee of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

The Houston pilot program's success will lead to similar sessions in other parts of the country, HRDI Director Mike Arnold said. HRDI operates a handicapped placement office in Houston and Arnold said the cooperation received from other elements of the community made it the logical choice for the first conference.

In Houston and other cities where the HRDI program operates, cooperative efforts have led to the placement of nearly 2,700 handicapped persons in jobs, he said.

Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall said the Houston meeting was an example of what needs to go on all over the country if more handicapped and disabled workers are to find work. He warned, however, that opportunities for the handicapped will not open up unless steps are taken to find jobs for all Americans.

"We need to create jobs—good jobs—and until we do we will have trouble putting the handicapped to work," he stressed.

Gains for employers

Marshall said the nation could save about $10 billion a year by taking people who would otherwise be dependent on society and putting them to useful work. At the same time, employers stand to gain by getting workers who tend to be highly motivated on the job and perform well.

Chairman Harold Russell of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped told the conference he was encouraged by increased cooperation among the three groups. Russell has headed the committee since 1964.

Vice President Joyce Miller of the Clothing & Textile Workers, who chairs the labor subcommittee, noted that labor—long a pacesetter in social change—can be a leader in jobs for the handicapped.

Union shop stewards can play effective roles in building acceptance of handicapped workers at the workplace, she observed. In a broader setting, labor is at the forefront of efforts to promote public support of handicapped workers' rights and putting together coalitions with employers on behalf of these workers, Miller said.

President Harry Hubbard of the Texas AFL-CIO, which was closely involved in planning the conference, also addressed the delegates.

At a workshop, a local union president, a manager of a company employment center, and rehabilitation professionals explored cooperative efforts to increase placement and improve the quality of training of the handicapped.

HRDI's handicapped placement office plans to build on the ideas developed at the conference to extend its services in the Houston area, Arnold said.

HRDI also will provide information and guidance on techniques for helping workers who become disabled on or off the job.

McDougall named head of job safety institute

Vernon McDougall has been named executive director of the Workers' Institute for Safety & Health. He succeeds Joe Velasquez, who resigned.

McDougall has directed the technical assistance and labor education activities of the institute since 1980. Earlier, he was safety and health director for the Paperworkers.

The Workers' Institute is a non-profit organization set up by labor to provide research, education and technical assistance to unions.

Mondale's record stands out on key jobs issues

voting record going back as far as 1965.

Mondale has consistently voted for emergency job programs and public service jobs for the unemployed. He was an original sponsor of legislation to protect workers from sudden plant closings and unannounced layoffs.

Full employment is the cornerstone of Mondale's policies for achieving the twin goals of economic progress and social justice.

In line with the 1978 Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act, Mondale has long proclaimed the goal of a job for every American who wants or needs one.

To head the nation toward the full employment goal, the AFL-CIO has called for a program to restore the industrial base of the American economy.

Unlike the United States, other countries have aggressive industrial and trade policies. They provide low-cost credit, protection from imports, and government assistance in the development of technology.

Because of this disparity between the United States and its trading partners, the U.S. balance of merchandise trade has remained in deficit every year but one since 1971. The deficit soared to about $70 billion in 1983, and is likely to top $80 billion in 1984.

The Reagan Administration is generally opposed to government activity in this sphere. Its drastic tax reductions for the wealthy and for industry were supposed to make money available for business investment and stimulate industrial expansion. That poor substitute for an industrial policy failed.

Mondale, on the other hand, recognizes the importance of industrial policy and agrees with organized labor on the need for targeted policies to assist industries vital to national economic growth.

"I am a profound believer in our free enterprise system," Mondale told the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. legislative conference last May, "but I also believe that government must work in partnership with the market." Mondale says that his Administration will allocate $20 billion to support industrial policy programs.

Unfair tax tilt

Reagan's huge tax cuts tilted toward corporations and the rich, along with glaring tax loopholes, have resulted in a federal tax structure that is unfair and rigged against working people. It also threatens to abort the present fragile economic recovery, since tax receipts will not grow enough to shrink the huge deficits that loom.

Mondale has stated that he "disagrees completely" with the Reagan argument that the way to spur economic growth is to transfer wealth from low- and middle-income earners to the richest Americans. He recognizes the dangers of the growing deficit and the reality that $200-billion shortfalls cannot be closed simply by cutting spending.

He has pointed out that as many as 90,000 profitable corporations now pay no taxes at all, and has declared his intention to end such abuses and reverse current tax incentives that encourage plants to close and move. His position is consistent with labor's repeated call for restoration of the principle of taxation based on ability to pay and for equitable measures to raise substantial amounts of revenue, such as deferring or repealing indexation and putting a cap on the third year of the Reagan tax cut for the very wealthy.

The massive federal deficits—the result of Reagan's unfair tax cuts, deep recession, and accelerated military spending—pose a severe threat to the economy, but the President has chosen to "stonewall" efforts to reduce them. Instead, he masquerades behind proposals for a Balanced Budget Amendment to the Constitution and for Presidential "line-item" veto power, both of which are economically dangerous and politically unrealistic.

Mondale believes the mounting deficits have pushed up interest rates and distorted the value of the dollar, thus making sustained economic growth impossible. He advocates "scaling the defense budget to reality," pursuing a program of health care cost containment rather than further cuts in Medicare and Medicaid as Reagan proposes, and restoring revenues equitably.

On the issue of interest rates, which have been at historically high levels during the Reagan Administration, the contrast between the Reagan and Mondale positions is clear. Reagan continues to ignore interest rates, though private and government economists alike see their rise as harmful. Mondale warns that high interest rates are sowing the seeds of the next recession.

Reagan and Mondale also are poles apart on two other major issues—inflation and international trade and investment.

While recent drops in the rate of inflation have been impressive, they have been attained at a terrible price. Reagan's tight money and high interest rate policies put the nation through its worst recession in 40 years.

Average weekly earnings of workers, after adjustment for inflation, are down by 3.5 percent from December 1979 to December 1983.

Effective policies

Mondale is committed to policies that will hold down inflation without putting the country through the wringer of recession. He proposes policies to achieve steadily shrinking budget deficits and lower real interest rates, a better energy policy and a better agriculture policy.

On international trade and investment, which have had an increasingly adverse impact on U.S. industry and workers, the Reagan Administration hews to the unrealistic doctrine of "free trade" rather than defending U.S. interests and promoting "fair trade." Foreign imports have ravaged the American economy, putting hundreds of thousands of workers out of jobs.

Mondale believes the federal government should play an active and positive role in defending and promoting U.S. industry and its workers. He believes action must be taken on the dollar and to match foreign trade barriers and subsidies so that meaningful negotiations can take place. He would encourage U.S. companies to keep their plants and technology here rather than investing around the globe.

Two-tier pension plan proposed for federal new-hires

Union witnesses urged the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee to shape a supplemental retirement system for new federal employees that provides clearly defined benefits, coupled with a cost-of-living adjustment that would be based on the social security system's COLA protection.

Kenneth T. Blaylock, testifying both as president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and of the Government Employees, noted that the unions had opposed bringing new workers under social security while old workers retained the fuller coverage of the Civil Service Retirement System.

The test of a supplemental retirement system for new workers, in addition to social security, should be total benefits comparable to those available under the existing civil service plan for the same rate of contributions, he urged.

A similar position was taken by the State, County & Municipal Employees in testimony by AFSCME Legislative Director William B. Welsh, and by representatives of several unaffiliated government employee unions.

Postal unions had testified at earlier hearings.

Blaylock suggested a multi-tier retirement plan. In addition to social security and a supplemental retirement plan, he proffered, an optional "thrift plan" should be available for employees who choose to pay additional amounts to increase their retirement income.

Prelude to bargaining

At the opening of the Auto Workers special convention in Detroit called to shape 1984 contract goals, UAW President Owen Bieber served notice on management that workers will be seeking strengthened job security as well as wage and benefit gains. He branded management "irresponsible" for scheduling heavy overtime while large numbers of jobless workers are still awaiting recall; 2,500 delegates took part in the three-day meeting.

Blacklisting of union workers barred apolis food cooperative that acquired Spencer Foods, testified at the time that it could be liable for more than $20 million in back pay.

Spencer closed its facility in October 1977 on the expiration of the union's contract. Land O'Lakes reopened it in February 1979, operating the plant under a new board of directors. Although Spencer's president remained in charge of day-to-day operations, the plant manager and most of the supervisors were new employees.

The union contended that the new management was a successor to the old, and that Spencer engaged in a discriminatory mass refusal to hire its members with its new hiring criteria. In its ruling, the NLRB found that the Land O'Lakes subsidiary is a new and independent enterprise, and not a successor.

The panel therefore dismissed the union's refusal-to-bargain charges. Members Patricia Dennis and Robert Hunter were in agreement on this point. But Hunter joined with Member Don Zimmerman in concluding that the new management applied its hiring criteria to screen out union supporters.

When Land O'Lakes reopened the Spencer facility, it hired only about 23 of the 250 former workers who applied. The NLRB ruled that the company unfairly imposed an anti-nepotism rule, barring the employment of more than one member of the immediate family. About one-half of the workforce before the plant closed were related to one another, the decision pointed out, but the rule was not uniformly applied at the company's other operations.

"We find that the (employer) was aware that all of Spencer's employees were union members and that it designed and implemented its hiring criteria, especially the anti-nepotism rule, in a discriminatory manner so as to disqualify most of those former employees," Hunt wrote in his opinion.

The board also adopted the conclusion of an NLRB administrative law judge's 1981 decision in the case that the new management was unlawfully motivated by the knowledge that the entire Spencer workforce had belonged to the union.

In a separate statement, Zimmerman wrote he would adopt the administrative law judge's conclusion that management violated Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act by withdrawing recognition from the union, by refusing to bargain over the recall of the laid-off employees, by unilaterally changing wages and benefits, and by unilaterally establishing criteria for recall.

Zimmerman suggested that the bargaining relationship survived under traditional successorship principles.

Plan signed to reduce lead exposure

The steelworkers signed agreements with the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and Asarco, Inc., aimed at reducing worker exposure to lead in Asarco's three smelters and one refinery.

Asarco employs 2,150 workers at El Paso, Tex., East Helena, Mont., and Glover, Mo., and its refinery in Omaha, Neb.

The agreements allow Asarco extra time to comply with the requirements of the federal lead exposure standard. However, the company is also required to institute technical controls and work practices to reduce lead exposure.

USWA industrial hygienist Michael Wright said the union strongly backed the agreements on the premise that "we get better control a whole lot faster than when have to fight it out" with the companies. He noted that employers often seek OSHA variances that give workers little protection until problems are resolved.

The dates for compliance with the lead standard were extended by two and a half to four and a half years, depending on the plant, and the agreements can be modified, by approval of all parties.

High-level lead exposure can seriously damage the circulatory, digestive, reproductive and nervous systems.

White House hit for stalling on sex bias jobs with the same employer is, of course, relevant evidence of discrimination."

Under the Civil Rights Act, he said, "it really doesn't matter what a job is 'worth' or what an employer chooses to pay. What does matter is that an employer may not discriminate against its female employees who perform work of equal skill, effort and responsibility by paying them less than it chooses to pay the occupants of traditional male jobs."

The Supreme Court's ruling paved the way for the more specific victory for AFSCME in the landmark State of Washington case that brought a judgment of back pay and future pay raises for some 15,000 state employees. Since then, Newman noted, there have been other court decisions consistent with the Washington precedent.

He suggested that the subcommittee give EEOC a deadline to report on the action it is taking to enforce the ban on sex bias. EEOC should be pressed to stop using policy studies of the comparable worth issue as "an excuse for inaction," he said, urging that it put its effort into investigating and litigating sex-based wage discrimination complaints on the basis of existing law.

In the appeal of the State of Washington case, Newman said, the EEOC and the Justice Dept. have a clear obligation to file a brief supporting the position of the women workers who suffered pay discrimination.

The Willmar 43

Willmar, Minn.—Employees of the First American Bank & Trust Co. here ratified their first union contract Feb. 27, after having organized last fall as members of Auto Workers Local 2008 in the town that is best known for the struggles of the women known as the Willmar Eight who organized their own union at another local bank.

The two-year contract was approved by a 41-2 vote and became effective on Mar. 1. It provides semi-annual pay increases of $350 each for the four-step pay scale which ranges from $8,700 to $15,000. The union also set up a vacation and break schedule.

The Willmar Eight struck Citizens National Bank in 1977 and gained fame for their heroic stance, yet failed to win a contract. Their story was made into a documentary film and a made-for-television movie aired earlier this year.

The First American contract covers secretaries, tellers, bookkeepers and some workers in the accounting department.

AFSCME easily preserves Illinois white-collar unit

Chicago — Professional and technical employees of the state of Illinois — who were stripped of their bargaining rights by an administrative decision — overwhelmingly reaffirmed their choice of the State, County & Municipal Employees as their union.

In a statewide mail ballot election conducted by the Illinois Office of Collective Bargaining, 5,292 workers voted for representation by AFSCME. The unaffiliated Teamsters, also on the ballot, got 865 votes, and 1,076 voted for no representation.

Ironically, AFSCME Council 31 already had been representing some 9,000 of the same professional and technical workers polled since 1975. The new election became necessary after the state's part-time collective bargaining board reacted to a 1983 challenge to whether a combined unit of both "professional" and "technical" employees was appropriate by yanking AFSCME's certification for the entire unit. No decertification vote was ever taken, AFSCME said.

Council 31, armed with new authorization cards, immediately petitioned for a new election, and at the same time asked Illinois to enlarge the unit to include an additional 3,500 workers in various state offices and institutions.

Although the state agreed to hold the election, administrative delays by the three-member collective bargaining board delayed the vote for nearly a year, the union charged.

AFSCME asserted that the delays enabled the Teamsters to mount an organizing campaign and petition to be included on the ballot, but AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said the IBT's poor showing amounts to a rebuff to its attempts to organize public workers.

The 12,500 employees who were eligible to vote in the election included social workers, psychologists, physicians, therapists, engineers, accountants, claims examiners, lawyers, educators, hearing and speech specialists and other professional and technical employees, AFSCME said.

The union will represent the workers as two units, divided into "professional" or "technical" classifications, depending on job descriptions. In the election, the collective bargaining board mailed ballots separately to workers in each of the classifications, and both units voted for AFSCME by similar 70 percent margins.

Job tax credit for employers called useless

The Targeted Jobs Tax Credit Program hasn't worked and shouldn't be renewed, the AFL-CIO testified at Senate hearings.

Since 1978, employers have been able to pocket a generous tax credit by hiring workers from "targeted" groups designated by Congress.

The list, which has been expanded several times, now includes persons receiving public assistance, handicapped persons, Vietnam veterans, ex-offenders, and for summer jobs, teenagers from poor families.

There is no evidence of any increase in employment from the program, AFL-CIO economist Arnold Cantor told a Senate Finance subcommittee. The evidence does show that "employers received windfall tax benefits for doing what they would have done anyway."

An employer who hires a person from one of the targeted groups gets a tax credit or rebate worth $3,000 per employee in the first year of employment and $1,500 in the second year. The summer job credit is limited to 85 percent of up to $3,000 in wages.

Cantor, who is assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research, said the program has been marked by "considerable abuse." Although it was tightened up in recent years, employers had been able to get tax credits for persons already on the payrolls, pocketing the windfall.

Hiring bias

When the program does provide an incentive for an employer to hire a "targeted" job-seeker, the result might be unfair denial of a job to an unsubsidized worker, Cantor noted.

He cited the case of an auto parts plant in Michigan that had laid off most of its workers. By the time it began recalling workers, only those with high seniority still had a contractual right to their former jobs. The lesser-seniority workers "were almost all replaced with individuals who carried tax credits," Cantor noted.

Whether for year-round work or for summer jobs, Cantor testified, "we have seen no evidence that employers expand their payrolls to accommodate additional workers from targeted groups. Rather, staffing levels are kept consistent with the basic requirements of the business."

The existing tax credit law expires at the end of 1984. Legislation to continue it an additional five years should be rejected, Cantor urged.

Panel formed on health cost control

Scarsdale, N.Y.—The Work in America Institute has begun a new study to explore ways of holding down health care coverage costs while at the same time improving the quality of care employees receive.

The study, to be completed by late 1985, is funded by grants from the Auto Workers, General Motors Corp., the General Electric Foundation, the Metropolitan Life Foundation, and the Pfizer Foundation.

An advisory committee including representatives of labor, management and the health care industry will help the institute develop its recommendations.

The study will look at how increasing union involvement can help employers curb health costs, and it will explore unified strategies for handling health insurance and other health-related programs.

Also to be studied are incentives for all participants in the health care system to hold down costs—including doctors, hospitals, employers, and patients—and the availability of alternative choices in health care delivery systems such as health maintenance or preferred provider organizations.

Labor members of the advisory panel include: Vice President Donald Ephlin of the UAW; John C. Carroll, executive vice president of the Communications Workers; Theodore Bernstein, director of the benefit funds department, Ladies' Garment Workers; Stanley Hill, associate director, District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees; Thomas Duzak, director of pensions, insurance and employee benefits for the Steelworkers; Karen Ignagni, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security; Irving Bluestone, professor of labor studies at Wayne State University, Detroit; Jerry Shea, Service Employees health care coordinator; and Teachers Vice President Candice Owley.

Survey links health problems to video terminals

By Susan Dunlop

With serious safety questions about video display terminals still unsettled, the responsibility for protecting the health of office workers can't be left to employers alone, the Service Employees testified at House hearings.

Jackie Ruff, executive director of SEIU District 925, told a House health and safety subcommittee that the burgeoning use of video display terminals (VDTs) in offices parallels a "truly frightening" increase in health problems among users, including substantial problems related to pregnancy.

Ruff charged that employers and manufacturers of VDTs "are far from willing" to take the action necessary to protect workers and that they have ignored or tried to discredit evidence linking VDTs to health risks.

Unions such as District 925—SEIU's office workers' unit—can use bargaining to win protections and improved working conditions, Ruff said. But she emphasized that because a relatively small percentage of the private and public sector clerical workforce is organized, "office workers lacking union representation cannot use collective bargaining as a means to improve working conditions and challenge unfair management practices."

For these workers, Ruff said, the importance of the role of government regulations is crucial.

Ruff told the subcommittee that studies by the SEIU and the National Association of Working Women found that the health problems most frequently reported by VDT operators include eyestrain, muscle pain, exhaustion and physical symptoms related to stress.

But the "most troublesome" statistic, Ruff said, is mounting evidence of serious pregnancy-related difficulties among VDT operators. These problems include miscarriages, stillbirths, premature delivery, birth defects and other abnormalities.

Pregnancy concerns

Ruff reported that a survey conducted by the association, also known as "9-to-5," found that workers who reported becoming pregnant since working with VDTs could claim only a 31.6 percent rate of normal, full-term delivery.

The survey was conducted over a six-month period using more than 6,000 responses to a telephone VDT "hotline" where workers could report experiences. Callers were sent a more detailed job and health history survey to fill out, and 873 responses were returned.

Ruff pointed out that because of the "self-selected" nature of the survey, the results cannot be directly applied to all VDT operators, but she told the committee that the "scope and number of pregnancy-related complaints is shocking enough to demand immediate attention."

Also testifying was Rebecca Alford, a member of SEIU's unit at the Equitable Life Assurance Society's claims processing offices in Syracuse, N.Y.

Although clerical workers at the office voted for representation by SEIU two years ago, the company has refused to bargain a contract. SEIU's boycott of the huge insurance carrier has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO.

Alford said the health and working conditions of the employees—who use VDTs continuously throughout the work day—is a major issue in the dispute with the company.

"Collective bargaining is the most effective answer for VDT users," Alford said, but she pointed out that in the U.S. "few VDT operators enjoy the benefits of a union contract, including us at Equitable." She told the committee she had given birth to a child with birth defects following a pregnancy begun after VDTs were introduced in her office.

Alford urged Congress to pass "strong legislation" to provide basic protections to all VDT users.

In her testimony, Ruff said SEIU is already backing legislation on VDT safety in Massachusetts, Illinois, New York, Oregon, Connecticut and Rhode Island.

Safety standards SEIU is supporting in those measures include giving workers the right to transfer away from VDT work to other jobs in a company during their pregnancy without a loss of pay, benefits or seniority.

Equipment needs

VDT equipment should be manufactured or refitted with protective metal shields to eliminate radiation emissions, and all VDTs should have adjustable screens and keyboards with glare reduction devices to be set-up in environments designed for the comfort and safety of the operator, SEIU said.

Other protections should include mandatory, periodic testing of equipment for safety, scheduled rest breaks for operators, and elimination of machine-pacing or computer-monitoring of workers' performance and output.

Ruff said SEIU has called on the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health to "thoroughly investigate" the evidence of pregnancy problems among VDT users and to study patterns of all VDT-related health complaints.

Getting Involved

FOR TOO LONG, the voice of working people has not been heeded in the political arena. Our most basic concerns have either been smeared as special interests or patronized in election campaigns, only to be ignored after Inauguration Day.

The lesson from that experience is clear. It is not enough to go to the polls on Election Day to choose among candidates who have been chosen by others. We must take part in every phase of the political process from beginning to end. Our duty as trade unionists and as citizens demands it.

Not everybody is happy to see us involved. Some, having eagerly sought our support and having themselves supped at our table in the past, are now trying to smear and to deprecate the value of that support. They suggest that Fritz Mondale's sympathy for working people and their organizations is a liability and a handicap, not an asset.

I am perhaps too simple to understand the wisdom or the integrity of their arguments.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY has always been most successful at winning and at governing when it was seen by working people as their natural home, as a vehicle for their enduring aspirations and concerns.

It has been least successful when it was perceived as the instrument of narrow and elite fashions and fancies.

At this moment, all across America, many thousands of trade union volunteers are hard at work to see to it that when this Democratic Party opens its convention in San Francisco in July, there will be more working people present as voting delegates than ever before.

Our enemies are split between those who claim that we are toothless, irrelevant and safe to scorn and to defame, and those who claim that we are too powerful and ought to be broken.

We shall demonstrate that we are what we ought to be—a vital element of American society dedicated to human rights, human freedom and human progress.

We believe that tomorrow can be better, but we know that we must work as never before to bring that new day.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, at Mar. 3 regional conference rally, Miami.

Fixing OHSA

THORNE AUCHTER, who is resigning as head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration at the end of this month, says with some pride that he has completed the job for which he was hired—"to fix the agency."

There's a homespun maxim that advises, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it," and the fact is that OSHA didn't need fixing. It could have used a fine tuning, perhaps, but that was not the type of fixing that Mr. Auchter and those who hired him really had in mind.

Under Eula Bingham, his predecessor, OSHA was finally starting to function as Congress had intended. With increasing professionalism, it was setting and enforcing realistic standards of safety and health in the workplace.

ALMOST FROM THE moment he took office, early in the Reagan Administration, Mr. Auchter began the process of retreat from the goals of the law.

Occupational health standards were weakened or delayed. As the last AFL-CIO convention concluded in a resolution, "Worker protection has taken a back seat to protecting the interests of the business community."

Perhaps it is too much to hope that the next OSHA administrator will again make the health and safety of workers the agency's first priority. But it would be mighty welcome.

Unfair Reagan schemes trap millions in poverty

By Press Associates, Inc.

During the 1980s, a cruel combination of recession, social program cuts and inflation pushed millions of American families into poverty.

Between 1979 and 1982, some 8.3 million people slipped below the government's official poverty line and the number of poor grew from 26.1 million to 34.4 million, the U.S. Census Bureau reported last summer.

These cold statistics showing rising poverty in the world's richest nation are both a national disgrace and a challenge to political leadership.

To the Reagan Administration, however, the poverty figures have been regarded only as an embarrassment and a political danger.

To soft-pedal the Census Bureau statistics, Budget Director David Stockman and other Administration officials argued the figures exaggerate the problem because they don't include "in-kind" benefits in calculating family income.

In-kind benefits received by many low-income families include food stamps, subsidized school lunches, Medicaid, Medicare, and subsidized housing. Including these benefits as income reduces the poverty statistics, they maintained.

Ironically, these are the same benefits that President Reagan and his conservative coalition in Congress slashed in 1981 and 1982.

New figures

The conservatives now have their new statistics. The Census Bureau for the first time issued a report which includes non-cash benefits as income. As anyone might expect, doing so reduces appreciably the number of people in the poverty category. However, the new report gives Reagan and the conservatives little to rejoice about.

If the full market value of non-cash benefits is counted as income, the number of poor people increased from 15.1 million in 1979 to 22.9 million in 1982, the Census Bureau reported.

The percentage increase of poverty between 1979 and 1982 actually is far greater when the in-kind benefits are included. The four-year percentage increase is over 47 percent using the non-cash benefits, contrasted with over 28 percent using the official poverty figures.

What caused this big percentage jump in the poverty level?

In 1982, the Reagan budget cuts hit with full force. Next to the Reagan recession, these cuts are widely believed to be responsible for increasing poverty. The University of Wisconsin's Institute for Research on Poverty reported 3 million of the 8 million added to the poverty rolls from 1979 to 1982 were put there by the budget cuts.

Statistical proof

Despite Administration claims that its cuts only slowed, not reduced, the rate of social spending, the new Census Bureau report says differently. It shows that the average market value of non-cash benefits received by poor families declined by 10.4 percent, adjusted for inflation, from 1979 to 1982—from $3,715 to $3,330.

The "war on poverty" of the 1960s and 1970s has been in retreat under Ronald Reagan. This fact wasn't lost on a group of House Democrats, who timed their introduction of anti-poverty legislation with the report's release.

Sponsored by Reps. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), Harold E. Ford (Tenn.), Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Edward R. Roybal (Calif.), the bill would reverse some Reagan cuts.

It would set minimum federal levels for Aid to Families with Dependent Children and Medicaid, and make many of the unemployed eligible again for benefits. It would provide 90 days of health benefits for jobless workers, and job training and counseling for welfare beneficiaries.

This legislation would be a step toward reversing the unfairness of the social damage caused by past Reagan budgets.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Supreme Court Says Employers Can Break Union Contracts Without Proving Bankruptcy; Congressional Action Needed To Restore Security

The U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in the case of NLRB vs. Bildisco could spell disaster for collective bargaining in American workplaces. Under this ruling:

- A company can unilaterally break its union contracts immediately upon filing for Chapter 11 reorganization under the 1978 bankruptcy law. It can slash wages and eliminate all benefits.
- Under Chapter 11 reorganization, the company is allowed to remain in business with current management retaining control. So nothing changes at the top; only the employees suffer.

The 1978 Bankruptcy Reform Act was designed to encourage companies to reorganize and stay in business (Chapter 11) instead of liquidating assets and going under (Chapter 7). But the 1978 amendments were not intended to undermine the 1935 National Labor Relations Act by allowing companies to unilaterally tear up labor contracts.

We must now get Congress to overrule the Supreme Court and declare that bankruptcy laws cannot be used to destroy collective bargaining agreements.

The Bildisco Case: Here's What the Supreme Court Decided

In 1980 Bildisco & Bildisco, a New Jersey building supply company, began to withhold health and pension benefits and wage increases negotiated with its employees, who were members of the Teamsters Union. Later, the company filed for Chapter 11 reorganization and rejected the entire labor contract.

The National Labor Relations Board found Bildisco guilty of unfair labor practices for breaking its contract. But the Third Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals overturned the NLRB and upheld the company's action. (Earlier, the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, in a different case, had developed the rule that labor contracts can be rejected only if it is obvious that the company cannot survive in any other way.)

The Supreme Court sided with the Third Circuit--and management: A company no longer needs to prove that breaking its union contracts is a last resort; in fact all the company needs to show is that paying union wages and benefits is a "burden." (When is any business expense not a burden?)

Furthermore, the Supreme Court said that an employer need not wait for completion of bankruptcy proceedings but can break its contract as soon as it files under Chapter 11.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter Rodino (D-NJ) has introduced H.R. 4908, which would prevent employers from using bankruptcy law to escape their labor agreements. Urge your Representative to cosponsor H.R. 4908.

In order to ensure quick action, the AFL-CIO also is urging the House leadership to include legislation along the lines of H.R. 4908 as part of any bankruptcy bill that is brought before the House. This is important, because legislation to reform the bankruptcy court system is likely to reach a vote by March 31.

Write to your Representative now, using the sample below as a guide. There is very little time; don't delay.

SAMPLE MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative _____:

As a registered voter from _____(city)_____ and a member of _____(union name and local #)_____, I urge you, as a matter of the utmost importance, to clarify the corporate bankruptcy law and effectively overrule the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision.

Please cosponsor H.R. 4908. This bill, sponsored by Judiciary Committee Chairman Rodino, would prevent misuse of bankruptcy law to escape collective bargaining agreements.

And please urge the House leadership to include legislation along the lines of H.R. 4908 in any bankruptcy bill brought before the House.

My job, my wages, my health care protection and pension, my future could be threatened by the Bildisco decision. Whatever else Congress does before adjourning this year, it must restore the safety of union contracts.

Sincerely,

Continental, Wilson Foods Workers See Their Hard-Won Contracts Voided; It Could Happen to You

Continental Airlines employees thought their collective bargaining contracts guaranteed them the wages and working conditions they had bargained for. But that was before the company filed for Chapter 11 reorganization, put two-thirds of its workers on the unemployment line, cut wages and benefits in half for the remaining employees, terminated pension plans, seniority rules and work rules--and then re-opened for business with bargain-basement fares.

Wilson Foods employees are in the same boat. After the company filed for Chapter 11 and unilaterally cut wages 40-50 percent, employees were forced to renegotiate their contracts and take severe pay cuts.

The Bildisco decision means there will be more of these stories. We must get Congress to restore the safety and stability of union contracts.

Going Bankrupt—Is It Just a Way To Get Out of Labor Contracts?

Increasingly, bankrupt firms are asking the courts to abrogate their labor contracts. Organized labor is pressing for legislation to prevent such actions.

MANAGEMENT BY BANKRUPTCY

BANKRUPTCY CHIC AT THE BAR

■ Bankruptcy work, long snubbed by the law's best and brightest, is suddenly a hot specialty. Big-name law firms like Davis Polk & Wardwell in New York are building up their bankruptcy practices. Others are buying out specialty firms—for instance, Chicago's Sidley & Austin recently took over Shutan & Trost.

One reason for bankruptcy chic: recession and some 1978 reforms of the bankruptcy code (see text) have sent huge corporations rushing in where once only losers and small fry dared to tread. Another reason: the 1978 reforms made bankruptcy work more lucrative. Previously, most fees were set under the so-called economy principle, which held that bankrupt companies shouldn't have to pay as much for legal work as solvent companies. Now, bonuses and premiums on top of hourly fees are not uncommon—and a lawyer can get paid every four months. Fees are hitting record highs. AM Interna-

Continental Air Lines Inc. filed for bankruptcy apparently for the sole reason of rejecting its labor contract. Three days after filing, the airline was back in business, operating 22 per cent of its pre-filing flights, with a huge drop in staff and wages.

Continental Air Official Saw Chapter 11 As 'Stick' Against Unions, Hearing Told

By Bryan Burrough
Staff Reporter of The Wall Street Journal

HOUSTON—Three months before Continental Airlines' bankruptcy-law filing, a top company official identified Chapter 11 as a "big stick" to gain concessions from its unions.

The executive, Richard Adams, senior vice president, flight operations, expressed the view in handwritten notes produced as evidence in a hearing here on Continental's Chapter 11 bankruptcy-law proceedings. During eight days of testimony, three striking Continental unions have argued that the carrrier's Sept. 24 Chapter 11 filing was intended primarily as a device to break its union contracts and lower its labor costs.

Although Chapter 11 is intended to give financially troubled companies a chance to restructure their debts, several concerns recently have abrogated their labor contracts by using Chapter 11.

Mr. Adams's handwritten notes suggest he considered some unusual measures to exact concessions. "I don't believe we can get these concessions on a voluntary persuasive basis," said the notes, written last June. "We must get awfully big stick . . . most effective stick may be Chapter 11." Under Chapter 11, a company's legal contracts, including its collective-bargaining agreements, may be revoked.

Hart's record falls short on key issues

Senate votes belie slogan of 'new ideas'

By David L. Perlman

If Gary Hart has a "new idea" to bring America to full employment, it's been the best-kept secret of a media-drenched campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination.

But Hart has made clear by his Senate votes as well as campaign oratory some of the things he's against.

They include measures that the trade union movement, Walter Mondale and most Democrats in Congress support in order to shore up the nation's industrial base and stem the hemorrhage of U.S. jobs.

Hart has also broken with the Democratic mainstream as well as the labor movement over unemployment benefits and the minimum wage, job safety and housing, hospital costs, education aid and budget priorities.

One of the ingredients of the highway repair bill Congress passed at the height of the recession to provide jobs was a "Buy American" requirement for steel, concrete and other construction materials purchased with federal funds.

New idea

Last fall, Hart was one of the few Senate Democrats who voted for an amendment to weaken the provision.

He has attacked Mondale's support of an automobile domestic content requirement—a measure that would mean new jobs for workers in steel, glass, plastics, textile and parts manufacturing as well as on auto assembly lines.

Other countries have such laws but Hart says this would be "surrender" to "protectionism" and to "special interests."

As Mondale has noted, Hart hasn't been quite such a free-trader when it comes to the oil industry. He voted against taxing the windfall profits of the oil industry and has advocated an import tax on foreign oil.

Congress pressed to close bankruptcy law loophole

At Chicago's O'Hare Airport, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joins pickets protesting unfair use of bankruptcy code loopholes to bust unions.

Legislation sought to bar union-busting

America's unions have mounted a campaign for legislation to stop employers from twisting federal bankruptcy proceedings into a device for tearing up union contracts.

That's what Continental Airlines and Wilson Foods Corp. did last year, in each case unilaterally slashing wages and benefits for more than 6,000 workers.

It's what other companies have threatened to do in order to force unions to reopen contracts and agree to givebacks.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said congressional action is needed because last month's Supreme Court decision left no other recourse. The Supreme Court said a company didn't have to go before a bankruptcy judge to get permission to abrogate its union contract. All it had to do was file papers seeking Chapter 11 reorganization under the federal bankruptcy law.

Later, the only justification needed would be a showing that in terms of profitability it would be "burdensome" for a company to comply with its union agreement.

Kirkland and presidents of a number of affiliated unions have asked union members in selected congressional districts to write and send postcards in support of labor's twin objectives:

- Cosponsorship of H.R. 4908, a bill by House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) that would offset the Supreme Court's bankruptcy ruling.
- Support for an amendment similar to the Rodino bill on pending legislation

Wide support for Mondale

Endorsement a 'bottom-up' choice

The AFL-CIO convention's endorsement of Walter Mondale's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination was a "bottom-up" decision, based on one of the largest political preference surveys ever conducted.

Once the AFL-CIO decided to break with tradition and endose a presidential candidate before the party primaries, the question became "which one?"

For the answer, AFL-CIO unions went straight to their ranks and surveyed, straw-polled and mail-balloted local union members to determine their views.

A number of unions sent preference questionnaires to all members through their union publications. Many conducted straw polls among local union delegates at national and regional conventions and local meetings, and others distributed secret preference ballots in workplaces. Several unions used independent opinion research firms to scientifically poll members on their preferences and to tabulate results.

The message was strong and clear—union members overwhelmingly supported the candidacy of Walter Mondale.

Back in the pack

Running a distant second was Ohio Sen. John Glenn in what was at the time a field of seven seeking the Democratic Party nomination. There was scant support for any of the other candidates.

When union representatives — armed with the preference data from their members—cast their ballots on the endorsement question at the Oct. 1, 1983, AFL-CIO General Board meeting, 91 percent of the vote went for Mondale. Glenn received 3.3 percent of the total, but no other candidate was named. Of those voting, 3.7 percent voted for "no endorsement," and 2.7 percent abstained.

Tabulation of votes was based on each union's membership, and unions were permitted to split their total membership vote between candidates if they chose to do so.

Of the total number of votes cast by unions for one of the candidates, Mondale received 12,957,738 votes to Glenn's 470,367.

AFL-CIO state and local central labor bodies and constitutional departments, each accorded one vote at the General Board meeting, had also tested union members' preferences in their regions. Based on what they found, they voted overwhelmingly for Mondale.

A New York Times/CBS News nationwide poll taken at the time also found clear majority support for Mondale among members of AFL-CIO unions in particular and Democrats in general.

Of the union members the Times questioned, 23 percent said they had been contacted directly by their unions to solicit their opinion on an endorsement. That percentage represents a huge sample when compared with the samplings of professional pollsters.

All of the seven announced Democratic candidates—Jesse Jackson did not declare until November—had accepted invitations to present their views to an AFL-CIO national convention or at meetings of the federation's Eecutive Council. All seven said they wanted the AFL-CIO's endorsement.

The depth of the soundings conducted by the unions and the clear choice expressed by their members refute the charges of some candidates who actively sought the AFL-CIO endorsement but now argue that the decision was made by the leadership rather than the membership.

Medicare panel criticized on call for eligibility cut

Key members of Congress echoed labor's sharp dissent from the recommendations of a federal advisory panel for dealing with the financial problems of Medicare by raising the age of eligibility, imposing new taxes on workers and compelling America's elderly to pay more for hospital care.

The Advisory Council on Social Security formally submitted its report, but even the Administration couldn't get up much enthusiasm for it. Health & Human Services Sec. Margaret M. Heckler said its recommendations "should be added to the many proposals already under discussion and those yet to be advanced by other interested groups."

The council's two labor members, President Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union and Sec.-Treas. Stan Arnold of the Michigan Build-

Delegates to Auto Workers collective bargaining convention march out of Detroit's Cobo Hall in solidarity.

Job security tops contract goals as UAW gears up for bargaining

Detroit — The Auto Workers, gearing up for negotiations with General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., put job security at the top of the union's bargaining goals.

A 67-page resolution adopted by the UAW's special collective bargaining convention emphasized that "employment security is our highest priority" in talks with the two automakers to replace contracts that expire in September.

The 2,500 delegates, citing record profits of $6.2 billion posted in 1983 by GM, Ford and Chrysler Corp., listed wage improvements as their second highest agenda item.

UAW President Owen Bieber pointed out that workers made significant concessions in 1982 to help employers weather hard times and now, "given the profits of the auto companies, we think workers can be accommodated without any price increases."

Key protections

The delegates also targeted protection of cost-of-living clauses, health coverage, pension and retirement options as economic goals.

The bargaining resolution said the union will seek strong job protections because "workers should not have to worry that their jobs will disappear because of automation or other new technologies, international competition, or due to their employer's decision to outsource work or close a facility."

Excessive overtime was condemned as a job-killing practice and a potential wedge between employed and unemployed members. According to UAW estimates, the heavy overtime in the auto industry—evident in six day weeks and ten-hour days at many plants—kept as many as 95,000 unemployed workers on the streets in the fall of 1983.

Acknowledging that some employed members wish to "cash in" on the overtime bonanza, UAW officers and convention delegates alike called for spreading the available work and discouraging excessive overtime through higher premiums, compensatory time off, or straight-out limitations.

The main thrust of the convention's program for improved job security was embodied in a half-dozen key goals:

- Shorter worktime with no reduction in pay to be achieved by more vacation and holiday time. Progress toward a four-day workweek has been interrupted by the recession, several speakers pointed out, but as employers recover sales and profits, the union expects to pick up where it left off.
- Negotiated restrictions on outsourcing and sub-contracting of work to non-union employers. Delegates were especially angered by GM's plan, outlined in internal company documents recently obtained by the union, to cut 80,000 workers from its payroll by 1986.
- Local content legislation, passed by the U.S. House of Representatives but stalled in the Republican-controlled Senate. Delegates agreed the measure would curtail the flood of imported automobiles and force GM and Ford in particular to shelve plans to import parts and finished cars from Japan and Mexico.
- Improved pension benefits that encourage more early retirements.
- Lifetime guaranteed employment as the ultimate goal, with a "safe seniority date" as an interim measure to insure jobs, transfer rights, and/or income guarantees to protect workers.
- New technology protections to share the benefits of improved productivity with affected workers. Workforce reductions by attrition, advance notice of innovations, and special job training that would keep new technology within the bargaining unit were among the recommended bargaining approaches.

Wages were second only to job security in the priorities debated by the convention. Having made significant concessions in 1982 to help employers weather hard times, the delegates were in no mood to continue sacrificing when GM, Ford, and Chrysler's 1983 profits totaled a record of $6.2 billion.

Company proposals to expand profit sharing (established in the 1982 negotiations) in lieu of wages were rejected by the convention.

"Profit sharing and similar programs have a place in our goals," the final bargaining resolution declared, "but we did not trade our wage formula for profit sharing."

Bieber reminded the delegates that some of labor's adversaries have already declared war. "The assault is being led by the Reagan Administration," he said, "and fought on the front lines by greedy and opportunistic employers."

He cited the gutting of job safety rules, the rightward shift of the National Labor Relations Board, the use of bankruptcy laws to break unions, and the government's deliberate policy of high unemployment as salient features of this anti-union offensive. Delegates from UAW locals at General Dynamics and McDonnell Douglas also testified to the anti-union bias of the Pentagon, which backed both employers in policies that provoked long and — in the case of General Dynamics' Electric Boat Division — continuing strikes to protect past gains.

"The fact is," Bieber concluded, "that we will see more Greyhounds, and more Continental Airlines, and more McDonnell Douglas', and more General Dynamics until we get Ronald Reagan out of the White House and elect a President who will promote policies that provide for all the people of this nation."

Action sought on bankruptcy law reforms

to create additional bankruptcy judges.

The bankruptcy court system must be restructured by the end of March to comply with another Supreme Court decision, and there is intense jockeying for the right to offer amendments to the bill when it reaches the House floor later this month.

Rodino's bill, which had 114 cosponsors as of Mar. 15, would continue union contracts in effect after bankruptcy papers were filed. A contract would be voided only if a bankruptcy court found that such a drastic action was necessary to preserve jobs and make possible the financial reorganization of a failing company.

"This legislation will make clear that the Bankruptcy Code cannot be used to escape requirements of labor contracts bargained in good faith," Rodino said. It "was never meant to provide immunity from labor law," he told the House.

Kirkland's letter warned union members that the Supreme Court decision left employers who file for bankruptcy reorganization "free to dictate the terms of your employment — your wages, your health insurance, your seniority, your pension plan, your job."

Unless Congress acts, he warned, "more employers will follow the lead of Continental Airlines and Wilson Foods."

An AFL-CIO pamphlet sent along with the letter made the point also that "for the many companies that have been waiting for just such an opportunity, the Supreme Court decision is an engraved invitation for union-busting."

Humphrey Donahue gets regional director's post

Humphrey Donahue has been named the AFL-CIO regional director for New York, New Jersey and Puerto Rico.

Donahue, 55, has served as the assistant director of the New York-based Region VII for the past year. He had been an AFL-CIO field representative since 1969.

In other appointments, three field representatives were named assistant directors of their respective regions: Paul Sanchez to Donahue's former position in Region VII; Green P. Lewis in Region V, which comprises seven southeastern states, and Kevin Kistler in Region III, which covers seven mid-Atlantic states and the District of Columbia.

Medicare panel challenged on proposals for cutbacks

ing Trades Council, had already expressed their vigorous disagreement.

If it's necessary to keep the program from going broke, they said, the government should turn to general revenue contributions instead of drastic benefit cuts or curtailment of eligibility.

The advisory panel majority proposed to raise the age for Medicare coverage from 65 to 67. In addition to making the elderly pay more, they advocated taxing workers on employer-paid insurance benefits and increasing federal taxes on alcohol and tobacco. In practice, Heaps and Arnold noted, such selective taxation would fall heaviest on lower-income persons in contrast to the ability-to-pay principle of general revenue financing.

They also rejected the idea of automatically increasing the Medicare Part B deductible at a rate corresponding to the annual increase in the government's consumer price index. And they opposed levying a surcharge of $41 a year on beneficiaries to help finance the deficit in the Part A trust fund.

Economic estimates used by the panel anticipate that Medicare outlays will exceed income before the end of the 1980s.

The panel's recommendations were sharply criticized by advocates for the elderly.

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) said he was "shocked" at the council's recommendations and "absolutely opposed to any increase in the burden of health-care costs to be borne by the elderly."

"We can devise . . . proposals that will make Medicare solvent and sound, reduce costs to the government and provide medical services to the elderly," he said. "I hope no one will be converted by this unwise commission."

Rep. Edward Roybal (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Aging Committee, said that raising the eligibility age to 67 and increasing premiums paid by beneficiaries are not an acceptable solution to Medicare financing problems.

"We need a plan that controls health costs, not one that cuts medical coverage," he said. "Let's look to those who can afford to cut medical charges before we cut off medical coverage or dig deeper into the pockets of the elderly."

The council was established in 1982 under a law requiring review of social security finances every four years. The current panel was instructed to take a look at Medicare, which is part of the social security system.

Copper strikers keep health benefits

Tucson, Ariz.—A federal judge ruled that Phelps Dodge Corp., cannot cut off medical benefits from its 2,300 striking copper workers.

The company had planned to end all benefits at midnight on Mar. 12. Under its contracts with 13 striking unions, the company was required to pay 100 percent of medical benefits.

Michael Keenan, an attorney for the union coalition, said that U.S. District Court Judge Alfredo C. Marquez adopted the union argument that the strikers had vested rights under the contract.

Phelps Dodge notified the workers in January that it would terminate the benefits in 60 days. The unions then filed suit to block the action.

Phelps Dodge has continued to operate its copper facilities with strikebreakers since last July when the unions struck over wages and benefits. The company refused to go along with an industry pattern set last summer, and insisted on a wage freeze and takeaways.

The last contract negotiating session was held Jan. 23, and no new talks are scheduled.

'Where's the Beef?'

Hart's record found wanting on key issues

With the help of government-loan guarantees voted by Congress, the Chrysler Corp. was saved from bankruptcy, several hundred thousand jobs were saved, and the government even made a profit.

But Hart didn't think it was a good idea. He voted against it.

By contrast, the Johns-Manville Co. found a friend in Hart when it was hit by a wave of suits from victims of asbesos-caused cancer and asbestosis. The suits were based on evidence that the company knew of the deadly hazards—and deliberately withheld the information.

In 1980 and 1981, Hart introduced bills that would have had the effect of shifting libility from the asbestos industry to the government. It just happened that executives of Colorado-based Johns-Manville were instrumental in the Business for Hart Committee in the 1980 election.

Lukewarm support

In a recent newspaper interview, Hart said he supports an "industrial policy" that would seek cooperation of government, labor and business to modernize ailing industries—a major AFL-CIO goal.

But the article by political reporter Peter A. Brown for the Scripps-Howard News Service noted also that Hart "does not support pending legislation backed by Democratic liberals that would create a $5 billion federal bank to make loans for those purposes." Hart says that might be "institutionalizing intervention."

Hart has also proposed financing job training by worker payroll deductions. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland described that Hart proposal as a "retraining plan that takes the cost out of what's left of your pay check before you get fired."

Another of Hart's "new ideas," it turns out, is one that fast-food chains and their Republican allies have had for a long time—a subminimum youth wage. The last time it came to a vote in the Senate, it was beaten 49-44. But no thanks to Hart. He voted for it.

Old idea

Kirkland had this comment on Hart's "new ideas" at the federation's regional conference in Chicago:

"Hell, we can get ideas like that from Ronald Reagan any day in the week. If that is the wave of the future, we are indeed in trouble."

The trade union movement, Kirkland said, prefers to stand with Mondale, "who has put his political life on the line as a friend of labor and as a strong champion of all who earn their bread by the things they make and the hard work they do."

Hart's political strength has been an apparent ability to appear all things to all people—well, nearly all people.

Just two years after the McGovern campaign, Hart won election to the Senate from Colorado by defeating a conservative Republican incumbent, Peter Dominick.

Startlingly, in that campaign Hart accused Dominick of being "one of the big spenders in the U.S. Senate." In that campaign also, the Denver Post noted, Hart called for "the end of the New Deal" and attacked the philosophy of "throwing money at problems."

Mondale's consistency

It's these inconsistencies that have intrigued political observers. By contrast, Walter Mondale holds few surprises. His votes and speeches reflect mainstream liberal Democratic values.

Mondale has repeatedly advocated a tax reform program that includes a ceiling on the reckless tax cuts made under the Reagan Administration and a suspension of indexing.

A recent New York Daily News profile noted that "on tax reform, Hart is on everybody's side." It says Hart supports a "flat-rate" tax that would eliminate most deductions and substantially drop the maximum tax. And it adds that "he also likes the idea of taxing consumption rather than savings, a Republican idea."

A "consumption tax" is another term for a national sales tax or a so-called value-added tax that ends up being paid by the consumer.

Hart did vote in accord with labor's position more often than not. And he was endorsed by the AFL-CIO for re-election to the Senate because he was clearly preferable to his Republican opponent. But Hart's "wrong" votes include some of the trade union movement's top priorities—especially enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Repeatedly, he voted to exempt smaller establishments from inspection. And he supported a labor-opposed attempt to exempt hazardous sand, gravel and other surface mining operations from safety training requirements.

He has voted to reduce social security disability insurance benefits, opposed the synthetic fuel development program and supported reductions in funds for public housing and low-income rent subsidies.

In 1980, the Senate had slashed $16 billion in funding for education, health, transportation, jobs and energy development to meet a balanced-budget target. Labor supported an amendment to take $2 billion from the defense side to restore some funds for anti-recession programs. Hart voted against it.

No import relief

During the Reagan Administration, he voted against keeping trade adjustment assistance for workers whose jobs have been wiped out by imports and opposed a mortgage interest subsidy bill that would have spurred homebuilding.

Hart and Mondale served together in the Senate only in the 1975-76 Congress, but their differences began with one of the first votes Hart cast as a senator.

Mondale was leading a fight to change the Senate filibuster rules to make it harder for a minority of senators to block a vote. The issue was especially important to the civil rights coalition, which has had to battle filibusters repeatedly.

On a key procedural vote, the Senate supported Mondale by a 51-42 majority. But Hart was one of those who voted against the rules reform.

Later in that Congress, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy led an effort to increase funding for elementary and secondary education assistance to disadvantaged children.

Mondale supported Kennedy's amendment. Hart voted against it.

Another "old" idea.

AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown at the International Labor Organization session in Geneva with A. M. Issifu of the Ghana Trade Union Congress.

ILO warned against harming its rights monitoring system

Geneva—AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown warned the International Labor Organization against undercutting proven machinery for monitoring how member states keep their commitments.

Newly instituted studies undertaken by the ILO staff on the trade union situation in European countries could erode the established procedures for defending the right of workers to form unions free of government control, Brown told the ILO's Governing Body of worker, employer and government delegates from 56 countries.

The U.S. worker delegate stressed that the ILO should concentrate on strengthening its established machinery for holding governments accountable for their actions and to advance the right to freedom of association.

Direct contact

This machinery, he noted, brought governments before ILO-appointed independent experts and committees of the Governing Body and the annual ILO conference for cross-examination.

"We attach great importance to these direct contacts," and to the give-and-take this procedure has made possible, Brown stressed.

Citing a study on Hungary, Brown noted that the Hungarian authorities themselves described the country's trade unions as "autonomous" but not "independent" from the ruling Communist Party.

The notion that autonomy could be substituted for independence "cannot go unchallenged," Brown said. Colonial peoples never mistook the "autonomy" offered them by the ruling power for the independence for which they continued to fight, he pointed out.

The Soviet bloc's dislike of the ILO watchdog role over the application of its labor standards surfaced again with reference to a convention the United Nations is drafting on the protection of migrant workers and their families.

Soviets protest

Soviet and East German delegates accused the ILO of attempting to "impose" its monitoring procedures on the UN for assuring compliance with the projected convention.

They made the charge because the Governing Body, strongly supported by the worker members, indicated it would respond favorably to an invitation to name experts to help supervise the working of the convention as proposed in the UN.

The Soviet bloc, its delegates said, does not consider that the ILO's way of monitoring government actions is an "example to follow."

In another development, the Soviet and Arab opposition to Israel was rebuffed as the Governing Body accepted Israel's request to be made a full member of the ILO's Asian regional conferences. The vote carried 32 to 16, with eight delegates either abstaining or absent.

Jobless rate still high despite gain

The drop in the nation's unemployment rate in February to 7.8 percent from eight percent in January, is "a welcome comeback" from the deep Reagan recession, but the level of joblessness is still too high by historical standards, the AFL-CIO said.

"The rate still has a long way to go to reach the 5.8-percent unemployment levels of five years ago," Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"Federal leadership and programs are needed to assure job opportunities for the 8.8 million workers still officially unemployed, and to attack the 16.2-percent unemployment rate among black Americans."

Oswald noted that the upturn in the economy has brought many new jobs in the service sector but, despite some relief, the manufacturing and mining sectors are still down by one million jobs.

Highs and lows

When President Reagan took office, the nation's unemployment rate was 7.5 percent and hit a low of 7.2 percent in July 1981 before climbing steadily to a recession high of 10.6 percent in November 1982. Unemployment in 1979 had averaged 5.8 percent.

While the Bureau of Labor Statistics report for February pointed to steady improvement in the jobs picture, it did not take into consideration the number of Americans too discouraged by the job market to look for work or those working part time because they cannot find full-time employment.

If the so-called "discouraged" workers and one-half those working part time for "economic reasons" were included in BLS's calculations, the February jobless rate would have been 11.6 percent, with 13.3-million people unemployed, Oswald said.

The February report on employment and joblessness showed civilian employment, at 103.9 million, increased by 700,000 over the month. The civilian labor force rose by 480,000 last month, to 112.7 million. There were 8,801,000 unemployed, down from 9,026,000 in January. All the figures, like the jobless rate itself, are adjusted for seasonal variations.

By categories, the unemployment rate fell last month for adult men by three-tenths of 1 percent to 7 percent; for adult women by two-tenths to 6.9 percent; for teenagers by one-tenth to 19.3 percent; for whites by two-tenths to 6.7 percent; for blacks by five-tenths to 16.2 percent, and for Hispanic workers by one point to 10.2 percent. Unemployment among black teenagers eased to 43.5 percent, from 47.9 percent.

The jobs gains last month were widespread, BLS said. Manufacturing employment climbed 110,000, mainly in durable goods, while construction added 40,000 and the service-producing sector of the economy added 240,000.

Steel hurting

Not all manufacturing industries have bounced back from the long recession, however. BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that the lumber, furniture, electrical equipment, and automobile industries have made strong gains but that machinery, fabricated metals, and primary metals have shown little rebound. In steel, she said, there has been no employment recovery.

The BLS also reported that workers without jobs for more than six months declined in February to 1.8 million from 2 million in January, and the average factory workweek rose to 41 hours, the highest since 1967.

A separate Labor Dept. report on annual average unemployment, showed the jobless rate for the nation as a whole was about unchanged from 1982 to 1983, at 9.4 percent, even though unemployment at the end of 1983 was significantly lower than in December 1982.

The Coalition of Labor Union Women throughout its 10-year history has given strong support to unions fighting unfair employers. CLUW President Joyce Miller demonstrates the group's backing of the Coors beer boycott at a Los Angeles rally with AFL-CIO Field Rep. David Sickler.

Safety agency hit for denial of emergency curb on EDB

The AFL-CIO branded the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's refusal to grant an emergency standard on cancer-causing ethylene dibromide (EDB) "irresponsible and unresponsive."

The federation, along with the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. and the Grain Millers, petitioned OSHA last month to issue an emergency standard further limiting worker exposure to EDB and for an emergency work practice standard on methyl bromide, a highly toxic pesticide being substituted for EDB.

OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter, whose resignation will be effective Mar. 31, notified the federation in a two-paragraph letter that the job safety agency "will not be able to make a decision on your request until the hearing record has been examined. In addition, OSHA has not yet been able to examine any existing data with respect to methyl bromide."

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said the agency's response pertained to the hearing record involving the regular rulemaking process and did not address the current need for an emergency standard that had been requested by labor.

EDB was banned by the Environmental Protection Agency last fall for use as a soil fumigant and on Feb. 3, it was banned as a fumigant for use on stored grain and on grain milling machinery. Guidelines were set limiting residues of EDB in food products, except citrus.

The agency has since restricted the use of EDB on citrus, phasing out its use by Sept. 1 on domestic and imported fruit. The pesticide's use will be permitted after that date on exported fruit, primarily to the Japanese market, provided "U.S. workers treating the fruit are adequately protected," the EPA said.

The EDB level on domestic fruit until Sept. 1 will be 250 parts per billion (250 ppb) for the entire fruit, which should calculate out to about 30 ppb for the edible part of the fruit, the same level set by EPA for ready-to-eat, grain-based foods. The new EDB restrictions go into effect following a 30-day comment period.

Among the protections to be required for workers treating, aerating and shipping the fruit will be a provision for using federally approved respirators.

EPA's protection rule for workers exposed to EDB hasn't been matched by OSHA, Seminario noted. The current OSHA standard limits exposure to 20,000 ppb, far above the limits set on food residues.

She said OSHA's inaction will permit the continued high exposure of thousands of workers to EDB—primarily those who manufacture it and truck drivers and longshoremen who ship the contaminated fruits and grains.

Lower exposure limit

The federation's petition to OSHA specified that exposure levels for workers should be limited to 45 ppb—less than half the level recently proposed by the agency in its regular rulemaking procedure.

Although most uses of EDB will end by Sept. 1, Seminario noted, many farm workers and grain millers will be exposed to methyl bromide, another highly toxic compound which can cause chronic damage to the central nervous system and to the kidneys.

OSHA expects to conclude its final rulemaking on EDB by next fall, the agency said.

CLUW anniversary

Union women mark 10 years of progress

By Susan Dunlop

When the first gavel opens the convention of the Coalition of Labor Union Women on Mar. 22, delegates will be cheering the 10th anniversary of CLUW's founding and applauding its decade of demonstrable success in doing exactly what it was formed to do—speak both inside and outside the labor movement for the concerns of women union members.

More than 1,000 delegates representing nearly every AFL-CIO affiliate, as well as a number of unaffiliated unions, are registered for the four-day meeting in Chicago.

CLUW President Joyce Miller stressed that while the delegates will be reviewing forward strides made by women in their unions and in the workplace, much of the work of the convention will be on programs to speed progress on top priority issues. Among these, she cited organizing, pay equity, affirmative action, political action, increased participation by women in their unions, jobs, ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, child care and an array of other legislative goals.

Miller noted that one measure of CLUW's success in urging women to play leadership roles in their unions is the number of delegates to the CLUW convention who are elected officials of their unions or key union staff members.

An AFL-CIO vice president and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, Miller was elected to her first term as CLUW president at the organization's 1977 convention.

Rank-and-file members

She stressed, however, that as was the case at the founding CLUW meeting, many delegates will be rank-and-file members committed to working through their unions to win economic and social gains for women.

The first CLUW meeting was held in Chicago, Mar. 22-24, 1974, in response to a call by a national planning committee of women union officers and staff members for the formation of an organization within the trade union movement to speak on issues important to women.

Olga Madar, then a vice president of the Auto Workers, was CLUW's first president.

Participants in the founding meeting adopted four goals that still serve as the basic directives for CLUW's activities:

- To organize the nation's millions of unorganized women workers.
- To encourage women to run for political office and to press for legislative goals including child care legislation, full employment and job opportunities.
- To encourage union women to take an active role in their unions and to encourage their movement into leadership positions.
- To achieve affirmative action in the workplace and to combat job discrimination in all aspects of work.

By the time CLUW held its first constitutional convention in December 1975, the organization had about 5,100 members in 47 local chapters nationwide. Today, with more than 70 chapters, membership has more than tripled.

The 1975 convention reaffirmed the coalition's primary objective of advancing women's goals within the structure of the trade union movement as it overwhelmingly rejected a move to open CLUW membership to non-union women.

Formed coalitions

But the convention stressed CLUW's interest in cooperating with other women's organizations on such critical issues as ERA, voter registration and pay equity.

As it has grown, national CLUW and its local chapters have organized a wide variety of conferences, workshops, schools and training seminars for women union members. CLUW represents union women in national, state and local lobbying for legislation of particular importance to women as well as for measures that concern working people as a whole, including labor law reform, national health insurance, an adequate minimum wage, and safety and health protections.

Nationally and on the local chapter level, CLUW has sponsored education and training programs to teach skills in collective bargaining so as to help women union members put an end to discriminatory employer practices and win contract gains such as pay equity, improved workplace safety, pregnancy benefits and child care.

CLUW programs—many undertaken in cooperation with the AFL-CIO and its constitutional departments—have also concentrated on preparing women members to take a more active role in their unions, including running for top offices.

With organizing a priority issue, CLUW has mounted a series of national conferences on the critical need for unions to organize women workers, coupled with workshops on organizing skills and techniques.

Backing boycotts

National CLUW and its local chapters, at the invitation of unions, have also participated directly in local coaliitons aimed at organizing women workers and in publicizing the personnel policies of employers who intentionally discriminate against women. CLUW has been a strong ally of a number of AFL-CIO affiliates in boycotts of unfair employers.

A major campaign, with other union groups, spotlighted employment discrimination and job health hazards at the Hanes hosiery operations.

Among the issues that will top the agenda at CLUW's 1984 convention are the Reagan Administration's unfairness to women, its backsliding on civil rights, its hostility to affirmative action and its record of disastrous budget cuts that have hurt women and children more than any other groups in American society.

Democratic presidential race now a marathon

No one is going to run off with the Democratic Party's presidential nomination early in the primary season.

That was the consensus interpretation of the so-called "Super Tuesday" round of primaries and caucuses—and the predictions of the candidates themselves.

Gary Hart, the Colorado senator who has won most of the primaries held thus far, was slowed by Walter Mondale's rebound.

The former Vice President still holds the lead in convention delegates already selected. But he told his supporters that the contest for the nomination has changed "from a sprint to a marathon." He doesn't expect it to be decided before the final round of primaries in June.

Two more candidates dropped out after failing to win a primary—Ohio Sen. John Glenn and George McGovern, the Democratic presidential nominee in 1972 race.

Mondale looked for a strong showing in Michigan's Mar. 17 caucuses to help in a closely contested Mar. 20 primary in Illinois. His home state of Minnesota will be holding caucus elections the same day.

In the big Mar. 13 round of primaries, with victories in Massachusetts and Rhode Hart continued his sweep in New England Island. He led the field in Florida and did better than expected in Washington state caucuses.

Mondale was the clear winner in Georgia, but his most decisive primary victory came in Alabama—a state that is still feeling the sting of the Reagan recession. Hart, Glenn and Jesse Jackson were in a cluster battling for runner-up.

In all five primary states, according to television exit polls, there was a late surge to Mondale. The polling consultant for NBC News found "an enormous fall-off in Hart support" and the ABC network's pollster said people making up their minds at the last minute were going for Mondale.

In Alabama and Georgia, Mondale and Jackson closely split the black vote, with the other candidates shut out.

Caucus results

Caucus state tallies were still incomplete as the AFL-CIO News went to press, but Hart held the lead in Washington and Nevada. Oklahoma was a virtual standoff and Mondale was a big winner in Delaware's Mar. 14 caucus. Most of Hawaii's delegates will go to the convention uncommitted, the rest for Mondale.

McGovern came in a respectable third in Massachusetts. But he had said he would drop out of the presidential contest if he didn't finish first or a strong second, and he did so.

Glenn's hopes for a southern comeback were dashed, and his campaign was heavily in debt when he scheduled a new conference at which, according to campaign aides, he would announce his withdrawal from the contest.

Jackson just barely met the share of the vote test for matching federal campaign funds. But he continued an active campaign in the Deep South and Illinois, positioning himself as a possible balance of power at the Democratic convention.

In tactics, Mondale's sharpened criticism of Hart's record and challenge to his "new ideas" rhetoric contributed to a closer examination by voters of what one pollster termed Hart's "blurred image."

Meanwhile, both leading candidates shunned the title of "front-runner," increasingly regarded as a political jinx in the primary process.

Study shows union growth in professions

Union membership among professional and technical employees is increasing as more and more Americans are finding their way into the nation's white-collar workforce, a new study by the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees reports.

Since the mid-Fifties, when white-collar workers first began to outnumber their blue-collar counterparts, the former group has been the fastest growing occupational category in the nation's labor force, the study shows. And professional and technical workers have been the fastest growing sector of the white-collar workforce.

By 1982, the study found, 92 percent of all professional and technical workers were hired employees, most of them with large organizations. The rest were self-employed. They represent 17 percent of the total U.S. workforce; 40 percent of them work in the private sector.

The DPE study was compiled by Dr. Steven Brint, a sociologist with the Center for Applied Social Science Research at New York University, and Martin H. Dodd, former researcher for DPE. It points out that the professional and technical group includes such professions as accountants, architects, engineers, teachers, social and health care workers, artists, entertainers, doctors, and lawyers.

One in six

Estimates from the 1980 U.S. census indicate that nearly one in six workers is now employed in the professional and technical categories; 20 years ago, the figure was just over one in 10.

"Given these trends, it is likely that a substantial portion of growth in the labor movement will continue to come from these highly trained professional employees," the study suggests.

Titled "Professional Workers and Unionization: A Data Handbook," the study updates a similar 1979 survey and examines such occupations as teaching and the performing arts where union members predominate as well as the sciences and engineering, where unions are growing. It also includes chapters on the telecommunications industry and the attitudes of professionals toward organized labor. Another chapter is devoted to women in the professional labor force.

Although some professional and technical workers enjoy certain advantages over other types of workers, including better compensation and freedom to decide how best to do their work, they share certain conditions with less advantaged workers, the report notes, including the basic condition of employee status.

The shift to salaried employment and detriorating market conditions have led to an increase in collective bargaining and unionization among white-collar workers in general and professional workers in particular, the study says. From 1970 to 1980, the percentage of white-collar workers in labor unions nearly doubled.

These jobless Steelworkers in Houston have a message for Congress about the need for fair trade legislation.

Steelworkers, industry open campaign to stem invasion of subsidized imports

By Arlee C. Green

The U.S. steel industry and its workers, besieged by a growing invasion of subsidized imports, kicked off a nationwide campaign for passage of the Fair Trade in Steel Act to limit steel imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market.

The Steelworkers and the American Iron & Steel Institute, an industry trade group, at a news conference in Houston underscored the severe impact imports have had. Employment in the industry has dropped 40 percent in the past five years while the penetration of imported steel has grown from about 10 percent of the U.S. market in the 1960s to 22 percent in 1983.

The union and industry campaign effort includes a "rolling steel petition" which will gather signatures in some 40 cities in 17 states on a two-month journey to the U.S. Capitol.

The "petition" consists of the last heavy structural steel beam manufactured in Texas and a 38-foot-long section of 16-inch steel oil pipe, mounted in a trailer truck.

Last one made

The half-ton beam was the last one manufactured at the Houston Works of Armco, Inc., which closed last Jan. 27, 1984, primarily because of import competition. The section of pipe was produced by Lone Star Steel Corp., which represents another market segment that has been devastated by unfair foreign competition.

After being signed by the news conference participants, the petition stopped at the nearby meeting hall of USWA District 37, Local 2708, where former Armco workers signed their names.

At its peak, Armco employed some 4,200 workers and added $160 million annually to the Houston economy. Those jobs are permanently lost and another 2,100 Texas steelworkers are also unemployed, including 300 on layoff at U.S. Steel's Texas works in Baytown and 1,200 on layoff from Lone Star's facility in Longview.

At the news conference, USWA District Director Ed Ball observed that the unemployment figures in the industry "are cold and lifeless, but they translate into tragedy for thousands of our fellow workers, neighbors and good citizens. People who were once stable members of the community, paying taxes, owning homes and participating in its life, have now been thrown into the limbo of the jobless."

Ball noted that foreign steel has had its greatest impact in the Gulf Coast area where it has captured about 60 percent of the market.

"We must demonstrate forcefully to the Congress that imported steel—most of which is subsidizd by foreign governments and dumped in the United States below the cost of production—is the main cause of the lingering depression in our industry," Ball said. "Now we must bring this message to the heartland and to Washington."

USWA Acting President Lynn R. Williams did just that as he addressed the executive committee of the Congressional Steel Caucus. Williams stressed that "steel is so basic to the national security and the industrial strength of this country that action must be taken now to modernize and preserve the industry. The severe damage caused by dumped and subsidized imports is undermining its very foundation."

He noted that unemployment in the industry reached 45 percent during the recent recession and still remains around 29 percent with almost 100,000 steelworkers on layoff.

Williams appeared before the caucus with Bethlehem Steel Corp. Chairman Donald Trautlein to explain the industry's plight and their recent joint petition to the U.S. International Trade Commission for temporary import relief under Section 201 of the 1974 Trade Act.

Worker sacrifices

Williams said Steelworkers are making "a massive investment in their own companies, as evidenced by the 10.5 percent pay cut negotiated by the USWA and the industry last March. This is by far the largest self-help program ever undertaken by any group of American workers." He pointed out the worker sacrifices total $3 billion—enough to have put the steel companies in the black in 1983, yet most are still operating at losses because of the flood of imports at subsidized prices.

"We are doing our part," he said as he called on the government to "act promptly so that our sacrifices will not be in vain."

The Fair Trade in Steel Act would limit imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market for five years and would promote modernization of American steel mills. U.S. steel production has declined by 25 million tons since its peak of 160 million tons reached in 1977.

ITC finding of steel dumping hailed

A union-industry coalition welcomed the International Trade Commission's preliminary finding that American steel firms and their workers are being injured by the import of stainless steel sheet and strip products from Spain.

Steelworkers Acting President Lynn R. Williams, in a joint statement with Richard P. Simmons, president of Alleghany Ludlum Steel Corp., stressed that the ITC's finding provides "additional evidence that the President's specialty steel import relief program simply is not working . . . for stainless steel sheet and strip products, which represent 75 percent of the specialty industry by volume."

The coalition of the Steelworkers and nine specialty steel companies had earlier released 1983 import figures which showed imports were rising despite President Reagan's import relief action last July.

Reagan raised tariffs by 10 percent on stainless flat-rolled products and placed quantitative restrictions on tool steel and stainless steel bar and rod.

"It is obvious that Spain is springing an end run around the Administration's program and the import numbers make it equally clear that other countries are similarly undermining the program," Williams and Simmons said. The foreign producers are overcoming the higher tariffs by either absorbing them or by receiving additional government subsidies.

The coalition charged in its Jan. 13 antidumping petition to the ITC that the Spanish firm Acerinox's "predatory pricing activities have materially injured the domestic industry and its workers." Acerinox is owned jointly by Banco Espanol de Credito and an affiliate and by the Japanese Nissho Iwai and its subsidiary, Nisshin Steel.

Imports of stainless steel sheet and strip totaled 40,593 tons in the six months prior to the tariff increase and 43,551 for the second half of 1983, the coalition reported. Imports of the stainless flat-rolled products from Spain rose 73 percent in 1983 over a year earlier.

Burger action maintains ban on homework

Industrial homework exemptions overturned by an appeals court last fall remain reversed as a result of Chief Justice Warren Burger's refusal to agree to a stay of that ruling.

Burger's action, taken without comment Mar. 12, rejected a request by a Vermont group of home knitters to set aside the ruling of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia until the Supreme Court considers their formal appeal for review.

In November, the appeals court ruled that the 1981 attempt by Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan to lift a 40-year ban on industrial homework in the knitted outerwear industry was "arbitrary and capricious." Donovan's action had been challenged by both the AFL-CIO and employers in the industry.

Remanding the matter to the Labor Dept. for further proceedings, the court ordered that the ban be reinstated and kept in effect unless properly modified through "reasoned decisionmaking."

The circuit court on Feb. 1 denied a petition for a rehearing from the Center on National Labor Policy, the anti-union group that has been representing the home knitters. It then filed an emergency request for a stay with the Supreme Court, which Burger denied. The action, however, does not preclude the possibility that the high court will eventually accept the case for review.

Meanwhile, Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) is seeking to overturn the homework ban legislatively through a bill that would exempt seven industries: knitted outerwear, women's garments, embroidery, handkerchief manufacturing, jewelry making, button and buckle manufacturing, and gloves and mittens.

At Senate hearings last month, AFL-CIO Vice President Sol C. Chaikin denounced the moves to legalize industrial homework as incompatible with enforcement of wage-hour and child labor laws. Chaikin is president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Hero of the year

Letter Carrier Ronald Izzo of Tucson, Ariz., right, was selected the NALC 1983 Hero of the Year for saving a woman from being shot to death during a family dispute. Izzo receives a certificate and a cash award from NALC National Business Agent Paul Davis. NALC Regional Heroes of the Year awards were given to Benny Marino of New York, Thomas Keane and David Wilson of Cincinnati, and Carl Carlentini of Santa Clara, Calif.

Scholarship loan system set for Sheet Metal apprentices

The Sheet Metal Workers negotiated a scholarship loan agreement with the industry that will enable the union to recoup training costs, and protect its training investment in cases where a trainee jumps the union sector after graduation to work for a non-union operator.

The final agreement was reached at a meeting of trustees of the National Training Fund for the Sheet Metal Industry.

The fund's cochairmen, SMWIA President Edward J. Carlough and Pittsburgh contractor James E. Roth, said that "in these times of unemployment and industry recession it's become necessary to secure a commitment, with the appropriate dollar value attached, from our apprentices and journeymen enrolled in these courses of study."

The National Training Fund was set up in the early 1970s to provide trained workers for the sheet metal industry. Employers contribute 5 cents an hour worked by SMWIA members under collective bargaining contracts with the union.

The NTF and its local training committees spend significant sums of money to train apprentices and journeymen in specialized sheet metal working skills. Training costs average about $10,000 per trainee for a four-year program.

The apprentice training program, in effect since May 1980, had "worked reasonably well" in stopping new journeymen trained under union programs from being hired away by non-union employers, Carlough said. But the Reagan recession and high industry joblessness have made it necessary to abandon a program in which training has been cost-free to apprentices, particularly because of trainees who have gone to work for open shop employers after receiving the union-funded training, he said.

Under the agreement, new apprentices will be granted a scholarship loan in the amount of the cost of each year's training.

If an apprentice breaches the loan agreement after becoming a journeyman by going to work for a non-union firm or by becoming a noncontributing contractor himself, the full amount of the loan would become payable immediately with interest.

Rail unions seek right to sue over lax safety enforcement

Railroad unions have asked Congress for legislation to allow their members to sue the Transportation Dept. for failure to enforce rail safety laws.

Chairman James R. Snyder of the Railway Labor Executives' Association representing all railroad craft workers told a Senate Commerce Committee panel the legislation is needed to halt an alarming increase in worker injuries and deaths.

Snyder, the national legislative director of the United Transportation Union, charged that DOT's Federal Railroad Administration is lax in enforcing safety laws and as a consequence, 10 percent of the industry's workers are injured each year.

"Obviously, there must be some semblance of accountability of the FRA to the public," he said.

The FRA's primary function when it was created by Congress was to enforce the federal railroad safety laws, Snyder reminded the Senate Surface Transportation subcommittee. But statistics bear out charges that the agency is not living up to its job, he said.

Approximately 300,000 safety defects were found by federal inspectors in 1982, he noted. However, in only about 15,000 cases did FRA seek to impose a fine, he said.

The RLEA, which is made up of 19 unions, filed a lawsuit last summer in U.S. District Court in Portland, Ore., to require the FRA to impose fines for the violations, but the court held that it did not have standing to bring the lawsuit. A similar ruling on another RLEA action was issued by a federal court in San Diego on Jan. 30.

"Congress is wasting millions of dollars for maintaining that agency if the laws are not going to be enforced," Snyder declared. "We have no other place to go."

Snyder said safety statistics kept by the nation's railroads are unreliable and do not reflect a sharp, 30 percent cut in rail employment during the last few years. Fatalities to railroad employees have continued to rise even with the decline of employment, he charged. He noted also that the monetary threshold for reporting an accident is $4,500 and the railroads "have carte blanche" in deciding which accidents to report, factors that compound the inaccuracy of the safety reports.

Snyder asked the panel not to reduce DOT's authorization for fiscal 1984, since it would allow for the hiring of 30 additional FRA inspectors. He also called for specific amendments to rail safety laws to require adequate maintenance and testing of grade crossing equipment and other tests and inspections.

Conventions

Five AFL-CIO affiliates announced their convention schedules for 1984 to add to the list of other union conventions published earlier this year. They are:

The Service Employees, Dearborn, Mich., May 14-18.

The Communications Workers, Philadelphia, Aug. 6-10.

The Plasterers & Cement Masons, Las Vegas, Nev., Aug. 13-17.

The Tile, Marble & Terrazzo Finishers, Las Vegas, Nev., Aug. 19-24.

Braniff flights resume with union crews

Braniff Airways resumed operations, after being shut down for 22 months, under new union wage and benefit agreements worked out to ease the airline's financial plight.

Five unions, including three AFL-CIO affiliates, agreed to concessions that the carrier said it needed to stay in the air. The unionized workforce of about 1,900 was recalled when the airline started up on Mar. 1.

All employees are working under five-year agreements with the Hyatt Corp., the carrier's new principal owner. The unions are the Machinists, representing 343 workers; Flight Attendants, about 450; Air Line Pilots, 378, and the unaffiliated Teamsters, representing 670 clerical, office, fleet, and passenger service employees, and the Air Transport Dispatchers Association, 15.

Braniff had filed for bankruptcy and ceased operations in May 1982. It resumed operation with a workforce of 2,250, down from 9,000, when it filed Chapter 11 proceedings.

One possible hitch in the resumption of operations could be a suit filed by the Machinists over the agreement covering mechanics. IAM charged that Braniff unlawfully abrogated its previous agreement with the union last December by declaring bankruptcy under Chapter 11 proceedings. It was the only one of the five unions to have its contract unilaterally voided.

Negotiations pressed

IAM Airline Coordinator William Scheri said the IAM has attempted to negotiate a new agreement, but that a court date is set for Apr. 30 if settlement attempts fail.

Under the new ALPA agreement, pilots will start at an hourly rate of $43.01, rising to $56.84 by the fifth year. The carrier said it will guarantee 65 hours a month, and that flying time will average 75 to 80 hours. At 75 hours, starting annual pay would be $38,000.

The disputed IAM contract covering mechanics at the carrier's fixed base operation provides for hourly pay starting at $9.50, rising to $11 over the life of the contract. Scheri said the industry average is about $16.80.

Hourly pay for new flight attendants will start at $17.70 in the first year, rising to $18.79 by the end of the pact. The old starting rate was $13.43, but most of those rehired had been at the top step earning $26.30 after 13 years.

Reductions in employee benefits include a three-week limit on vacations, a $100 limit on employer contribution toward employee health insurance and no pension plan. Work rules are basically the same as before bankruptcy declaration, the union reported.

Court finds Phelps Dodge chiseled on medical exams

San Francisco — The Phelps Dodge Corp. violated the federal health standard on inorganic arsenic by failing to compensate its employees for their time and costs associated with taking medical examinations during non-working hours, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled.

The decision upholds the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission's determination that the violation was "serious" and the penalty assessed of just $100. The Steelworkers filed a complaint against the company in late 1979.

Phelps Dodge initially scheduled medical examinations for employees at its Morenci, Ariz., copper mines during working hours and at company expense. But in 1978, the company scheduled examinations outside of working hours, and workers had to provide their own transportation and were not compensated for their time. As a result, participation in the medical tests dropped from 100 percent to just 58 percent.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration determined in May 1980 that the new company policy was a serious violation and assessed a penalty of $480. On a company appeal, an administrative law judge reduced the violation to "non-serious."

OSHRC ruled the examinations were not being provided without cost to the workers and upgraded the violation to "serious."

The court affirmed the finding of a serious violation noting "substantial evidence supported the commission's determination that death or serious illness could ensue as a result of Phelps Dodge's failure to provide physical examinations 'without cost' " as the health standard requires.

Some 2,000 members of the USWA and a dozen other unions have been on strike against Phelps Dodge since July 1, 1983, when the company refused to go along with the industry wage and benefit pattern.

Meese's Special Interest

THE SENATE Judiciary Committee managed to turn up quite a dunghill in its inquiry into the fitness of White House Counselor Edwin Meese 3rd to be confirmed as Attorney General of the United States.

Lots of people, it turns out, were willing to do financial favors for Mr. Meese—from absorbing a $70,000 loss on the resale of his California home to making an interest-free $15,000 loan to Mrs. Meese so that she could afford to buy some stock for their children.

The loan, which Mr. Meese "forgot" to list on his financial disclosure form, was interest-free. As the lender explained, one doesn't charge interest to a friend.

By coincidence surely, all of these generous people were given presidential appointments to responsible positions. Friendship, it seems, is its own reward.

It will be up to the Senate to judge whether the special favors apparently exchanged are sufficiently serious to render Mr. Meese unfit to be the nation's highest legal officer. Or whether his professed innocence in the purloined Carter debate papers episode is to be believed.

But under even the sternest verdict, the favoritism that might have been bought or sold is petty cash compared with the favoritism the Reagan Administration has extended to the rich and powerful in its economic policies as well as appointments.

THE INTEREST forgiven on a $15,000 loan to a White House friend would be mere pennies compared with the probable tax windfall from just a single year of the Reagan Administration's tax cut.

On economic policies, the favoritism is measured in billions rather than thousands of dollars.

Those billions did not come from the petty cash of a rich friend. They came in part from programs such as food stamps and child health care. And they came in large part by running up an unmanageable deficit that will inevitably require some painful sacrifices to bring under control.

The President promises, if he is re-elected, to come up with a post-election belt-tightening plan to reduce the deficit. Judged by this Administration's track record, it's not hard to figure out whose belt will be tightened.

In the days ahead, the Senate will be called on to pass judgment on Reagan's appointment of Edwin Meese as the nation's Attorney General.

The integrity of a presidential appointee is the issue.

Next November, the American people will be called on to pass judgment on the re-election of Ronald Reagan as President of the United States and the continuation of his Administration.

The issue here is policies, not personal integrity. In that decision, it is the future course of the nation that will be at stake.

Chapter 11 'Burdens'

THE CASE for amending the Bankruptcy Code in light of the Supreme Court's decision on the validity of union contracts is compelling.

The Supreme Court held that existing law allows a company to break its union contract merely by declaring its intent to seek reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code.

Later, when a bankruptcy court reviews the action, the only test will be whether payment of union wages and benefits "burdens" a company.

If that is indeed the law, the law should be changed.

Continental Airlines, unfortunately, is not the only company that considers unions as well as union wages a burden.

Plant shutdowns leave trail of misery, hardship

By Press Associates, Inc.

The Otis elevator, invented before the Civil War in Yonkers, N.Y., gave employment to generation after generation of Yonkers residents.

In the late 1960s, there was talk about Otis moving to New Jersey to build a larger, more modern plant. But the city and people of Yonkers prevented that move—at considerable expense.

To provide the elevator manufacturer with more space, some 250 families and 70 businesses were relocated. More than $14 million in city, state and federal money was spent so Otis could build its new plant next to the old one.

The company, in turn, promised to build up its Yonkers workforce from 1,400 to 2,000.

In 1976, Otis Elevator, new plant and all, was bought by the United Technologies Corp., a giant conglomerate. Gradually, workers began to be laid off as work was shifted elsewhere.

Nevertheless, worried city, state and union officials were assured repeatedly by the new owner that the plant would remain open.

Searching for solution

Then, like a thunderbolt, came the company's announcement in November 1982 that it would phase out the plant within months. A stunned community searched for a solution. City officials sought to meet with United Technologies President Harry Gray. But Gray refused even to discuss the closing over the phone.

Today, the plant stands idle. About 70 percent of its laid-off workers, members of the Electrical Workers and the Auto Workers, haven't been able to find jobs. Their unemployment benefits have run out. Nearly all of those who managed to find other jobs are getting less pay, with their old skills unused.

Yonkers Mayor Angelo R. Martinelli said he "went to a wake a few months ago for a friend named Eddie. He was laid out, and his wife came up to me and said, 'Mayor, Eddie died depressed and despondent. He had offered to retire from Otis, but they told him to stay. They said there'd be no more layoffs. Then, a few weeks later, they struck by surprise and laid him off. It killed him.' "

Mayor Martinelli, who calls himself a pro-business Republican, came to Washington recently to support a bill sponsored by House Democrats to provide federal remedies in plant shutdowns.

Rape of a community

"Something is radically wrong," Martinelli told the House Employment Opportunities subcommittee. "It was a rape of our community. The company accepted our money and then broke its promise to stay in our community."

Urging passage of the plant shutdown bill, Martinelli said, "Municipalities need a cooperative mechanism in order to help delay or avert the closing of industries."

The bill would require a year's notice of a plant closing. The Labor Dept. would look into the economics of the closing and conduct hearings.

Workers victimized by a shutdown would be guaranteed severance, transfer rights, and income and health insurance maintenance. The Labor Dept. would assist in retraining, job search and relocation. Communities also would be aided.

Also testifying for the bill was the Rev. Thomas J. Harvey, director of Catholic Charities. Harvey said that in his 20 years of pastoral experience in Pittsburgh, he saw what studies have shown—the "undeniable link between prolonged unemployment and the most extreme indicators of stress—death, imprisonment and institutionalization."

The priest pointed out that a landmark study by M. Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University had found that suicide rates among plant closing victims—and their families—were 30 times higher than in the rest of the population.

Corporate profit at any cost and the unfettered freedom of corporations to do as they please, said Harvey, should take second place to "the overall profit of the community and the welfare of the people in that community." Toward this end, legislation to stem plant shutdowns is a beginning.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Your Help Needed To Overturn Bankruptcy Law Threat to Wages, Benefits

The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions are working together--on a short deadline--to generate a multi-faceted campaign urging Congress to overrule the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision and restore security to union contracts. Labor officials are using every possible means to inform rank-and-file union members of the threat posed to their wages, benefits and job security, while urging them to use the telephone, Western Union, the mail or any other means to relay the message back to Congress.

AFL-CIO President Kirkland and union presidents have sent letters to thousands of union members in key Congressional districts outlining the problem. Also enclosed in the mailings are postcards to be signed and sent back to Capitol Hill (below is a copy of this postcard which you can clip and mail or use as a sample).

The Bildisco Decision: Why It's a Threat

Briefly, in NLRB vs. Bildisco the U.S. Supreme Court said that a company can unilaterally break its union contracts upon filing for Chapter 11 reorganization under the 1978 bankruptcy law. The company is allowed to stay in business with the same management in control; nothing changes at the top. But with union contracts broken, wage scales, benefits, work rules, seniority and all other worker protections are eliminated.

A key point is that the Bildisco decision could threaten your union contract even if your employer does not seem to be in poor financial shape. The decision will encourage more contract-breaking reorganizations by employers. And the more you and your union have won in contract negotiations, the more interested management may be in ways to break the contract.

Labor-backed legislation to overrule Bildisco and restore stability to union contracts is quickly accumulating cosponsors in the House, but passage will not be easy. And corporate members of the National Association of Manufacturers recently heard an urgent appeal to begin a larger, more coordinated lobbying drive against the AFL-CIO-backed reform legislation.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Legislation to prevent misuse of bankruptcy reorganization to break union contracts will reach a vote in the House on March 21-22. Call your Representative's district office or Washington office, and urge him or her to vote for the bankruptcy bill sponsored by Rep. Peter Rodino (D-NJ) and to oppose any amendments on the House floor.

IS YOUR UNION CONTRACT SAFE FROM BANKRUPTCY?

Corporate Bankruptcy- The New Threat to Your Wages, Health Care, Pension and Seniority

Ever since the nation's bankruptcy laws were changed in 1978, unscrupulous companies have experimented with ways to escape from contracts negotiated with their employees.

Last year Continental Airlines declared bankruptcy, tore up its union contract and threw two-thirds of them out into the streets. Continental then went right back into business without a contract, even though it had money in the bank.

Now, the Supreme Court has ruled that such acts are permissible under the present bankruptcy laws. Millions of jobs are at stake. Threatened, too, are millions of American families who depend on union contracts to protect their standard of living and to provide for their future.

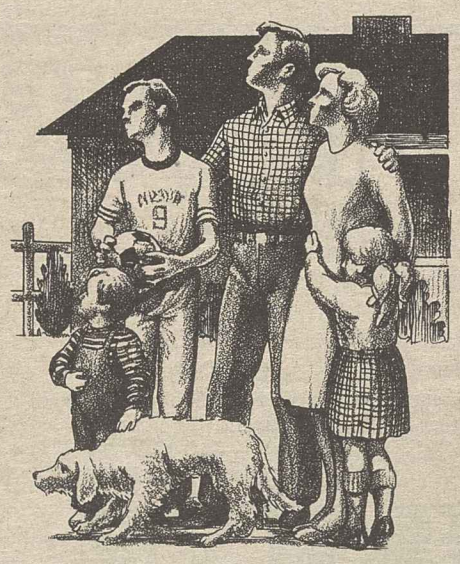
The Bildisco Case— The Supreme Court Takes a U-Turn

In 1980, the New Jersey building supply firm of Bildisco & Bildisco began withholding health and pension benefits and wage increases it had negotiated with its employees' union. Later it filed for bankruptcy under Chapter 11, and rejected the entire labor contract.

In the past, the courts have held that a labor contract can only be rejected if it is obvious that the company cannot survive any other way. The National Labor Relations Board, in keeping with this tradition, found the Bildisco Company guilty of unfair practices for breaking its contract. However, the NLRB decision was unexpectedly overturned by the Third U.S. Supreme Court of Appeals.

When the Bildisco case was heard recently by the U.S. Supreme Court, it chose to ignore a more favorable finding in the Second U.S. Court of Appeals, and sided with the company. The verdict: A company no longer needs to prove that breaking its union contract is a last resort before bankruptcy; it only needs to show that paying union wages and benefits is a "burden." (When is any cost not a burden?) This single ruling could now jeopardize union contracts all over the country.

Furthermore, the court now says a company no longer needs to wait for completion of bankruptcy proceedings, but can break its contract as soon as it files under Chapter 11. For the many companies that have been waiting for just such an opportunity, the Supreme Court decision is an engraved invitation for union busting.



It's Up To Congress To Protect Our Contract Rights

The Supreme Court's Bildisco decision now places every union contract under a cloud that only Congress can remove. Legislation is needed to restore stability to labor-management relations and to deter unscrupulous companies from evading their obligations.

For nearly 50 years the law of America has been that a union and company labor contract cannot be reopened or set aside by either party nor can economic force be used to seek more favorable terms.

Rep. Peter Rodino, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, has introduced legislation in the House of Representatives which would clarify the rights under collective bargaining agreements when bankruptcy is sought by a company. The bill would require a company to seek permission of a bankruptcy court to reject a collective bargaining agreement. It would require proper hearings and encourage negotiations with the workers through their union. The Rodino bill would also make contract breaking the last resort—to be used only when all other efforts to save the company have failed.

Such language must be written into law if workers are to protect contract rights and hard-won benefits.

TIME IS SHORT. HERE IS WHAT YOU MUST DO TO STOP THE THREAT TO YOUR WAGES, HEALTH CARE, PENSION AND SENIORITY:

1. A bill which overturns the Supreme Court's recent decision allowing companies to tear up union contracts will come to the floor of the House on March 21-22. There are other provisions in the bill that deal with bankruptcy judges, consumer credit and grain elevators.

2. You are urged to telephone your Representative immediately or send a telegram. (Telephone number 202/224-3121 will connect you with any Congressional office you ask for.) Send a telegram c/o House of Representatives, Washington, DC 20515.

3. Urge your Representative to safeguard collective bargaining by voting for the Rodino bankruptcy bill and voting against any amendments on the House floor.

Dear Representative:

MY JOB, HEALTH CARE, PENSION AND SENIORITY ARE THREATENED.

I urge you to cosponsor H.R. 4908, Rep. Peter Rodino's bill to prevent corporations from using bankruptcy to break labor agreements.

I also urge you to safeguard collective bargaining by voting for the Rodino bankruptcy bill and voting against any amendments on the floor of the House.

Mondale makes fairness a key campaign issue

Walter F. Mondale shares the labor movement's outrage at the unfairness that has marked the Reagan Administration since its first days in office—its heavy tilt to the rich and powerful, its callousness to those who have the least.

America should not be "a jungle where only the fittest or the richest prosper," Mondale told the AFL-CIO convention last October.

Under President Reagan, millions of Americans have dropped below the poverty line—or have been pushed below. Job and training programs have been slashed 28 percent, unemployment insurance has been cut back, food stamp help reduced, children denied school lunches and social services slashed.

Mondale's approach to these issues—verified by his performance in public office—helped win him the near-unanimous support of delegates to the AFL-CIO convention and the unions they represented.

Second of Three Articles

As has the trade union movement, Mondale fought the dismantling of laws and regulations affecting worker health and safety, consumer rights and environmental protections.

Under Reagan, the enforcement staff of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has been cut 25 percent, a large share of America's workplaces have been exempted from inspection and penalties for violations minimized. Standards to protect workers from health hazards have been revoked or weakened.

A toxic waste cleanup program mandated in the last Democratic administration was thwarted by Reagan appointees with cozy ties to polluters.

Mondale is committed to "enforce the laws we enacted to protect ourselves, our air, our water and our land."

As a senator, he spotlighted meat inspection problems and worked for truth-in-lending and truth-in-packaging legislation.

His expressed philosophy is that "government does not belong on your back, but it does belong at your side."

Because of cutbacks made under Reagan at the height of the recession—when the national unemployment rate was over 10 percent—extended unemployment ben-

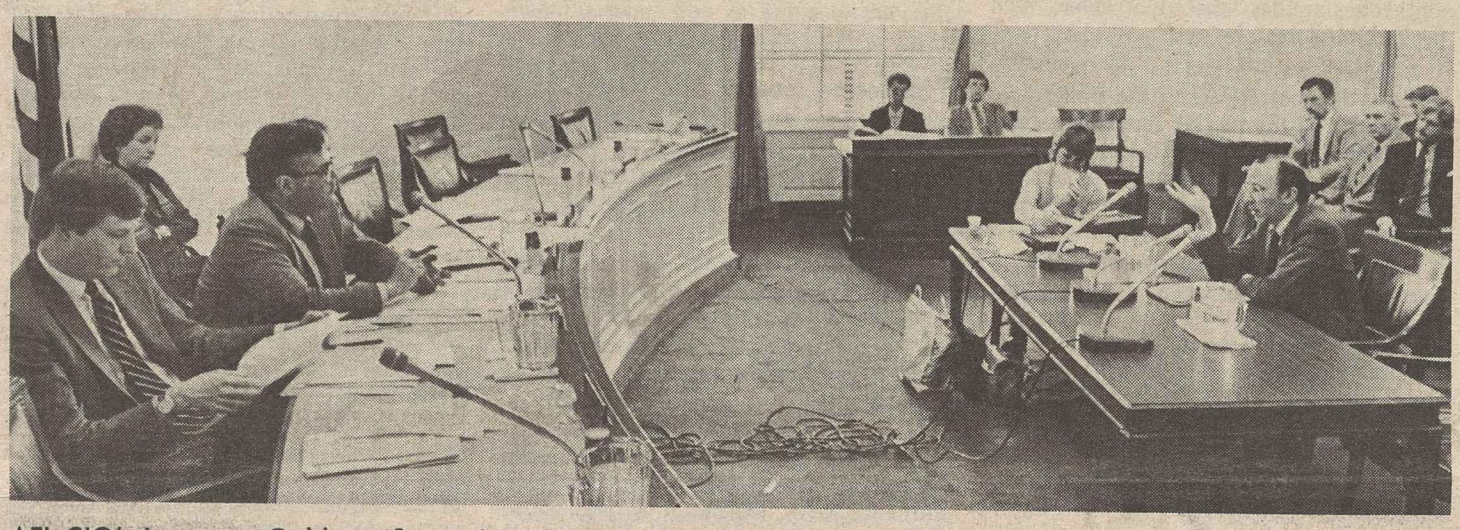
House votes bankruptcy reform



AFL-CIO's Laurence Gold testifies to NLRB's anti-union tilt at hearings chaired by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.).

Bill restoring contract rights goes to Senate

By David L. Perlman

The House voted to stop employers from using bankruptcy proceedings as a device to tear up union contracts and avoid good-faith collective bargaining.

It passed and sent to the Senate a bill that would reverse a Supreme Court decision last month that outraged the labor movement and touched off a nationwide drive to change the law.

With House action, labor's campaign shifted immediately to the Senate. AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged phone calls and mailgrams to senators because of the short time span for completion of congressional action. He warned that labor's foes will be seeking to "gut the collective bargaining language" of the House-passed bill.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) introduced the loophole-closing bill and made its provisions part of an emergency measure to change the method of selecting bankruptcy court judges by an Apr. 1 deadline.

Senate measure

As it happened, the House amended the Rodino bill to provide an alternative method of selecting judges. But it left intact the provisions dealing with collective bargaining and approved the package by voice vote.

The Senate has already passed a bill dealing with tenure for bankruptcy judges so it can either seek a House-Senate conference on the legislation or take up the House-passed bill directly.

Injunction stalling shows NLRB's anti-union bias

By James M. Shevis

A dramatic decline and delay in the National Labor Relations Board's use of injunctive relief to protect workers' rights further illustrate the board's growing anti-union bias under the Reagan Administration, organized labor charged.

AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold told a House panel holding oversight hearings on the board's handling of requests for emergency injunctions that the agency is operating on the premise that the National Labor Relations Act should be "construed and administered" so as to give workers the least possible protection.

The NLRA is the basic federal labor law guaranteeing workers the right to form unions and bargain collectively with employers.

Warning of a general breakdown in efficiency at the NLRB, Gold accused Board Chairman Donald L. Dotson of adopting a policy of inaction in regard to union requests for injunctions. Under Section 10 (j) of the NLRA, unions and employers may ask the board to seek injunctive relief while an unfair labor practice charge is being litigated if they believe there is a threat of "immediate, irreparable injury."

Gold cited statistics compiled by the hearing panel—the House Government Operations Subcommittee on Manpower & Housing—showing that "the new board is putting 10(j) injunctions against employer unfair labor practices back into the dust bin."

Since Dotson was appointed NLRB chairman by President Reagan last March and the Administration gained a three-member majority on the board two months

Cement Workers set merger with Boilermakers

Las Vegas, Nev.—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, a 29,000-member union with a proud 45-year tradition, will become a division of the Boilermakers on Apr. 1.

Delegates to a special convention overwhelmingly approved merger with the 134,000-member Boilermakers after two days of discussion and hearing from top officers of both unions.

The 364 delegates, the largest number ever to attend a CLGW convention, approved merger by more than 73 percent on a secret ballot vote, above the two-thirds majority required by the union's constitution.

Earlier, the Boilermakers had given that union's executive council authority to negotiate and consummate such a merger.

Midwest sweep a tonic for Mondale

Walter F. Mondale's campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination got back on track with convincing big-state wins in Illinois and Michigan plus a near-sweep of the week's other caucuses and primaries.

Now it was Colorado Sen. Gary Hart who was echoing on television what Mondale had said the week before—that the race for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination would be a marathon, not a quickly decided sprint.

The next big test will come in the Apr. 3 New York primary, into which both sides are pumping resources. Before then will come an opportunity for Hart to recoup in the Mar. 27 Connecticut primary, where he is favored, and weekend caucus battles in Kansas, Montana and Virginia.

Mondale won convincingly in Michigan, a recession-battered industrial state with a strong trade union movement. The caucus projections point to 79 delegates for Mondale, 49 for Hart and eight for Jesse Jackson, the only other candidate to survive the grueling first month of delegate selection.

As anticipated, Mondale won easily in caucuses held in his home state of Minnesota. As in Michigan, he demonstrated that his bedrock of support hadn't been eroded by Hart's early successes.

Illinois had been seen by both sides as a crucial test—but it was Mondale who passed it.

Early polls had projected Hart as the winner. But that was before Mondale came out swinging on issues and called on voters to match his record and program with Hart's often-fuzzy attempt to picture himself as the candidate of new ideas.

The catch-phrase that soon began to haunt Hart's campaign was Mondale's question, "Where's the beef?"

On nearly complete election returns, Mondale had 657,000 votes to 573,000 for Hart and 336,000 for Jackson. Mondale also won 97 of the 171 delegates at stake.

Cement Workers approve merger with Boilermakers

In a keynote address, CLGW President Richard A. Northrip stressed the "promise" of the merger in terms of enlarged opportunities for the union and greater effectiveness.

Base your decision on that promise, he urged the delegates. Any problems that merger might bring "can be overcome."

Negotiations for the merger began in mid-1982 and the present president of the Boilermakers, Charles R. Jones, at the time was chairman of his union's merger committee.

Now, addressing the CLGW delegates Jones spoke of the enhanced strength that will come to both groups of workers through the action.

"We will be stronger and more effective at the bargaining table," he told the delegates.

"We will do a better job of organizing the unorganized, and our voice will carry more weight in the halls of Congress, where we must be heard if we are to protect the interests of our membership.

The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers have been active in lobbying for mine safety legislation covering the union's stone and non-metal miners. And the union has a tradition also of active political participation.

Northrip told the delegates that a change in the White House in this year's election will remain a major union goal.

"If you put before your membership and your families what is at stake, we'll get the job done," he said.

Northrip was elected to the new vice presidential spot added by the Boilermakers as part of the merger agreement. And the CLGW secretary-treasurer, Henry W. Bechtholdt, was elected director of the new division that will be established for the union's members.

The union will bring into the merger members in 44 states and nine Canadian provinces.

An invitation

Jones invited the delegates, even before the merger takes effect, to attend the political action conference the Boilermakers will be holding in Washington, Mar. 25-30.

"Workers are in trouble, their unions are under attack, collective bargaining is under attack," Jones said. He warned that the problems will continue "unless American workers unite at the ballot box." The Reagan Administration has served "the special interest of the very powerful and the very rich at the expense of those who have little."

The existing three-year contracts covering U.S. cement manufacturing expire on May 1, and delegates from locals involved in the coordinated bargaining took part in a cement conference after the convention. The stress was on unity and resistance to weakening of contract provisions.

Recovery threatened

Danger signals cited as interest rate rises

New danger signs in the economy, including an increase in the prime lending rate, a record deficit in the balance of payments and a steep slowdown in consumer spending, warned that recovery from one of the nation's worst recessions may prove short-lived.

A half-point rise in the key prime rate to 11.5 percent by the country's biggest banks signaled further increases soon in short-term notes. The increase in the interest rate that major banks charge their best corporate customers was the first since last August.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald attributed the rate rise in part to the huge budget deficits under the Reagan Administration.

"The increase in the prime rate shows once again that the high deficits mean higher interest rates," he said. "Instead of paying taxes to the government, citizens now must pay higher interest rates to the bankers.

"As the higher costs of borrowing money spread throughout the economy, prices rise and demand is once again curtailed—leading to still another downturn."

Tightened credit

Many economists contend that because of current "overheating" of the economy, the Federal Reserve Board will further tighten credit conditions, pushing interest rates even higher.

A strong, 11.2-percent surge in housing starts in February and a big increase in the factory operating rate that month, to 80.7 percent of capacity, raised concern that the Fed would take action.

In other government reports on the economy, statistics belied the true circumstances of the current recovery. This was particularly true in reports on new plant and equipment expenditures and industrial production.

While the Commerce Dept. estimated 1984 capital spending to rise 13.6 percent over 1982 outlays, the forecast in real terms was only 12 percent. In 1983 and 1982, the levels had declined by 3.8 and 5.5 percent, respectively.

"The result is that the 1984 projected levels represent only a 1.9-percent increase in real terms from 1981," Oswald observed. "The results of all the major tax breaks for business and wealthy individuals over the last three years thus are minimal."

Oswald said actual capital expenditures for new plant and equipment in manufacturing are still lagging slightly below 1981 levels.

Also, he noted, a closer look at the industrial production figures for February reveals serious weaknesses in the economy. Industrial production rose 1.2 percent last month, with production of business equipment climbing 1.1 percent. Yet, the business equipment increase was 6.6 percent below the 1981 level.

Defense production

The real driving force behind the rise in industrial production remains consumer goods and defense production, Oswald said. Consumer goods rose 8.7 percent in February, and defense production was up 25.8 percent from the 1981 level.

"This illustrates the failure of Reagan's supply-side economic program," he said. "The production of investment goods—the ostensible target of Reagan's policies—remains well below its pre-recession peak.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. suggested that the pace of the economy may not be sustained without further increases in prices and interest rates in reporting that real gross national product—the total output of the nation's goods and services adjusted for inflation—is bounding ahead in the current quarter at a 7.2-percent annual rate. The figure was contained in the department's "flash" report, a tentative forecast of current economic growth based on partial data. The estimate compares with a 5-percent growth rate in the fourth quarter of 1983.

The Commerce Dept. also reported that the nation's foreign trade deficit, measured on a current account basis, rose to a quarterly record of $15.3 billion in the final three months of 1983, topping the $12.1 billion in shortfall posted in the third quarter.

Another Reagan record

For the year, the deficit grew to a record $40.8 billion, exceeding the record $15.5 billion set in 1978. The 1982 deficit came to $11.2 billion.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said that the current account deficit could top $81 billion in 1985. Part of the problem is the high value of the American dollar, which makes foreign goods relatively cheap and American goods relatively expensive.

One bright note was the continuing moderation in wholesale price increases, which rose only four-tenths of 1 percent in February, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Mondale makes fairness a key campaign issue

efits were available in less than half the states.

As Mondale noted, with unemployment the highest since the Great Depression, the government did nothing "either to put people back to work or to lighten the pain and the horror of the unemployed."

Americans who look at social security as the bedrock of their retirement income and at Medicare as an assurance that their retirement resources won't be wiped out by a single illness have reason to be suspicious of Reagan's assurances.

The fact is that the Administration put through cuts in social security benefits during its first year in office and proposed a drastic slash in benefits that was withdrawn only after congressional and public outrage killed off any possibility of enactment.

Mondale takes a firm position that the government made a bargain with its citizens who have paid into the program that "when the time comes to retire, their social security checks should be there, just as sure as the sun comes up in the morning. It's as basic as that."

Under Reagan and his appointees, civil rights enforcement has retrogressed and doors just recently opened have been shut against blacks and other groups that have suffered discrimination.

The Administration sought unsuccessfully to weaken the Voting Rights Act and has let housing discrimination problems fester.

By contrast, Mondale was an original sponsor of the Voting Rights Act and has strongly opposed its weakening. He has called for strengthening the Fair Housing Act and for a renewed commitment to end discrimination in the workplace as "a national priority."

Reagan vs. women

Women workers need no reminder of hostility by the Administration to ERA, to the concept of pay equity, to such supportive programs as federal funding of child care for low-income families with working parents and job training to open up new fields of employment for women.

Mondale's record in the Senate and as Vice President gives credence to his campaign commitments to support equal opportunity and equal rights for women in all spheres, including both social security and private pension programs and to press for pay equity.

The nation's still serious energy problems won't be resolved by big oil companies buying up other big oil companies. And as the nation emerges from recession, the demand for energy will continue to grow.

The Administration has curtailed nonmilitary research and development assistance and energy conservation programs. It has allowed oil companies to use tax windfalls and revenues to buy up competitors instead of exploring new sources of oil and natural gas. It has proposed lifting price controls on natural gas from long-established "old" wells.

The AFL-CIO has called for a comprehensive program to conserve energy, develop new sources and keep prices affordable. It has opposed budget cuts in weatherization programs for low-income homes, schools and hospitals and public buildings.

These are goals Mondale shares. He is on record for weatherization programs, for research into new energy sources, for energy-efficient requirements for appliances and automobiles.

Mondale has been attacked for supporting the "special interests" of labor, but he makes no apologies for attacking the Reagan Administration's assault on basic labor standards.

By administrative action, the Administration has nullified many of the prevailing wage safeguards of the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act, and has sought to weaken wage-hour protections.

It sought—until forced by public reaction to back down—to relax child labor regulations and allow 14-year-olds to do more hazardous work and allow older children to work longer hours.

Youth wage

Reagan has also called for a subminimum youth wage, and has suggested that it would be best if there were no minimum wage at all.

In sharp contrast, Mondale takes Reagan to task for "ushering in the cruelest assault on social justice in American history."

Noting that Reagan has at times sought to invoke the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mondale found that "hard to take." He added:

"The Democratic President who signed the first minimum wage law would never have supported the subminimum wage." Nor would FDR "have tried to undermine the Davis-Bacon Act."

Under a Democratic Administration, Mondale said, "if any legislation of that type landed on the desk of the President, we'd veto all over the top of it."

Jobless rates turn upward in 42 states

Jobless rates rose in 42 states and the District of Columbia in January, reflecting the still fragile recovery from the long Reagan recession.

Only seven states posted over-the-month declines in unemployment and the jobless rate was unchanged in one state.

The largest increase was in Indiana, where the jobless rate climbed from 8.9 to 12 percent. In West Virginia, where the recession was deep, the jobless rate rose to 17 from 15.1 percent in December.

The figures, released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, are not adjusted for seasonal variations, which make allowances for usual weather changes and seasonal fluctuations in business activity. The national adjusted jobless rate for civilian workers in January was 8 percent.

Other states with large January increases besides Indiana and West Virginia were Alabama, rising 2.1 percent to 13.5 percent; Alaska, climbing 2.4 percent to 13.3 percent; Arkansas, up 2.1 percent to 10.7 percent; Kentucky, surging 2.8 percent to 11.7 percent, and North Dakota, up 2.2 percent to 7.9 percent.

In Michigan, the jobless rate in January rose nine-tenths of 1 percent to 12.8 percent. West Virginia's 17 percent rate was the highest in the country, followed by Alabama, Alaska, Michigan, and the District of Columbia at 12.2 percent. Puerto Rico's rate was 23 percent.

Lower rates

The states recording lower jobless rates in January are Arizona, Florida, Hawaii, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Wyoming. Even so, the rates in Ohio and Pennsylvania were still in double digits.

Among metropolitan areas, the highest jobless rate in January was 25.1 percent in the McAllen-Pharr-Edinburg area of Texas. Second highest was Laredo, 22.6 percent, followed by the Brownsville-Harlingen, Texas, area, 16 percent.

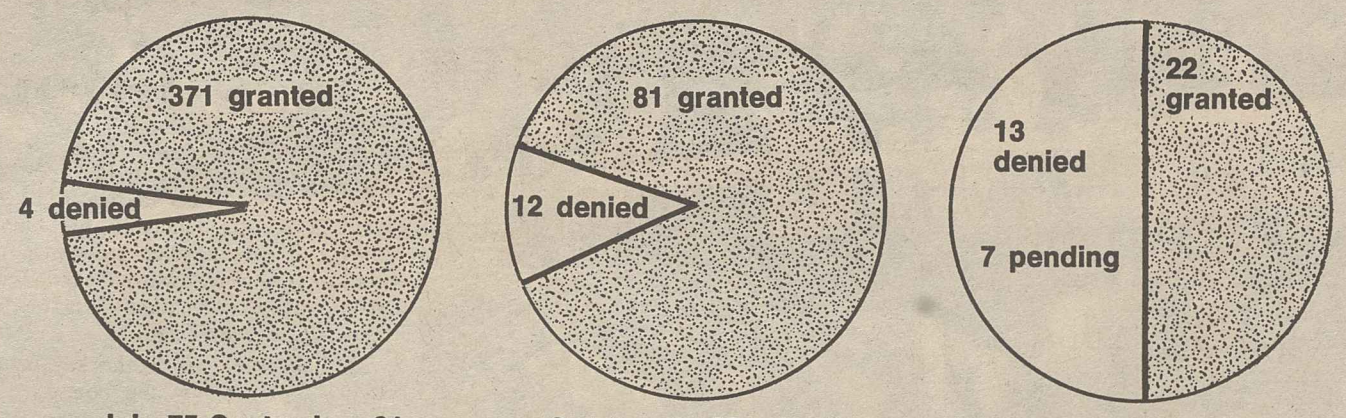
Three California areas recorded high January rates also—Stockton, 17.6 percent; Fresno, 15.3 percent, and Modesto, 19.5 percent.

Other areas with high unemployment in January were Lake Charles, La., 15.1 percent; Duluth-Superior, Minn., 16.4 percent; Vineland-Millville, N.J., 16.3 percent, and Johnstown, Pa., 16 percent.

Stamford, Conn., recorded the lowest unemployment at 3.4 percent, with Nashua, N.H., second at 3.7 percent, and Austin, Tex., third at 3.9 percent.

January's jobless rates were less than year-earlier levels in most states, BLS said. Nonfarm payroll jobs increased over the year, with manufacturing employment rising in 43 states and the District of Columbia.

NLRB shift on injunctive relief



Screen Actors again vote down merger proposal

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild is proceeding with its merger talks with the Television & Radio Artists after the SAG membership voted down a merger with the Screen Extras Guild for the second time.

SAG President Ed Asner said in announcing the results of the mail balloting that although 51.5 percent favored the SAG-SEG merger, 60 percent was necessary to approve it. In a merger referendum two years ago, the SAG members voted 57 percent in favor.

The vote on this year's balloting was 15,293 in favor of merger and 14,454 against it, Asner said.

Ken Orsatti, national executive secretary of SAG, said of the vote, "The membership has spoken. We felt strongly this merger was in the best interest of both memberships. There are no plans to attempt any further SAG-SEG merger referendums."

Orsatti said the union's efforts would now center on a merger with AFTRA. The two unions have been developing merger plans the past two years.

Orsatti said a detailed proposal will be presented next month to the merger coordinating committee. If that committee and the union's board of directors also agreed to the merger plan, then "we could move to merger as rapidly as a year to 18 months," Orsatti said.

The proposal will spell out in detail all the items relating to merger—costs, administrative and organizational structure, staff and the "other open items," he said.

Orsatti noted that the structures of the two unions differ greatly, with AFTRA being much more decentralized than SAG. A workable governing structure would be "somewhere between the two," he said.

Stalling on injunctions tied to NLRB's anti-union bias

later, almost one of every three recommendations by the agency's general counsel has been rejected, Gold noted. During the preceding 17 months of the "old" board, only one of every seven general counsel recommendations was rejected, he said.

"What is most striking is the board's pattern of actions," Gold said. "Statistics show the board has had no disinclination to deny injunctions against unions."

Since Dotson took office, nearly one of every two union requests for 10(j) injunctions against employer unfair practices has been turned down, while every injunction but one sought against a union was authorized, Gold pointed out. In comparison, the old board's treatment of injunction requests by unions and employers was roughly equal.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of the subcommittee, noted that delays even in acting on requests for injunctive relief now sometimes run into months.

"We're coming up with a new phenomenon—the 10(j) relief request backlog," Frank said, adding: "We have a very serious problem which the board does not appear intent in solving."

Part of a pattern

Gold charged that the board's excessive delay in acting on 10(j) requests "is but a cynical supplement to the biased decision of cases denying workers statutory protection by inaction." He said the delay constitutes "perhaps the most insidious effect of the board's new activism on all matters other than deciding cases, but it is only one manifestation of a general breakdown in efficiency. . . .

"It is time for the board to come up with some answers."

When it was his turn to testify, Dotson insisted there has been no policy change in the way injunctive relief is granted by the NLRB. He said delays in handling requests for injunctions most likely stem from areas of the law undergoing changes in interpretation by the board.

Dotson defended NLRB Solicitor Hugh Reilly's handling of 10(j) requests, saying that the solicitor's role is only what board members want it to be.

"If there's a delay, it's because the board has acquiesced," Dotson said. Asked why delays of seven, eight months or longer occur in acting on some 10(j) requests, Reilly offered this explanation:

"The delay occurs because I have a sense that the law is going to change from my conversations either with board members or with chief counsels, and I'm waiting the outcome of the board's deliberations."

Such delays, however, can be tragic to workers affected by them, as George Murphy, general counsel of the Food & Commercial Workers, testified.

A year's delay

Murphy cited a pending case involving a UFCW local in California where an employer discharged most of the bargaining unit employees, withdrew recognition of the union, and repudiated its labor contract.

The union's request for 10(j) relief was filed on Mar. 3, 1983, "and we still haven't heard a word" about it from the NLRB, Murphy said. "As far as we are aware, it has not been ruled on."

Meanwhile, the 34 workers cut adrift by the employer's obvious violative actions are coping not just with the loss of pay and pension rights, but also with personal stresses and the assault on human dignity that accompany unemployment.

"The American people want to work, and I don't think they should be denied that by a violation of the law," Murphy said. He pointed out that had injunctive relief been promptly provided, the workers in the California case would have been able to stay on the job while the union's unfair practice charges were being decided.

Asked by Frank whether the case exemplified a change in NLRB practice, Murphy said: "Yes. . . . It's a 180-degree flip" from pre-Reagan board practices.

"I believe this labor board is of a mind not to issue 10(j)s in cases such as this where employee rights are concerned. Employers are attempting to avoid their union contracts and go non-union."

Job panel lacks workers

After more than a year of foot-dragging, the White House has named six new members of the National Commission for Employment Policy, rounding out the advisory group to its full 15-member complement.

The commission was trimmed and revamped under the provisions of the Job Training Partnership Act of 1982—the bill that replaced the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA)—but it took the Reagan Administration until last fall to name the first nine of the new members, and until late March to fill the last vacancies.

Despite the commission's concern with jobs, the Administration came up with only one worker representative—Paul Locigno, research director for the Ohio Conference of Teamsters—to sit on the advisory panel.

The other 14 members include a corporate vice president for personnel, two bank presidents, a state legislator, a lawyer, a state industrial relations director, a vocational education administrator, a management consultant, a produce company owner, a health and physical education professor, a business administration professor, a trade association vice president, a self-employed real estate executive, and a corporate public relations manager.

Under JTPA, the commission appointees are required to be "broadly representative of agriculture, business, labor, commerce, education, veterans, current state and local elected officials, community-based organizations, assistance programs and members of the general public with expertise in human resource development or employment and training policy."

Mine safety suit cites radiation risk

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Public Citizen Health Research Group are suing the Mine Safety & Health Administration for its refusal to issue an emergency standard on radon daughters—highly radioactive gases that result from decaying uranium in underground mines.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, charges that the current standard fails to adequately protect the tens of thousands of uranium and hardrock miners from the high risk of lung cancer.

Further delay by MSHA is unjustifiable because "the evidence of grave and irreparable danger to thousands of miners is so overwhelming as to leave no room for doubt as to the necessity for . . . an emergency temporary standard," the suit argues.

OCAW and the health group petitioned MSHA in April 1980 for an emergency standard to reduce exposure limits to the radioactive gas from four working level months to seven-tenths of one month.

The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health released a study in June 1980 that said the excess risk of cancer deaths among miners was "of sufficient magnitude to be of major public health concern."

MSHA, in its 1980 response to the petition, said it would begin a serious review of the petition and later promised to make a final decision on the petition by December 1983.

MSHA has yet to issue its decision.

OSHA's failures highlighted by court ruling on asbestos

By Arlee C. Green

A federal appeals court struck down an emergency standard on worker exposure to asbestos, but "the real issue on asbestos is the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's failure to put in place a permanent standard that will adequately protect workers," an AFL-CIO safety and health specialist declared.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said the emergency standard basically was five times higher than OSHA itself had recommended in 1980 and would have allowed employers to rely on respirators and work practices instead of mandating engineering controls.

The 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans held that OSHA failed to present sufficient evidence that an emergency standard was "necessary to alleviate a grave risk of worker deaths during a six-month term."

Promised proposal

OSHA said it would publish "within a month" another proposed asbestos standard to meet the court's criticism.

"Our concern centers on the fact that if the courts cannot sustain a well-documented need for emergency action, such as we believed we had with asbestos, it is unlikely that they would sustain emergency actions on other less well-documented hazards," the agency said.

Seminario concluded from the ruling that "the 5th Circuit may always refuse to uphold OSHA emergency standards, no matter how grave the danger to workers."

The decision of the three-judge panel upheld an asbestos industry challenge to the emergency standard, which was issued last Nov. 4. The same court had granted a stay of the measure in late November.

The emergency standard, intended to last six months while a new permanent standard was developed, would have limited worker exposure to asbestos to 500,000 fibers per cubic meter of air, down from the existing permanent standard's 2 million fibers.

Fourteen unions had petitioned the agency to issue an emergency standard reducing the worker exposure level to 100,000 fibers.

Hundreds of thousands of workers are at risk of cancer due to exposure to asbestos in the workplace. Low-level exposure can cause asbestosis, a lung disease, and mesothelioma, a cancer of the linings of the lungs.

The agency testified that at least 80 worker deaths could occur from exposure at the higher level during the six-month period of the emergency standard, but the court held the number of lives that would be saved is "questionable."

The ruling added, "If a danger is imminent, it (OSHA) should complete regular rule-making as quickly as possible to determine if a new standard" of 500,000 fibers, "or even lower is appropriate."

The asbestos exposure limit was reduced from 12 million fibers to 5 million in 1971 and to 2 million in 1972. The agency has already sought approval of a permanent standard exposure level of 500,000 fibers from the Office of Management & Budget which reviews all new regulations.

That level of exposure was first proposed in 1975, and a joint study, done by OSHA and the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health in 1980, developed scientific evidence supporting the lowering of the exposure limit to 100,000 fibers. OSHA withheld from the public the results of that study for 18 months.

Veto preserves Idaho's prevailing wage law

Boise, Idaho—The Idaho Senate sustained by a 14-21 vote Democratic Gov. John Evans's veto of a measure that would have repealed a portion of the state's prevailing wage law.

The governor's veto is his fourth in four years of legislation aimed at wiping out all or part of the "Little Davis-Bacon Act."

But four days after the Senate action, House Republicans introduced a new bill to set up a state-run prevailing wage law which would be based on the out-dated wage surveys of the state's Dept. of Employment.

Texas COPE rallies support for Mondale

Austin, Tex.—A record 697 delegates attending the Texas AFL-CIO's COPE convention reiterated strong support for Walter F. Mondale's presidential nomination in the state's Democratic precinct conventions on May 5 and endorsed progressive Democrat Lloyd Doggett for the U.S. Senate.

The convention turned into a pep rally for Mondale as delegates heard from a bevy of Mondale backers, including former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, Texas State Treasurer Ann Richards, State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald McEntee and National COPE Director John Perkins.

The delegates participated in 28 workshops designed to involve more union officers and members in the delegate selection process and attended a Mondale campaign-sponsored closed-circuit television fundrasing event on "Super Tuesday."

Doggett, a state senator for 11 years who has a 94 percent "right" labor voting record, was endorsed for the Democratic primary in a rollcall vote with 73 percent approval by the membership. A two-thirds vote was required to endorse.

Doggett seeks the seat now held by Republican Sen. John Tower, who is retiring.

State AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard told the delegates in his report to the convention that Mondale's candidacy should remain Texas labor's top priority.

Pension plan insurance rate boost backed

The AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept. urged Congress to approve legislation raising the annual premium for single-employer pension plan termination insurance from $2.60 per participant to $7.

The increase sought by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., is overdue and essential, IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak testified before a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

Chatak warned that failure to approve the increase would endanger a program that has proved its value during two severe recessions marked by widespread plant closings and pension plan terminations.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison expressed a similar concern in a letter to Subcommittee Chairman Charles Rangel. Both Chatak and Denison also urged enactment of legislation similar to a measure already approved by the House Labor-Management Relations subcommittee. It would close loopholes in the law that have burdened the insurance program with liabilities from underfunded pension plans.

Without such reforms, Chatak testified, the premium increase for single-employer plans would have to be even higher than has been proposed.

Since the federal guarantee program does not cover 100 percent of a pension plan's entitlements, "employers should continue to be obligated for any benefits which are not guaranteed by the PBGC after a plan is terminated, so long as they continue in business and are solvent," Chatak urged.

Under present law, he noted, "an employer can simply walk away from responsibilities for non-guaranteed benefits, even in cases where it continues in business and is highly profitable."

The legislation covered by the testimony deals only with single-employer pension plans and both the IUD and the AFL-CIO expressed strong opposition to any attempt to hamstring the bill with unrelated amendments dealing with multi-employer pension plans.

There have been signs of such efforts in the Senate. An amendment to excuse a group of employers from liabilities imposed by a 1980 law on firms withdrawing from a multi-employer plan was recently added to an unrelated tax bill by the Senate Finance Committee.

Denison said the AFL-CIO will oppose the passage of any single-employer pension bill that includes changes in the multi-employer program.

Bill stresses right to hazard data

A joint congressional resolution affirming that all workers have the right to know about the health and safety hazards they face in the workplace has been introduced by Reps. Bruce F. Vento (D-Minn.) and George Miller (D-Calif.).

The resolution, prompted by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's issuance of a loophole-ridden "hazard communication" standard covering only 25 percent of the workforce, is aimed at getting a stronger federal standard.

Vento expressed the fear that the weak OSHA standard "is an insidious attempt to undermine stronger state laws" that offer better protection for more employees.

"OSHA has indicated that it intends to allow its standard to preempt state and local laws," he noted. "In its present form, this standard is an absolute abomination."

Vento said he envisions a warning label requirement that would clearly identify hazardous substances and list precautions in a simple language.

"We're trying to cover all types of employees," he said, "from lab technicians who handle radioactive materials to farm workers who deal with pesticides, to firefighters who battle blazes in chemical plants."

More than 40 House members have signed on as cosponsors of the resolution, which declares:

- All workers, whether they are employed in manufacturing or any other industrial or commercial enterprise, have a fundamental right to know when they are handling or are exposed to a hazardous substance that may threaten their health and well-being.
- OSHA should immediately revise its hazard communication standard to make sure that workers get meaningful information on the actual identity and composition of hazardous substances they handle or are exposed to. The OSHA rule should be the minimum standard on which the states may improve through appropriate legislation.

Local efforts

The resolution commends the action of the 14 states and the many local governments that have enacted "right-to-know" statutes to safeguard the health and wellbeing of workers and citizens.

The OSHA hazard communication standard is the subject of a legal challenge by the Steelworkers and the states of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Massachusetts. At its issuance last November, the standard was characterized by organized labor as giving chemical companies "a giant loophole" that permits them to declare any substance a "trade secret" and choose not to reveal it to workers.

The chemical industry had long fought a federal hazard identification standard, but it changed tactics and pressed OSHA to issue its weak standard so as to preempt the growing number of stronger state and local right-to-know laws.

Most recently, the Chemical Manufacturers Association has fought the Environmental Protection Agency's effort to regulate two cancer-causing chemicals by contending that OSHA has the appropriate jurisdiction and the authority to control the compounds, known as MBOCA and MDA.

The chemicals are used in the manufacture of polyurethane coatings and a variety of plastic products. The CMA and the Polyurethane Manufacturers Association are concerned that EPA will use its authority to ban the chemicals. OSHA has no such authority.

The EPA has expressed concern about the chemicals escaping beyond the plant gates, through seepage into water supplies, air pollution or contamination of old industrial sites or dumps.

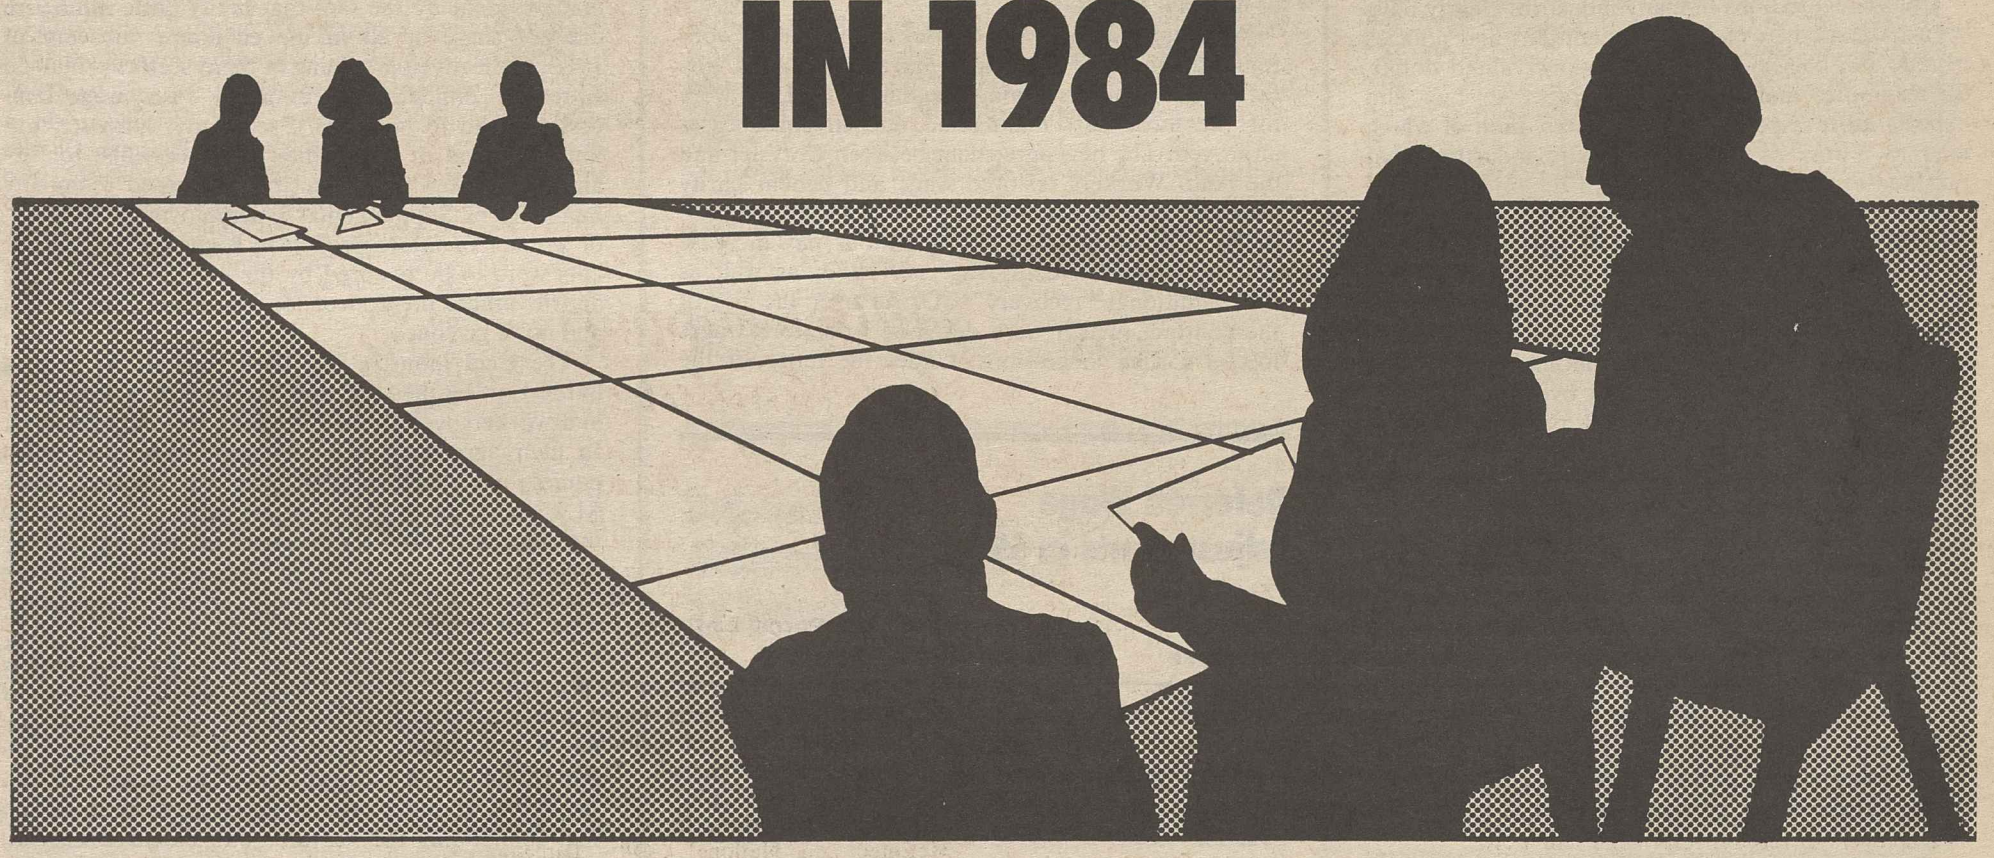
THE BARGAINING CHALLENGE IN 1984



By Douglas Meyer

Economic developments in 1984 will vary immensely from industry to industry, and the opportunities and obstacles confronting unions and their bargaining representatives will vary accordingly. Record profits will be achieved by many firms as a result of the recovery from the recession, the massive corporate tax cuts of 1981, and other recent pro-business legislation. The challenge facing unions is to share in these profits through increased wages and benefits for their members.

Douglas Meyer is an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research and is the department's 1983-84 research assistant.

The outlook for collective bargaining in some other basic industries is far less promising. There, unions are faced with corporate anti-union strategies that include threats of bankruptcy and, in some cases, the resort to expensive and wasteful mergers. This, coupled with the damage done by the recession, market deregulation, an overvalued dollar, and other harmful trade practices, all pose formidable difficulties at the bargaining table for unions in these industries. Under these circumstances, bargaining goals are likely to focus on enhancing job security.

About three million workers are covered by major collective bargaining agreements (defined as those involving 1,000 or more workers) that are due to expire or to be reopened for negotiation in 1984.

Major agreements in such basic industries as auto, mining, petroleum, construction, and railroad will

Cooling off health care costs

By Karen M. Ignagni

Assistant Director, Department of Occupational Safety, Health and Social Security.

As a nation, we are approaching a crossroad in the public policy debate over how to control rising health care costs and make fundamental changes in the health care system to keep it functioning well into the next century.

Unless Congress passes legislation to put a lid on rising health care costs, organized labor will experience at the bargaining table the devastating effects of the nation's health care crisis. Employers will push for drastic cutbacks in collectively bargained health care benefits. Working men and women who have fought hard to win adequate protection against the high cost of getting sick will find themselves paying higher and higher out-of-pocket costs and may find coverage for preventive care, diagnostic testing, drugs and eyeglasses, dental care and other essential services dropped from their policies altogether.

The AFL-CIO believes there are three basic approaches for solving our health care crisis: federal legislation, local health care coalitions, and collective bargaining.

Trade unionists can lend their powerful support to federal legislation which would require each state to establish a comprehensive, across-the-board cost containment system for all payors, public and private, doctors as well as hospitals. The AFL-CIO is supporting bills introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. James Shannon (D-Mass.) that would accomplish these goals.

But we cannot afford to wait for Congress to act. The AFL-CIO has recommended that its affiliated unions and state and local bodies join local health care coalitions. Up to now, these organizations have been business or provider-dominated, and their accomplishments have been minor. Union members are finding it useful to work with each other and, when appropriate, to form their own health care coalitions to combat employer efforts to gut collectively bargained health benefits.

Trade unionists can also take the initiative in bargaining to suggest viable alternatives to management proposals to cut health care benefits.

Rising Costs

Last year as a nation we spent $322 billion on health care. This averaged out to $1,365 for every

Alternatives to benefits cuts

By Cathy Schoen

Special Assistant to the President, Service Employees International Union

Numerous health plans across the United States and in other countries have demonstrated that it is possible to contain the rising costs of health care without sacrificing either the quality or breadth of health benefit coverage. In fact, many health programs actually succeed in controlling costs by improving the quality of health care.

Successful cost containment, however, requires an informed, assertive and participatory role for representatives of workers and their families to ensure that providing for patient health care needs remains the primary and overriding goal of each health plan.

In the 1980s, with rising health care costs threatening workers' general standard of living as well as access to decent health care, union insistence on a controlling voice in employer or insurance carrier health plan decisions has become a necessity.

In 1982-83 health premium increases averaging 20 to 40 percent dwarfed negotiated wage increases

be negotiated in 1984. Other major expirations this year occur in the food, insurance, aerospace, services and shipbuilding industries, as well as with the U.S. Postal Service.

In the public sector, the American Federation of Government Employees and other federal employee unions will be resisting Reagan Administration proposals to cap and delay pay increases, weaken cost-of-living adjustment clauses in the retirement system, erode health care benefits, and eliminate 40,000 more non-defense jobs for federal workers.

Unemployment at the beginning of 1983 stood at a 42-year high of 10.7 percent, or nearly 12 million people out of work. By the end of the year, it had declined to 8.2 percent, or 9.2 million, still well above the levels at the end of 1980. Many basic mining, manufacturing and transportation industries failed to share in the recovery of 1983. State and local government employment also remained far below its pre-recession level.

Union negotiations in many industries clearly have been hampered by economic conditions and policies beyond the bargaining table. An overvalued dollar, for example, makes imports cheaper to buy and exports more expensive to foreigners, both of which lead to a loss of jobs in domestic industries that produce exports or compete with imports.

The overall averages for wage increases in new contract settlements in 1983 were adversely affected by the weaknesses that remained in major segments of the economy. The average wage increase in the first year of all major private contract settlements in 1983 was 2.6 percent, not including cost-of-living raises, while increases measured over the full term of the settlements averaged 2.8 percent annually. While these annual figures are quite low, fourth-quarter figures showed larger increases, indicating a trend toward improved wage settlements in 1984.

The average first-year increase in total compensation, including benefits as well as wages, was 3.4 percent, up from 3.2 percent in 1982. Measured over the life of the contracts, the average annual increase was 3 percent, which compares favorably with the 2.8 percent average rise in total compensation for contracts settled in 1982. The fact that wage settlements declined in 1983 relative to 1982, while total compensation showed some improvement, indicates a movement to benefits rather than wages.

These averages reflect the fact that 37 percent of the three million workers covered by 1983 settlements took an initial wage freeze or reduction. For the 63 percent who received pay boosts, the first-year increases averaged 5.8 percent. Many of the agreements without first-year increases negotiated improvements in the second and third year.

Average first-year contract wage adjustments in different sectors of the economy deviated from the overall average of 2.6 percent. In the manufacturing sector, which remained in shambles from the recession in 1983, increases averaged just 0.3 percent. Wage adjustments averaged just 1.5 percent in the construction industry, which also shared little of the economic recovery. These averages compare with the increase in the "non-manufacturing excluding construction" sector which amounted to an average of 5 percent.

More than half the workers covered by major 1983 settlements are covered by some form of cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) provision. As would be expected, contracts with COLA clauses had lower specified wage adjustments than those without. For major contracts in 1983, first-year negotiated wage increases averaged 2 percent for those pacts with COLAs and 3.3 percent for agreements without COLAs.

The average duration of major contracts negotiated in 1983 is 32 months, up from the 31-month average for 1982 settlements and 29.5 months for contracts negotiated in 1981. A major contributor to this increase was the 41-month agreement between the Steelworkers and the major steel producers negotiated in the first quarter.

Effective wage adjustments reflect wage increases and cost-of-living adjustments negotiated earlier, as well as settlements reached during the current period. In 1983 about 6.5 million workers received wage adjustments averaging 4.7 percent. About 1.3 million workers covered by major contracts did not get increases during the year.

About half the workers covered by major agreements are scheduled to receive deferred wage increases averaging 4.1 percent in 1984. About 56 percent of these workers are covered by COLAs, with their increases averaging 3.1 percent (not counting the COLA). Those without COLAs will receive increases averaging 5.5 percent.

Unionized workers continue to receive higher wage increases and fringe benefit improvements than non-union workers. Total compensation received by union workers increased by 5.8 percent in 1983, compared to 5.7 percent for non-unionized workers, according to the Labor Dept.'s Employment Cost Index (ECI), which measures wages and salaries as well as employer costs for fringe benefits. Because most union contracts run for 2-year or 3-year terms, union improvements usually lag behind non-union improvements during economic upturns, which partially explains the relatively small differential between the two groups in 1983. Based on the ECI, the average employer hourly compensation for union labor is now $10.22, which compares to $6.63 an hour for non-union labor.

These changes should be viewed in the context of the rate of change in the consumer price index (CPI) and productivity. The CPI-W (for urban workers and their families) increased 3.3 percent over the 12-month period of 1983, while non-agricultural productivity rose about 3.5 percent over the same period. The sum of these figures is what it takes for workers to maintain their relative share of national output.

Although cost-of-living clauses were attacked continuously in 1983 by employers attempting to further erode workers' living standards, COLAs were for the most part maintained and in some cases improved. The new agreement between Chrysler and the Auto Workers restored wage and benefit parity with the rest of the industry for 85,000 workers. It provided an immediate $1-per-hour pay increase that was retroactive to Aug. 15, 1983, as well as four additional "recovery" COLAs over the life of the contract, which were designed to restore wages lost in earlier concessions. Under the terms of the agreement, regular quarterly COLA increases, based on the formula of one cent an hour for each 0.26-point rise in the CPI, would also continue.

At H. J. Heinz Company, the Food & Commercial Workers improved the COLA formula to provide one cent per hour for each rise of 0.3 point (instead of 0.4) in the consumer price index. Auto workers at Deere & Co. received an immediate 3.9 percent COLA increase (an average boost of 39 cents an hour), and maintained regular COLA payments over the 3-year contract.

In the national agreement with the Communications Workers, the Electrical Workers and the Telecommunications International Union, AT&T guaranteed that all workers will be eligible for automatic COLA payments calculated at the existing rates of 55 cents a week, plus .65 percent of the individual's weekly pay rate for each one percent rise in the CPI-U (to all urban consumers).

Despite being threatened by cuts in employment and production, unions in many troubled industries were able to maintain their existing COLA provisions, thereby protecting their members from inflation. The Operating Engineers at Ford Electronics & Refrigeration Corp. in Indiana, for example, managed to win wage increases, and continuation of their automatic quarterly cost-of-living pay adjustments calculated at one cent an hour for each 0.4 point movement in the CPI-U. Auto workers at J. I. Case settled on an agreement that continued automatic quarterly COLA calculated at the existing rate of one cent an hour for each 0.26 point rise in the CPI-W.

Despite an overall anti-union political and economic environment, organized labor had some success in forcing flagrant labor law violators to bargain fairly with unions in 1983. The National Litton Campaign showed signs of progress when Litton Industries' chairman proposed the creation of a joint labor-management committee to study "how collective bargaining and industrial relations between the company and its unions can be improved." Before that, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. had helped coordinate the efforts of 12 unions to publicize the firm's labor law violations.

The 20-year battle between J. P. Stevens & Co. and the Clothing & Textile Workers moved closer to complete victory in October when they settled the last eight complaints of unfair labor practices that had been brought by the union. Stevens agreed to pay $3 million in back wages to some employees and to recognize and bargain with the union at ten plants.

Lucky Stores, Inc., a California-based retail chain and the third largest chain of grocery stores in the nation, announced that it would stop buying lettuce from Bruce Church, Inc., because of a ruling by the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board that the grower had refused to bargain in good faith with the United Farm Workers.

The need for a national industrial policy was made evident by the fact that many basic industries did not share at all in the economic recovery of 1983. Collective bargaining in these sectors remained extremely difficult, and in many cases wage concessions had to be made. Frequently, however, unions managed to obtain alternative benefits; for example, greater job security, increased company financing of Supplemental Unemployment Benefits, or a share of future profits. In some agreements the cuts were to be restored by the end of the contract, and in others the concession was treated as a loan and not a giveback.

The steel industry has been one of the sectors hardest hit by the recession and foreign competition, and workers were forced to make some concessions. In their agreement with the eight basic steel companies, the Steelworkers gave up approximately $1.25 an hour, most of which will be restored by the August 1986 termination of the agreement. Although the COLA clause was retained, workers also gave up the first five quarterly adjustments. They did win increased company financing of their Supplemental Unemployment Benefits and gained additional guarantees of weekly benefits to laid-off workers, regardless of the condition of the fund. The Steelworkers also organized public and legislative opposition to U.S. Steel's plan to import British steel. In December, the company announced that it was abandoning the venture, which would have resulted in further job losses.

The Steelworkers and Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. settled on a 3½-year contract that contained wage and benefit reductions averaging about $3.65 an hour, all of which will be restored in stages by the end of the contract, except for 80 cents an hour to be used to finance a new fund to aid laid-off workers who have exhausted their regular Supplemental Unemployment Benefits. They also established a profit-sharing plan and won additional restrictions on contracting out of work plus a guarantee that the company will not close any covered plants during the term of the agreement.

In the troubled aluminum industry, the Steelworkers and the three major companies agreed on 3-year contracts that provided no specified wage increases, but did continue automatic COLAs, reduced some benefits, and improved others. The contracts also require the companies to give 90 days' notice of plant shutdowns.

Rubber Workers at a Kelly-Springfield Tire Co. plant in Tyler, Tex., agreed to reductions in labor costs in return for company assurances that it will spend $250 million to convert the facility to the production of radial tires. The rubber industry has been harmed by the flood of imports from Korea, East Germany, Brazil, and other countries.

Because many of the problems facing unions and their members require political and legislative solutions and with 1984 being an election year, worker interest in Political Action Committees (PACs) increased over the course of 1983. In recent years, the huge sums of money pumped into the campaigns of anti-union candidates by the PACs of corporations, trade associations and right-wing organizations have had an enormous impact on election results. Their PACs now outnumber labor PACs 10-to-1; in funding, labor is being outspent at a 5-to-1 rate.

One method of reversing this trend is the payroll checkoff by workers of voluntary political contributions to their union PACs. Union members cannot match corporate political spending dollar for dollar, but they can keep pro-labor candidates in the running. One of the major ways to start a political checkoff program is to negotiate for it. The payroll deduction of workers' voluntary political contributions is a legitimate item for collective bargaining and can be negotiated like any other contract term.

The Service Employees (SEIU) has been actively involved in helping locals negotiate political check-offs as part of their bargaining agreements, with 55 locals now having such provisions. SEIU members in Harrisburg, Pa., set up a political checkoff through their credit union. The Machinists have negotiated PAC checkoffs in many of their major agreements, including contracts with Boeing, Lockheed, and United Airlines. In earlier years in its coordinated bargaining role, the IUD helped secure PAC checkoffs for participating unions at Square D, Rockwell International and GTE.

Deregulation, bankruptcy and the threat of bankruptcy, recession, and outright union-busting attempts, all threatened organized workers and collective bargaining in many industries in 1983. Deregulation transformed orderly price structures into a chaotic mess, thereby imposing additional financial stress on many corporations that were already weakened by the recession.

But not all of the companies making use of the liberalized provisions of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 were actually going broke. The Manville Corp. was one of the first major solvent companies to make use of the new bankruptcy code to abrogate the company's obligations to workers, and several other companies quickly followed. In April, Wilson Foods made use of Chapter 11 of the bankruptcy law to break its contract with the Food & Commercial Workers. In early 1984, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in a case involving a New Jersey company, Bildisco & Bildisco, and the Teamsters that companies could make use of federal bankruptcy laws to break their collective bargaining agreements. The court concluded that the only stricture of federal labor policy that need to be served is that the company make "reasonable efforts" to reach a voluntary agreement with the union. But it would not be necessary for the parties to have "bargained to impasse" before the contract could be cancelled. The AFL-CIO is pressing Congress for legislation to tighten the bankruptcy law so as to repair the damage done by the court decision.

The airline industry suffered from the backlash of deregulation and bankruptcy throughout 1983. Braniff went bankrupt, and several airlines showed evidence of financial stress. Many of the new carriers are non-union and have introduced wage provisions that sharply undercut union standards, but even this has not assured their solvency. Among the major airlines, Continental filed for bankruptcy, and others, including Eastern and Hawaiian Airlines, threatened bankruptcy during negotiations as a means of gaining concessions.

While in many cases unions were forced to make wage concessions, they were often able to gain in return increased job security, greater access to the company's books, and some input into management decision-making.

Under a new agreement with Eastern, workers will concede up to 18 percent of their wages in exchange for 12 million shares of the company's stock, valued at $72 million, and three million shares of preferred stock worth $260 million. The value of these shares is equivalent to about one-fourth that of the company. The Machinists, Transport Workers and Air Line Pilots Association will continue to have access to Eastern books and will gain the right to appeal business plans they deem unwise. The unions will now have four employee representatives among the 21 directors on Eastern's board.

At Western Airlines, the five unions agreed to a 10 percent pay cut in exchange for six million shares of common stock. Members will also be covered by a profit-sharing plan that will pay out 15 percent of the first $25 million in annual profits and 20 percent of anything in excess of that amount. The plan will be effective during the carrier's first two profitable years. The unions involved in the settlement were the Transport Workers, Air Line Pilots, Flight Attendants, the Air Transport Employees and the Teamsters.

The Machinists and ALPA settled with Republic Airlines on a contract that calls for a 15 percent pay reduction to last 9 months in return for a profit-sharing plan through which employees receive stock options equivalent to 25 percent of the company's first $60 million in profits.

At Continental, labor strife continued throughout 1983 and into 1984, as the company continued to misuse federal bankruptcy laws to break contracts with its unions. Frontier Airlines threatened its unions by establishing a new, non-union carrier—Frontier Horizon—which further exacerbated problems in the industry.

Economic fallout from deregulation also led to a seven-week strike against Greyhound Lines by the Amalgamated Transit Union. In addition to taking a 7.8 percent cut in wages, workers were forced to start contributing 4 percent of their gross earnings to the pension plan. Previously, the company had paid the entire cost. Paid holidays were reduced to eight for all employees, down from 10 for operating employees and 12 for some office employees.

With unemployment remaining at high levels and many industries threatened with further decline, job security remained a major bargaining issue in 1983. Unions sought greater protection from layoffs, plant closings, runaway shops, and technological unemployment. In return for lower wage increases, many unions negotiated provisions such as guaranteed retraining programs, improvements in supplemental income protection plans, and financial and other assistance for displaced workers.

The break up of AT&T, along with rapid changes in technology, made employment security a vital issue for the CWA and the IBEW. The settlement established new career development training programs (separate from the existing "job specific" instruction) that are to be set up by each entity of the Bell system within a year. AT&T also agreed to develop a job displacement training program for workers whose jobs were being terminated or reclassified and to aid workers in qualifying for anticipated job vacancies within the company. Employees will also be informed of any potential job termination and be offered the training required for anticipated job openings. Training Advisory Boards, consisting of three management and three union representatives, were to be set up to give advice on training needs and curricula, evaluate courses and encourage participation. Workers also won improvements in their supplemental income protection plans, which provide benefits to employees who are forced to leave the company because of technological change or layoffs, or who are reassigned to lower paying jobs or to work locations requiring a change of residence. The monthly benefits of up to $400 will now continue for 48 months. Within 60 days after leaving the company, workers will also receive a lump-sum payment of $2,000 for those with less than 25 years of service, $2,500 for those with 25 to 30 years of service, and $3,000 for those with 30 years or more of service.

In three-year agreements with 13 glass container companies, the Glass, Pottery and Plastic Workers won improvements in job security provisions that included 90 days' pay if the employer cannot give 90 days' notice of a shutdown, five years of recall rights for laid-off workers instead of two years, insurance continuation for six months for laid-off workers, and provision for the negotiation of severance benefits in the event of plant closings.

The Machinists and Boeing established a "new technology clause" under which the company will pay for all training expenses for employees seeking to improve their skills in after-work classes.

A new $4.8 million job training and placement program for auto workers employed by General Motors in the Pontiac, Mich. area took effect in 1983. The program is sponsored jointly by UAW, General Motors, and the State of Michigan. Half the funding is provided by the training fund established in the 1982 GM/UAW contract, with matching funds allotted under the Job Training Partnership Act.

At Deere & Co., UAW members won improvements in their Supplemental Unemployment Benefits. Laid-off workers with 10 years' service will be guaranteed 52 weeks' coverage, while those with less than 10 years will continue to be covered for up to 26 weeks. A new profit-sharing plan assures employees a guaranteed payment in February 1985 of 32 cents for each hour worked in 1984. In other years, the payments will be determined by a formula that divides stockholders' equity and profits by sales.

The Steelworkers accord with Kaiser Aluminum requires the company to give employees 90 days' notice of a plant shutdown. Xerox workers in the Rochester, N.Y., area, represented by the Clothing & Textiles Workers, accepted smaller increases in wages and benefits for a guarantee of their jobs over the three-year term of the contract. In Milwaukee County, Wisc., the State, County & Municipal Employees negotiated a two-year contract that bans layoffs during the first year and the use of outside contractors in both years. The Molders ended a boycott and an eight-month strike against Magic Chef, Inc., with the ratification of a three-year agreement that retains most of the job security provisions over which the workers struck.

Some 16,000 members of the Utility Workers won a new three-year contract with the Consolidated Edison Co., which maintained their job security. The company guaranteed no layoffs unless the New York utility faces severe financial difficulty. The union resisted management demands for givebacks and gained a provision for company contributions to a new employee stock ownership plan.

With health care costs skyrocketing, there has been a great deal of pressure from employers to cut back health care benefits that workers have won through collective bargaining. Threats to health coverage include proposals for higher deductibles, reduced employer contributions and other changes that would increase out-of-pocket expenses to workers and their families.

Since 1965, health care costs have doubled every five years, far outpacing wages and the cost of other goods and services. In 1983, the nation's health care bill was $322 billion, which averages out to $1,365 for every man, woman and child in the United States. These costs are all the more devastating to workers who have lost their jobs and consequently their health care coverage. The AFL-CIO has repeatedly stressed that the ultimate solution to the health care cost problem is legislative action—a comprehensive, across-the-board cost containment program that limits the rate of growth in hospital charges and physicians' fees. Also required is a program that improves jobless workers' access to hospital care and services. The Reagan Administration's only response so far has been proposals to cut essential public programs, reduce workers' health care coverage and tax health care premiums.

Unions and their members have also brought to the bargaining table non-legislative solutions which can accomplish health care cost containment. These include requirements for second opinions for elective surgery, pre-admission testing and utilization reviews to shorten hospital stays, financial incentives for physicians to perform certain surgical procedures outside the hospital, and negotiating fees with providers. These devices have been shown to reduce premium costs and, in some cases, improve the quality of care.

The UAW has been involved in a number of cost containment efforts. As of July, members at Ford and Chrysler plants in Michigan must get a second opinion for ten specified surgical procedures in order to receive full payment under the program. The health plan pays the full cost of such second opinions. The UAW also worked in joint health committees with employers and with Blue Cross/Blue Shield in establishing an ambulatory surgery program in southern Michigan under which payments vary depending on where the surgery is performed.

In the settlement with AT&T, the unions were able to resist the company's demand for reduced medical coverage and instead came out with major improvements. Along with the formation of a joint health care cost containment committee in each Bell Company, improvements included an extension of medical benefits for up to six months for laid-off workers and an increase in reimbursement rates for certain surgical procedures and other outpatient services from 95 percent to 100 percent of usual and customary charges. The committees are responsible for examining the major factors influencing the cost of health care, recommending appropriate cost-containment measures, participating in action-oriented local coalitions and other organizations, cooperating in review programs, and encouraging the use of HMOs by employees.

The Service Employees have encouraged each SEIU local to make health care cost-containment provisions part of every collective bargaining agreement. Apartment Building Service Employees in New York City have had cost-containment measures in their health care program since it became self-insured and self-administered several years ago. The greatest savings have resulted from mandatory second opinions for surgery. Effective program administration, including close coordination of benefits and the creation of a schedule of fixed fees for all major procedures, also has resulted in considerable savings.

At Chrysler, a UAW education campaign was launched to encourage employees to use lower-cost health care and to switch coverage to HMOs. At Deere & Co., a joint review program has been set up to help control health costs.

Machinists at Boeing approved a contract containing revisions in medical insurance that expanded coverage for nervous disorders, home health care, vision care, care for the terminally ill, and elective surgery. The improved program was designed to encourage outpatient care and discourage hospital emergency room visits. A joint committee on cost containment also was established.

The Seafarers, in a contract with C&H Sugar Co., improved coverage to provide for full payment for pre-hospital admission testing and outpatient surgery, up from 80 percent.

Because medical costs keep going up despite efforts at cost containment, improved and expanded medical coverage continues to be an important aspect of contract negotiations. In 1983, many unions succeeded in improving employer-financed health insurance and in gaining specific plans for preventive, hospital, prescription, dental, and vision care. Other improvements included increased major medical insurance coverage for retirees.

Office & Professional Employees in a State of Massachusetts unit negotiated a provision for a state contribution of $2 a week per employee to establish dental and optical plans. The contribution increases to $4 a week in 1985.

Employer contributions to the health benefit fund of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers were increased from $193.17 a month to $229.16 in the first year, to $270.93 in the second year and to $276.03 in the final year, in a contract with Nabisco. A new vision care plan funded by the company was established, and improvements were made in the group life insurance plan. BC&T Workers at Sunshine Biscuit Co. won an increase in major medical insurance coverage for retirees from a maximum of $10,000 to a maximum of $25,000.

The Electronics Workers and White-Westinghouse Corp. reached agreement on a contract that increases sickness and accident benefits to $185 a week.

The Glass, Pottery, & Plastic Workers, in contracts with the major glass container companies, won improved benefits that included a $3,000 increase in life insurance coverage, bringing the range to $16,000-$18,000; and a $30-a-week increase that boosts sickness and accident benefits to a range of $160-$180. Chicago Iron Workers negotiated an increase of 30 cents an hour in employer contributions to their health and welfare fund.

The nation's two largest timber unions, the Woodworkers and the Lumber Production & Industrial Workers (an affiliate of the Carpenters), reached an agreement with seven major lumber companies in the Northwest that increases employer contributions to union health and welfare funds from $1.10 per hour, to $1.35 in the first year, $1.45 in the second year, and to $1.55 an hour in the third year of the contract.

Distillery, Wine & Allied workers at Consolidated Foods and four other food companies in California negotiated 10-day increases in the maximum allowable sick leave that can be accumulated, bringing the total to 80 for year-round workers.

Because the Reagan Administration continued its threats to make further cuts in social security, Medicaid and Medicare, pension plans remained a critical bargaining issue in 1983. Pension plan improvements took various forms—improved formulas and benefits for future retirees, lower age requirements, or increased benefits for those already in retirement.

Five unions representing workers at the American Home Products Corp. negotiated a three-step increase in the monthly pension benefit rate bringing it to $18.50 for each year of credited service; a 9 percent reduction in benefits for employees retiring at age 62, instead of 15 percent; and an increase in benefits for pre-1980 retirees. The unions involved were the Chemical Workers; Food & Commercial Workers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Steelworkers, and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Electrical workers at White-Westinghouse Corporation won a $2 increase (to $14) in the monthly pension rate for each year of credited service, and a $7 a month supplement to the pension rate for early retirees until they become eligible for social security benefits.

BC&T Workers at Philip Morris increased their minimum pension rate to $21 a month for each year of credited service, up from $16, and members can now retire at 53 instead of 55 without an actuarial reduction in their pension. They also won improvements in disability pay, vision and dental care, and paid vacations.

In the construction industry, improvements in pensions and other benefits generally take the form of increases in hourly contributions by employers to those funds. In any given contract, contribution levels vary with the funding requirements necessary to provide benefit payments. For example, Painters in central New Jersey negotiated increases in employers' hourly contributions from $1 to $1.10 for the pension fund and from 80 cents to 95 cents for the health and welfare fund. Laborers in eastern Massachusetts will see their contributions increase by 20 cents an hour for both their pension fund and health and welfare fund. Northern California Plumbers negotiated increases in contributions from $1.80 an hour to $3.50 for the pension fund and from $1.45 to $1.65 for the health and welfare fund. For Roofers in Philadelphia, employer hourly pension fund contributions will increase from 95 cents to $1.10, with health and welfare contributions rising from $1.40 to $1.55.

The Grain Millers and Michigan Sugar Co. reached an agreement raising life insurance coverage in two stages to $18,000, with pensioners' life insurance coverage after age 65 increased to $10,000 and after age 70 to $4,000. With a new agreement between the Allied Industrial Workers and Briggs & Stratton Corp., workers who retire with at least 30 years' service will receive a pension supplement of $200 a month until they reach age 62.

Payments made by employers to pension funds increased to 8 percent of payroll (up from 7 percent) for Graphic Communications members in their contract with the Printing Industries of Metropolitan New York, Inc. Flint Glass Workers and the Glass Container Industrial Relations Council settled on a contract which increases pension benefits from $16 to $17 a month for each year of credited service.

The push for pay equity and anti-discrimination provisions in collective bargaining agreements was given a boost by the 1983 federal court decision requiring the State of Washington to bring wages for workers in predominately female job classifications up to the levels paid workers in predominately male occupations that require comparable skills, responsibilities and have similar working conditions. The State, County and Municipal Employees, whose Washington State Federation brought the original suit, estimates that the raises will bring about $200 million to affected employees over the next two years, and another $500 million in back pay to September 1979. About 15,000 workers, mostly women, will benefit from the decision.

AFSCME members in Minnesota ratified a new two-year contract with the state government that provides for upgrading 40 percent of the jobs in the bargaining unit based on equal pay for comparable work. The state legislature had earlier approved expenditures of $22 million to reclassify numerous state jobs, primarily in the female-dominated positions. These decisions prompted the Governor of Kansas to order a pay equity study to determine whether the 56 percent of women among the nearly 38,000 state employees are underpaid.

In June, the Newspaper Guild's Wire Service Local in New York won a $2 million settlement from Associated Press to cover backpay awards, legal fees, and an extensive affirmative action program for women, blacks, and Hispanics. The news service agreed to set hiring goals for women and blacks as well as to establish a fund for special training of women outside their current assignments or for tuition and related expenses. To bring more black reporters and editors to the Associated Press Staff a $400,000 affirmative action program will be established.

The Auto Workers and General Motors signed an agreement with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that ended a 10-year investigation of charges that the company discriminated against women, blacks, and Hispanics. The UAW views the out-of-court settlement as a chance to expand and enhance existing programs to give more advancement opportunity to minorities and women. Under the terms of the agreement, GM will spend $42.8 million over the next five years in programs to expand hiring, training, and promoting of women and minorities. The company will also give $15 million in endowments and scholarships to colleges and technical schools, earmarked primarily to assist GM employees and their families.

The belief that all workers should receive equal pay for equal work has led many unions to oppose employer insistence on two-tier wage systems, under which new hires are permanently paid lower rates and benefits than workers currently employed. While many unions successfully resisted these proposals, in some cases contracts containing such provisions were accepted as a last resort.

Unions negotiated reductions in worktime in 1983 in the form of additional paid holidays, longer paid vacations, and reduced service requirements for vacations.

With federal legislation making Dr. Martin Luther King's birthday a national holiday, many unions stepped up their efforts to make the day a paid holiday for their members as well. Fire Fighters in Dade County, Fla., established King's birthday as their 13th paid holiday. Brewery Workers Local 9, at Miller Brewing Company in Milwaukee also added the day as a paid holiday.

The UAW and Champion Spark Plug Co. settled on a contract that included benefit improvements of an additional annual paid holiday and a longer paid shutdown during the Christmas-New Year's Day period—six days in 1983, seven days in 1984 and eight in 1985.

The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers won a national agreement with Sunshine Biscuit, Inc., that contained a vacation package giving workers paid leave ranging from two to six weeks depending on the number of years of service with the company. Under the terms of their contract with Nabisco, BC&T members will receive six weeks' vacation after 25 years of service, down from 30 years.

The Hotel & Restaurant Employees will receive a day off for every three months of good attendance in their contract with nine casino hotels in Atlantic City.

Besides adding an additional paid holiday for their members, the Paperworkers won five weeks of vacation after 18 years of service (down from 20) for workers in Pisgah Forest, N.C., and four weeks of vacation after 12 years (down from 15) for workers in Palatka, Fla.

Other contract provisions were established or improved by unions in 1983. In a three-year agreement, AFSCME members in New Jersey increased their annual clothing allowance from $325 to $425. The Paperworkers and the IBEW negotiated contracts with International Paper mills in four southern states that provide a $30 annual payment for safety shoes.

In Massachusetts, an alliance of AFSCME and Service Employees won state payment of part or all tuition costs for employees attending state universities or colleges.

In a contract with major food stores in Milwaukee, the Food & Commercial Workers established a legal fund and also extended personal leave to 24 months. In Chicago, the Hotel & Restaurant Employees established a prepaid legal assistance program to be funded by employer payments of three cents per hour worked.

The Screen Actors Guild and the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists, in their contracts with the Motion Pictures & Television Producers, won improvements in stunt and safety provisions, increases in prime-time rerun compensation, additional compensation as a share of home video market revenues, and an additional 15 minutes of paid time for removing make-up.

Graphic Arts workers in Chicago increased employer contributions to their educational fund from $9.50 to $13 a week.

The settlement at AT&T, with CWA and IBEW, also established a motor vehicle usage program in which employees assigned company vehicles will be permitted to park them at their residences.

Many construction industry contracts expanded employer contributions to training and apprenticeship funds, industry promotion and advertising funds, and annuity funds. For example, the Sheet Metal Workers' contract with the Roofing & Sheet Metal Contractors Association in Philadelphia increased employer payments to 16 cents an hour for an industry promotion fund and to 17 cents an hour for the apprenticeship fund (up from 7 cents). Bricklayers in Philadelphia won a 50 percent increase in their industry promotion fund. The Carpenters and the Building Trades Association in southeastern Massachusetts negotiated a 5-cent-an-hour increase in the training funds and 50 cents an hour to establish an annuity fund. Boilermakers in the south-central region of the United States, Plasterers & Cement Masons in Chicago and Operating Engineers in Ohio all increased employer payments to their apprenticeship funds.

These settlements reflect some of the leading trends that developed in the difficult collective bargaining year of 1983. Each of the highlights noted here was drawn from contracts covering large bargaining situations. In negotiating these agreements union representatives were forced to weigh the specific needs of the workers involved against the particular circumstances of each industry.

The majority of contracts settled in 1983 showed improvements in wages, benefits, and working conditions. But in those industries ravaged by recession, deregulation, foreign competition, or bankruptcy, unions were forced to reconsider some of their wage gains and seek other provisions to protect their members from unemployment. Where wage concessions were made, or wage increases postponed, unions were generally successful in securing increased job security, expanded retraining programs, or a greater voice in management decisions.

In addition to the bargaining advances mentioned here, thousands of other improvements were achieved in contract settlements throughout the nation. Some smaller contracts, for example, contained unique provisions and benefits not found in major contracts. In 1984, unions will continue to pursue those strategies at the bargaining table that best promote the interests of their members.

Cooling off health care costs

man, woman and child in the U.S. For the first time, health care spending rose above 10 percent of our gross national product (GNP). If current trends continue, the U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Services projects that by 1990 the nation will spend a whopping $756 billion in health care. That is approximately equal to what was spent on last year's total federal budget.

Conservatives use those numbers to make their case that we are spending too much for health care and that Americans cannot afford a national health care program similar to those in place in every other industrialized country. Ironically, the rate of growth in health care expenditures is lower in almost every country that does have a national health care system. As an example, Canada has had a comprehensive national health care system since the late 1960s and has succeeded in holding health care spending to 7 percent of GNP for almost 10 years while at the same time providing universal coverage to all citizens and a decent wage to hospital workers.

The Reagan Administration's Response

The Reagan Administration clearly will not take the decisive steps needed to control runaway health care costs. Its approach is to cut services, not control costs. Since taking office, the Administration has substantially weakened community health care services for old, sick, jobless and disadvantaged Americans. As if this were not enough, the Administration tried to pressure Congress to pass legislation which would have doubled the amount Medicare beneficiaries now pay for a basic hospital stay. Had the Congress enacted this proposal, many senior citizens would have been required to pay on the average an amount which would have consumed nearly two months of benefits for the average widow on social security.

In addition, the Reagan Administration has tried to make it harder for the economically disadvantaged to qualify for Medicaid and to force active workers to begin paying federal taxes on their collectively bargained health care benefits. The Administration sought to place a limit of $175 per family per month on the amount of tax-free contributions employers could make to worker health insurance plans. Anything over this amount would be taxable as income to employees.

The Reagan Administration claims its employee health tax proposal is designed to make workers more "cost conscious." In reality, it would result in drastic reductions in coverage for preventive care, outpatient diagnostic services, and other benefits which save money. But the Reagan scheme would leave intact coverage for hospital and surgical benefits, which have been the chief source of health-cost inflation and costly over-utilization—factors over which patients have little control.

The Administration's health tax proposal would also penalize older workers, workers living in high cost areas and those who select more comprehensive benefits plans, such as health maintenance organizations (HMOs). It would be an unprecedented intrusion into the collective bargaining process and would turn back the clock on decades of progress made by workers in winning comprehensive health care protection. At the same time it would increase taxes for a single group: workers with high health care costs.

The employee health tax is a major part of the Reagan Administration's plan to introduce what it calls "competition" into the health care system. The competition theory holds that citizens have too much health care protection and are not sufficiently sensitive to rising health care costs. Proponents of competition believe that if consumers were given economic incentives to buy less health insurance, they would become more aware of and vulnerable to rising health care costs. This increased economic vulnerability, so the theory goes, would force consumers to reduce their demand for services which would then force hospitals and doctors to reduce their prices. This theory has been the basis of a number of draconian solutions to our health care crisis emanating from the Reagan Administration. The so-called competition theory has also been behind employer proposals to reduce health insurance coverage for workers.

Early in 1983 the Administration sent Congress legislation meant to reform the way Medicare reimburses hospitals. Up to this point, hospitals have been reimbursed for whatever they spend, which has provided no incentive for cost containment and only encouraged inefficiency. Under the variation of the Administration's proposal finally approved by Congress, hospitals will be paid a fixed amount for each patient depending upon its medical staff's diagnosis of his or her condition. As a result, hospitals will have a strong incentive to keep the costs of treating patients under the federal cap for each diagnostic-related group (DRG).

The major problem with this legislation is that the new payment plan covers Medicare alone. It won't restrain the rate of growth in total health care costs, and providers will have a strong financial incentive to shift costs onto employers, employees and already overburdened state and local governments, which have been severely hit by the Reagan Administration's budget cuts. The new DRG system will do nothing to restrain growth in unnecessary, expensive hospital construction, nor will it provide any incentives to bring under control the rate of increase in doctors' fees.

The AFL-CIO has been working with a number of its affiliated unions to develop organized labor's solution to the serious problems we face in our health care system. However, both in Congress and in collective bargaining negotiations trade unionists meet resistance from those who have promoted or succumbed to the myth that workers do not care about rising health care costs because they do not pay for health care. This faulty reasoning completely ignores the fact that workers give up a great deal at the collective bargaining table to preserve health care coverage, and that very few workers have 100 percent health care coverage.

The second myth that works against organized labor is the attitude that hospital workers are responsible for rapid inflation in hospital costs. The fact is that over the past 10 years payroll costs have been decreasing as a percent of hospital costs despite a significant jump in the total number of workers employed by each hospital.

The AFL-CIO Position

For some years the AFL-CIO has taken the position that the health care system is poorly managed and that incentives to make hospitals genuinely more cost conscious ought to be added to public and private health insurance programs. Organized labor supported the Administration's plans to introduce the concept of prospective budgeting into the Medicare system, while arguing that they did not go far enough.

The Kennedy-Shannon bill is a comprehensive, across-the-board cost containment program, which limits the rate of growth in hospital costs and physicians' fees. It would control reimbursement to providers from all payors, public and private, and strongly encourage states to establish their own cost containment plans within federal guidelines. Wages and benefits of non-supervisory personnel would be protected and special allowances would be given to inner-city and public hospitals. The legislation would impose immediate federal controls on the rate of growth in hospital costs and doctors' fees. The annual rate of growth in each hospital's revenues would be limited to a predetermined amount, which represents increased operating expenses and wages and fringe benefits for non-supervisory employees. There would be adjustments for changes in the number and types of admissions and for renovation or expansion which has the prior approval of the state planning agency. Higher costs incurred by a hospital providing a disproportionate percentage of its services to low-income patients in comparison with facilities of similar size and location would also be allowed for.

Federal controls on revenues would stabilize the rate of increase in hospital costs until states can develop their own cost containment plans. States with cost containment programs already approved by the HHS would be exempt from the federal requirements. The legislation would also establish federal limits on the rate of growth in payments by all payors to physicians. To have an approved cost containment plan, states would have to set up a system to negotiate reimbursement with physicians and other providers. The legislation would also require the Secretary of HHS to study the feasibility of including within the program nursing homes and intermediate care facilities.

Collective Bargaining

Currently there is a great deal of pressure from employers to reduce health care coverage by cutting back health care benefits. Many employers cite the results of a study by the Rand Corporation as the basis of proposals to reduce health care costs by increasing workers' out-of-pocket payments. Although the results of this study appear to indicate that increasing deductibles and coinsurance payments produce short-term reductions in outpatient services, there is nothing known about whether reductions in utilization occurred in necessary or unnecessary services and what effect this will have on utilization of hospital care, the most expensive service in our health care system.

Nevertheless, employers have seized upon the results of the Rand study as justification for cutting back employees' health care benefits. National Cash Register Co. (NCR) now offers employees cash rebates to select a low option health insurance plan with high deductibles and coinsurance rates. Mobil Oil Co. sets aside an amount of money for health insurance benefits for each of its employees. The company gives cash "bonuses" to employees who live in areas that have not used up their benefit allotments.

Quaker Oats Co. has established $300 health "expense accounts" for employees and allows each worker to receive a cash refund for unused benefits at the end of the year. All of these plans reward people for underutilizing or avoiding altogether any use of health care services so that employes will realize short-term reductions in health insurance premiums. The reality is, these plans will encourage workers to go without necessary treatment, which will result in higher health care costs over the long run.

Even where unions have been able to resist health care takeaways at the bargaining table, some employers have imposed cuts on their non-union workers. Recently Ford Motor Co. imposed cutbacks on their salaried workers which the Auto Workers had rejected in its last round of negotiations. Even though cutbacks may be successfully fought by organized labor, they remain on management's agenda.

The best way for trade unionists to fight cuts in negotiated health benefits is to take the initiative at the bargaining table with proposals that reduce health care costs without imposing higher out-of pocket costs on workers. When employers are demanding cutbacks, organized labor must have alternatives or risk losing hard-won benefits. The following are examples of such proposals and estimates of how much they can reduce health insurance premiums:

Proposal	Potential Reduction in Health Insurance Premium Cost
Preadmission testing	0.8 percent
Ambulatory surgery	1.9 percent
Precertification of hospital care	1.0 percent
Second opinions	0.7 percent
Concurrent review	4.1 percent
Retrospective review	1.5 percent
Fee negotiation	3.4 percent
Hospice care	1.1 percent
Coordination of benefits	7.3 percent
Alternative delivery systems	8.5 percent
Total	30.3 percent

Taken together these initiatives can reduce health insurance premiums by 30 percent and play a major role in restraining the rate of increase in health care costs. For example, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union members in New York City found that after they instituted a mandatory second surgical opinion program, about 28 percent of initial recommendations for surgery were not confirmed by second opinions. A group of employers in Minneapolis significantly reduced hospital utilization from 856 days per 1,000 to 503 days per 1,000 by instituting a pre-admission screening program to determine whether patients being admitted into hospitals needed to be there or whether they could be treated on an outpatient basis.

In other parts of the country, hospital auditors employed by payors of health care services found such practices as electrocardiograms performed three times a day on patients who did not have heart conditions, drug charges 400 percent over wholesale, and billing for intensive care treatment for people who were actually in semi-private rooms.

Researchers in New York City have found that hospital stays can be shortened or eliminated completely for certain surgical procedures. For example, current data indicates that if hernias are repaired on an outpatient basis, with patients recuperating at home rather than in the hospital, approximately $1,100 can be cut from the basic cost for this procedure of $1,600. Making this one change in collectively bargained health insurance plans could yield thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars in savings every year.

Alternative Services

It has been known for some time that HMOs provide incentives for practicing physicians to reduce unnecessary utilization, including hospital care. Many AFL-CIO unions have strongly encouraged their members to join group practice plans and other cost-effective delivery systems.

HMOs offer comprehensive health care services, including preventive care, to enrolled members for a fixed monthly fee. The prepaid fee covers treatment in HMO facilities and in hospitals and removes financial incentives for providers to perform unnecessary tests or hospitalize patients who could be treated on an outpatient basis. Since 1973, enrollment in HMOs has jumped from 3 to 12 million members. Studies have shown that group practice members are hospitalized only half as often as non-HMO members. As a result, HMO premiums, which include coverage for preventive, diagnostic and catastrophic care, are competitive—and sometimes lower—than private health insurance plans which offer a more limited benefit package, impose higher out-of-pocket costs on patients and fail to monitor the quality of care received.

Given a choice between a viable group practice HMO and a so-called "preferred provider organization" (PPO), the AFL-CIO favors HMOs. Physicians who participate in group practice HMOs agree to provide health care services to subscribers who are enrolled on a capitated basis.

But not all union members can or wish to join HMOs. As a result, some unions have established contractual relationship with preferred provider organizations. Others are looking into the feasibility of this option.

Preferred provider organizations promise many things to many people. Hospitals are promised increased patient volume and improved cash flow. Physicians are attracted by the assurance of a stable patient base, less paperwork and rapid reimbursement. Insurers and third party administrators see PPOs as a way to increase their market share and improve services to subscribers. Employers and employees are promised reduced health care costs.

If PPOs make good on all of these promises and still provide quality health care to subscribers, they should be encouraged. On the other hand, consumers contemplating joining PPOs should know ahead of time how much they will be required to pay out-of-pocket for certain medical services, what limitations on services exist or what services are excluded from the plan, and whether the plan has made provision for admitting emergency patients to non-affiliated hospitals or for consultation with and transfer to non-participating physicians.

PPOs can offer subscribers a reduction in health insurance premiums, but over the long run they will do little to control the rate of increase in total health care costs.

Over the past year, more and more working men and women are being asked to join local health care coalitions. The AFL-CIO has been participating in an informal coalition with the American Hospital Association, Blue Cross, Health Insurance Association of America, American Medical Association and the Business Roundtable under the coordination of John Dunlop. Similarily, we have encouraged our affiliates and their members when appropriate to join with other community groups and the providers of health services in their areas to try to develop ways to bring health care costs under control and to assure that unemployed workers and their families, as well as others deprived of coverage, continue to receive health care when they need it.

The AFL-CIO remains convinced that the only way to assure all Americans access to quality health care they can afford is through the enactment of universal national health insurance. Until that goal is won, we should do all in our power through legislation, collective bargaining and community action to fight cutbacks, to control costs and to improve health services for all Americans.

and pension improvements. This disparity will mean even greater pressure from employers in the future to shift the rising costs of care onto the backs of workers and get it off corporate or public employers' budgets. As federal and state health plans cut back on public programs and tighten payments to hospitals and physicians, the crisis situation for privately negotiated plans will worsen. Hospitals and physicians are more than willing to stop a potential reduction in their income from one source by simply shifting costs onto other payers—namely privately insured patients.

For unions, this means the costs of negotiating retiree supplementary and unemployed worker coverage will rise dramatically due to less public program coverage, and costs of current worker coverage will soar far beyond even the double digit (15-20%) health care inflation rate. In other words, protecting health benefits will remain a central and difficult negotiating issue unless something is done to contain costs.

Fortunately, ample evidence exists that cost containment is possible without loss of high-quality benefits. Through past efforts to maintain and improve health benefits, many local unions (and some corporate plans) have paved the way to innovative cost containment programs.

These programs have a proven track record in saving health care dollars while maintaining or even improving the quality of benefits. In many instances, joint cost containment programs have been a successful bargaining strategy to head off benefit cuts. Understanding what is possible can help to contain costs and achieve bargaining goals.

Bargaining to Stop Benefit Cuts

Success at the bargaining table and identifying those programs that are beneficial for patients while containing costs depend on several basic premises:

- An understanding that patients are not responsible for the rising costs of care. Even where "trivial" use of health benefits exists due to patients who are overly worried about their health, this use amounts to a small fraction of the total costs of care. The bulk of costs goes to cover care for seriously ill patients in virtually all plans.
- A willingness to go on the offensive, asking questions and seeking answers about how the current health plan is run and what are the basic sources of cost increase.
- Identification of particular problems in the health plan, including possible high rates of disease due to occupational health or safety hazards.
- Development of plan specific programs designed to address perceived problem areas with strong patient protection to assure access and quality care.
- Identification of those areas where broader community (including multi-union and/or employer coalitions) action will be necessary to correct excessive cost increases, such as those areas beyond the control of an individual health plan or a smaller health plan.

The Real Cost Culprits

A brief analysis of any health plan or a few questions posed to health insurance carriers will reveal that rising costs of health care, for the most part, are due to:

- Soaring costs of each day in the hospital—especially costs of lab tests, x-rays, drugs and other "ancillary" services beyond room and board.
- Dramatic increases in physician charges and the number of procedures (including surgery) prescribed by physicians for each patient.

In addition, questions may reveal that particular health problems appear at an unusual rate for workers and family members covered by the plan. These health problems may indicate that a particular health prevention program is needed, tailored to the needs of the health plan members.

Contrary to a popular myth used by those attacking insurance coverage, analysis of a plan will show that rising costs are not due to increased use initiated by patients. On the contrary, in many plans patient-initiated use is actually decreasing.

Questioning the pattern of health services and costs will help identify whether surgery rates are excessive or whether particular physicians or hospitals stand out in ordering and charging more for patients than other community practitioners.

Union representatives can argue that genuine cost containment requires looking to health insurance, hospitals and physician practices and not blaming the patient.

By taking a more active, controlling role, unions can begin to identify past health plan practices that contribute to unnecessarily high costs.

In the past, employers have for the most part left health benefit management in the hands of health insurance carriers. Carriers in turn have largely paid bills with no or few questions asked (except of patients). In fact, since most insurance premiums are set by marking up a percentage over health claims costs, the carriers actually profit by high—and rising—health service bills.

This perverse incentive fuels that already close relationship between health insurance companies and providers of health care. With the notable exception of quality HMOs, the resulting health system has given positive financial rewards to providing more and more expensive services regardless of whether such services benefited patients' health.

These incentives have been particularly devastating because of the rapid increase in the number of physicians relative to potential patients, especially in urban areas. With the average number of available patients per physician declining 21 percent since 1970, and projections of another 20 percent decline by 1990, doctors must charge more for each service and generate more services per patient to maintain their expectations of high income levels.

The cost containment activities described below all aim to counteract inflationary incentives and hold carriers and health service providers more accountable for assuring that care is necessary, appropriate and affordable.

Cost Containment Programs That Protect Patient Benefits

There are four general areas of health cost containment that can reduce health plan costs while safeguarding family access to quality health care:

- Improved plan administration.
- More appropriate physician and hospital use of services and elimination of unnecessary or hazardous services.
- Fee and charges negotiations.
- Prevention of disease and health maintenance.

Administrative Improvements

Some health plans do monitor health insurance carriers' administrative performance or negotiate charges assessed by these carriers for insuring and administering payment of health benefits, but many do not use this cost-cutting tool.

Coordination of Benefits

Although most plans today contain clauses requiring coordination of benefits for two-worker families to make sure that plans don't pay twice or pay for services more appropriately covered by another plan, few plans pursue vigorous COB programs. National studies report COB savings in the 5 to 10 percent of premium range where plans have a significant number of two-worker families.

Coordinating benefits with workers' compensation (often called subrogation) can yield the additional benefit of correctly identifying work-related accidents and diseases. The worker benefits from more extensive coverage of health care costs at the same time that workers' compensation picks up costs that would otherwise have been billed to the health insurance plan.

Claims Review and Audits

Traditional health insurance plans were set up to pay claims, with few questions asked. Well designed auditing programs have a proven ability to lower total costs by spotting overbilling or inappropriate billing and questioning discrepancies between what was billed and what was ordered or performed.

Weekend Admissions and In-Hospital Testing

Many plans now include clauses to restrict non-emergency weekend admissions or keeping patients in a hospital over the weekend. These clauses are designed to reduce payment for hospitalization where the use was solely to fill an empty bed rather than provide a necessary service. Similarly, admitting patient to the hospital to conduct diagnostic tests increases costs unnecessarily.

Tightening Contracts with Insurors

The charges for insuring and administering a health plan vary widely from as low as 3 to 5 percent of premiums to in excess of 15 percent for group plans. These charges, often called the "retention" rate, are negotiable. In many areas of the country it is possible to write contracts for health claims administrators for fixed fees rather than percentage arrangements and to tie full payment of fees to administrative performance.

Self insurance—holding reserves directly rather than using an insurance carrier—can also save funds by avoiding premium taxes (for commercial carriers) and by increasing earnings on insurance reserves. Labor representatives need to monitor self-insured plans carefully, however, to ensure that funding is adequate to cover costs of health care.

Improved Utilization Programs

The primary driving force behind health care inflation today is rising hospital costs, including costs of surgical and ancillary care while hospitalized.

Programs which decrease hospital use, by lowering admission rates, by shortening lengths of stay or by reducing unnecessary or hazardous services are among the most cost-effective efforts to contain health plan costs. Decreased use of hospitals, in fact, is the major source of health maintenance organization (HMO) savings.

Significant savings can also be posted by lowering use of expensive services. Joint, coordinated action of labor, management and insurance claims carrier can be effective and achieve maximum savings.

Mandatory Second Opinion

Mandatory second opinion surgery programs are based on evidence that indicators for surgery are often imprecise, and that the growing incidence of surgery in the United States appears to be more related to the rapid increase in numbers of surgeons per population than to a growing need for surgery. Surgery rates are now growing four to six times faster than the population. One in ten people had surgery in 1980. At least one-third of the hysterectomies and two-thirds of tonsilectomies were unnecessary.

Requiring a second opinion for elective surgery offers plan participants additional information about the need for surgery as well as alternate options possible. When it is designed to protect patients, they remain free to elect surgery after the consultation regardless of the consultant's recommendation. Recent studies suggest that a program focused on a few frequently performed procedures that entail high costs or that yield high non-confirmation rates offers the greatest potential savings for health plans.

The track record of mandatory second opinion programs has been dramatic. Studies indicate that even a broad program for all elective procedures yields over $2.60 for each dollar of program costs. Overall plan savings range from 3 to over 6 percent of total premium costs. Many carriers will now give immediate premium reductions for a second opinion program.

Family acceptance of the program is key to its ability to improve quality of care and contain costs. Whatever the structure, the program requires an on-going education program to ensure that families understand and use the program properly.

Alternatives to Hospitalization

Most traditional health insurance plans emphasize in-hospital coverage to the exclusion of ambulatory, alternative care settings. As a result, patients often find their coverage ends or drops off substantially after they leave the hospital although their need for care continues. This gives providers and patients incentives to prolong lengths of stay.

For instance, many plans pay for full in-hospital benefits while home care, nursing home care, hospice care, out-patient care for mental or nervous conditions, revert to Major Medical deductibles, co-insurance, or are uncovered altogether. A well-administered plan can limit use of extended benefits to those who would otherwise be in the hospital, while removing financial barriers to lower-cost alternatives to hospitals.

Utilization Review

Utilization review of hospitals is possible on a prospective, concurrent or retrospective basis. In each instance systems require an aggressive monitoring of claims and evaluation of patterns of care.

Prospective review, or pre-admission screening, reviews elective hospital admissions to determine whether the patient's condition requires hospitalization and at what level.

Concurrent review looks at the necessity and appropriateness of treatment and continued in-patient care during a patient's hospital stay. Coupled with a well designed benefit package that allows health care alternatives to hospital care, concurrent review can reduce length of stay.

Retrospective review examines whether care delivered was appropriate and, accordingly, whether or not to pay the full claim. Usually only claims involving high cost and lengthy stays are reviewed. They can provide considerable savings per case and potentially influence future patterns of care if providers are concerned that they will be denied payment for services rendered.

In all types of utilization review, it is vital to include a provision to hold the patient harmless—not responsible—for any claims denied by the plan. This protection of patients and their families stops providers from billing families for denied claims. The protection will also help enlist patient support and understanding of the program.

Utilization reviews of all types require careful coordination with all other features of plans, monitoring to protect benefit quality and coverage, a strong education program, and strong protection for patients and their families. As in other cost control programs, utilization review works best when insured families see it as in the interests of patient health, so an active labor role is essential to make sure patients are protected.

Fee Schedules and Fee Negotiations

Most health plans now pay physicians according to a practice referred to as Usual Customary and Reasonable (UCR) fees. This practice entails profiling current community fee patterns and paying fees as billed, up to some proportion of total physicians in the community. UCR allows constantly escalating fee patterns since insurance merely follows the market from year to year.

This practice also has become particularly inflationary because of the trend toward fewer patients per practicing physician and an emerging doctor surplus. As more families get double insurance coverage, physicians seeking to increase fees make out particularly well. Although each plan may limit its allowable fee below a community level, if a family has two policies, the two combined will often pick up the full fee.

This spiral is likely to accelerate in the future as doctors coming out of school find it harder to achieve incomes comparable to more senior practitioners with well-established practices. Hospitals with excess beds are also more than willing to raise charges to cover the costs of idle equipment.

One mechanism for breaking this cycle is to drop UCR altogether in favor of fee schedules that fix a fee per service for all physician procedures.

Once the fee schedule is established, a plan can identify those physicians who will take the plan's fee as payment in full. The plan can provide the list of those doctors to insured families. This can be done without a formal panel of physicians, and families can remain free to choose any physician whether or not plan fees were accepted in full.

A fee negotiation program is a vital sister program to establish along with a fee schedule. This program enables the plan to negotiate on behalf of covered families whenever a fee is charged which exceeds the plan's allowable fees. Without this safeguard, attempts by the plan to control fees would translate to exposure of families to uncovered bills as physicians resort to billing patients directly.

Negotiations with hospitals and groups of physicians, and especially dental groups, over fees is also possible. Recently, a wave of hospitals and physician group sponsored "preferred provider organizations" (PPOs) have begun actively marketing to employer/employee groups with offers of discounts in return for preferred plan status. Careful evaluation of any PPO, especially those set up by providers to capture a greater share of patients in the community, is necessary to determine whether the plans will indeed produce savings and if so, at what cost to quality and access to care.

In general, the larger the insured population the more successful are fee and charge negotiations. Multi-union and employer groups can negotiate together while maintaining separately administered health plans.

Prevention and Health Maintenance

Programs that improve or maintain workers' and family health can generate substantial long-term savings.

Employee assistance programs, especially for alcoholism and substance abuse, have spread rapidly in recent years with wide success. Reports from many of the programs indicate that 60 to 70 percent of those accepting treatment are helped, reducing work time lost, family stress, accidents and other related problems as well as health care costs.

Work site delivery health care programs have been particularly successful. Long-term studies of hypertension detection and treatment programs, located at or near work sites, indicate dramatic reductions in death and hospitalization rates due to reduced heart attacks, strokes and other hypertension-related disease.

Community-Wide Programs

All the above programs offer substantial savings potential depending on the individual health plan's past experience, the behavior of local area hospitals and physicians, and the characteristics of covered workers and their families.

But to the extent that plans succeed in curbing inappropriate use of hospitals or excessive prescribing of services, they may still experience "catch-up" cost increases later if health institutions and individual providers are able to raise charges to make up for reductions in use.

In addition, as long as current reimbursement practices generally encourage expansion and acquisition of new, expensive health technology—even where it duplicates existing services—individual plans may lack the leverage necessary to control overall costs. When an individual plan seeks to depart from cost patterns set in the surrounding community, it may find that covered patients and their families are denied access to care.

Counteracting that ability of providers to play health plans off against each other calls for local, state and national united action.

Union-busting hospital ordered to recognize Teachers' nursing unit

By Susan Dunlop

A federal court ruled that a Milwaukee hospital must bargain with its nurses—even though their union narrowly lost an election—because the hospital, advised by a union-busting consultant, committed unfair labor practices so excessive that a fair rerun election is impossible.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld a National Labor Relations Board order that requires St. Francis Hospital to recognize and bargain with the Federation of Nurses & Health Professionals, an affiliate of the Teachers. The vote in a 1979 NLRB election went 100-95 against the union.

The court pointed out, however, that prior to the hospital's unlawful interference in the election, a majority of the 207 nurses employed at St. Francis had signed authorization cards indicating support for a union.

The case stemmed from a 1979 organizing campaign. By Aug. 17, the union had collected 123 signed cards, and the NLRB scheduled an election for Oct. 26.

In September, however, the hospital hired Modern Management, Inc., a notorious union-busting firm from Chicago that has been implicated in a number of other major unfair labor practice cases.

The union charged that Modern Management had advised supervisors on how to talk to employees to discourage them from voting for the union. These conversations were the basis for most of the federation's complaints which were upheld by the NLRB.

The board in its decision also found that the hospital had acted unlawfully when it promised the nurses a variety of benefits, including wage increases, only days before the election, and when it had interrogated employees about their union sympathies, threatened union supporters and refused to let nurses attend union-sponsored educational seminars although it had previously permitted—and paid for—such attendance.

In response to charges filed by the union, an administrative law judge ruled that the hospital had unlawfully coerced its employees and poisoned the atmosphere at the election. As a remedy, the judge ordered St. Francis to recognize and bargain with the AFT unit. The judge's decision was later upheld by the NLRB.

That order, issued before Reagan appointees tilted the balance of the board, was handed down by former NLRB members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Don A. Zimmerman, who still serves on the board.

Although the union had filed similar charges against Modern Management, the administrative law judge dismissed them, but did recommend that the union be permitted equal access to employees on hospital grounds. The federal court, however, decided that the access remedy was unnecessary.

The court affirmed the NLRB's right to order bargaining despite the union's election loss in cases where there is a clear majority support for a union and where the employer's unfair labor practices "have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process."

Lasting impact

The court pointed out that the NLRB may properly consider "the extensiveness of an employer's unfair practices in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future."

Both the NLRB and the appeals court rejected the hospital's contention that it should not have to recognize the union prior to a new election because it had mended its ways and improved some employee relations practices since 1979.

The NLRB pointed out that the hospital's "course of retaliatory unfair labor practices" throughout the organizing campaign were pervasive and severe enough to have a lingering effect on employees.

The board also noted that the employer's refusal to let nurses attend any more union-sponsored seminars came after the election was over. That move, the NLRB said, was evidence that the hospital would continue to punish employees "for their union activities."

Barbara Janusiak, a St. Francis nurse who had been active in the organizing drive, called the decision "a great victory for nurses" at the facility.

"This shows that registered nurses can't be intimidated or deprived of their rights by anti-union consultants," she stressed.

Candice Owley, president of the Wisconsin Federation of Nurses & Health Professionals, said the victory "showed that the hospital, which chose to violate the law, cannot get away with illegal practices."

Clarence Mitchell mourned as ally in rights struggle

Clarence M. Mitchell, Jr., the legislative strategist of the civil rights coalition at the time of its greatest triumphs, died at 73 and the AFL-CIO expressed the "deep sorrow" of his trade union allies.

"He knew that the fight for racial justice is everybody's fight and that it is bound tightly with the fight for economic justice," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas Thomas R. Donahue said.

Their letter to Mrs. Juanita Mitchell, who shared her husband's commitment to the civil rights cause, noted his long association with the union movement, dating back four decades when he served as the first director of the NAACP's labor division.

Mitchell, who died Mar. 18 after a heart attack, was Washington director of the NAACP and legislative chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights during an era that saw the passage of the breakthrough 1964 Civil Rights Act, followed by the Voting Rights Act and fair housing legislation.

During those years, Mitchell earned a reputation as the most effective and most skillful lobbyist on Capitol Hill—always persuasive, seeking accommodation but holding firm on principle.

He was chairman of the Leadership Conference, the coalition he helped form before his retirement in 1980.

Because of his dedication, "millions of Americans, black and white, are better off," Kirkland and Donahue stressed. Their letter noted Mitchell's awareness "that the fights for labor law reform and full employment measures were a continuation of the struggle for the civil rights, voting rights and fair housing laws."

Public TV drama depicts stockyard union struggle

"The Killing Floor," a film about the efforts of Chicago stockyard workers to organize a union, will be televised on public broadcasting stations Apr. 10.

The two-hour drama will be part of PBS's "American Playhouse" series and is the first production in public television's "Made in U.S.A." series about the history of working people in America.

The film, based on actual events and people, tells the fictionalized story of Frank Custer, a black sharecropper from the South who moves to Chicago in the early 1900s in search of work and who helps organize a union—a forerunner of the Food & Commercial Workers.

Although the stockyard workers' union is interracial, tensions build when employers refuse to negotiate and attempt to bust the union by hiring desperate black migrant workers to undercut the union and break a strike.

Custer and other workers are caught in the dilemma and are forced to choose between loyalties.

The production stars Emmy Award winning actor Moses Gunn, with Damien Leake and Academy Award nominee Alfred Woodard in leading roles.

David Brody, history professor at the University of California, pointed out in a review of the film that it not only underscores the problems faced by workers in their struggle to organize, but also provides a "sense of the place of ordinary working people" in shaping American history.

"The Killing Floor" was produced with backing from a wide spectrum of labor organizations as well as foundations and corporations.

Major union supporters were the Communications Workers, the Steelworkers, the Operating Engineers and the Food & Commercial Workers. Other major funding was supplied by the National Endowment for the Humanities, American Playhouse, the Ford Foundation, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and the Rockefeller Foundation.

In addition, 40 other unions and labor organizations contributed to the funding for the production, including the AFL-CIO.

A resolution adopted at the 1983 AFL-CIO convention praised the "Made in U.S.A." series as one of the "most ambitious, potentially significant" efforts to assure that American workers are portrayed fairly and honestly on television.

The entire six-program series will cover the history of American workers and their unions from 1835 to about 1945. Scripts or research have been completed for the remaining five programs.

"The Killing Floor" is scheduled for broadcast on the PBS network on Apr. 10 at 9 a.m. EST, but local listings should be checked to confirm date and time.

Midwest sweep a tonic for Mondale

Hart's supporters boycotted Puerto Rico's primary, in which more than 150,000 persons voted and Mondale won all 48 delegates at stake. Glenn's supporters called rump caucuses attended by 2,500 persons who elected an all-Hart slate. Presumably, the Democratic convention will be faced with rival delegate challenges.

In Arkansas caucuses, Mondale led with 43.9 percent of the vote and 20 delegates to 30.4 percent and nine delegates for Hart, with 19.9 percent and eight delegates for Jackson. There were votes but no delegates for an uncommitted slate.

In South Carolina, which Sen. Ernest F. Hollings clearly would have won if he hadn't dropped out of the contest, most of the votes were for an uncommitted slate, with Jackson leading the three active candidates with 25 percent of the vote.

In Mississippi, where ballot-counting has been slow, mostly complete caucus results showed a narrow grouping of 30.9 percent uncommitted, 29.9 percent for Mondale, 27.9 percent for Jackson and 11.4 percent for Hart.

Union vote

In the industrial states, network polls agreed that union members were giving solid majorities to Mondale. Hart, meanwhile, continued to hammer at the former Vice President as beholden to what his campaign literature terms "the special interest bosses."

On more concrete issues, an ABC exit poll in Illinois found that Mondale was rated more favorably than his two opponents on ability to handle foreign affairs, produce a strong economy, hold down unemployment, reduce the federal deficit and hold down taxes.

An NBC poll found similar reactions and indicated that Mondale's margin of victory would have been even greater if Jackson had not been in the race.

Mondale made clear in election-night interviews that he didn't consider himself a front-runner and there would be no complacency in his campaign.

As do Hart and Jackson, he sees "a long, tough road" to the convention, with wins and losses.

After the Apr. 3 New York primary come an Apr. 7 caucus in Wisconsin and a big Apr. 10 primary in Pennsylvania.

About one-third of the convention delegates have been chosen thus far. Counts vary according to the allocation methods used. But the tallies show Mondale with about half the delegates chosen thus far, and substantially more than the combined total for Hart and Jackson.

Erin go bragh

More than 100,000 marchers and a million spectators turned out for New York City's traditional St. Patrick's Day parade, led this year by Grand Marshal Thomas W. Gleason, president of the Longshoremen. A number of union groups joined in the five-hour march that followed a green line painted on Fifth Ave.

America Works series to air on PBS stations, cable TV

"America Works," the AFL-CIO's public affairs television series, will be carried on public broadcasting and cable channels beginning in April.

The federation's Labor Institute of Public Affairs, which produced the programs, has negotiated agreements with six public television affiliates to broadcast the 12 episodes in the series that were broadcast nationally last year on nearly 40 commercial television stations.

LIPA was aided in talks with the public stations by local labor representatives, including a number who serve on the boards of PBS affiliates in their communities.

Programs set to focus on key children's issues

A seven-part television series, titled "Your Children, Our Children," will be aired by the Public Broadcasting Service during April and May. It focuses attention on issues affecting the nation's 67 million children.

Teachers President Albert Shanker served as a project adviser to the series, which will be followed each week by a two-hour, Saturday morning public radio discussion show. Among the issues to be addressed are day care, child neglect, infant health care, part-time jobs, sex and sexuality and being "normal."

LIPA Executive Director Larry Kirkman said negotiations are also under way with other public broadcasting affiliates. The series is being given to PBS stations at no charge.

Kirkman said "America Works" will also be transmitted on about 12 cable television systems nationwide. Cable operators will pay a small fee for the programs.

The locations now scheduled to carry the series on PBS channels are New York, Washington, D.C., Lansing, Mich., Providence, R.I., Baton Rouge, La., and Hawaii. Kirkman said air dates and times will be announced when schedules are set by each station.

He noted that the issues covered in the series — among them pay equity, health care, plant closings, hunger, education and voter registration—offer an "alternative look at working people to contrast with the half dozen business-oriented programs already carried on public television."

He said LIPA, which is the AFL-CIO's television production arm, is planning a new series of "America Works" episodes to offer PBS for this fall's broadcast schedule.

Kirkman said LIPA has prepared an information kit on the series for use by local union officials who want to approach their community broadcasters and cable operators about carrying "America Works."

Battle shifts to Senate

House votes to close bankruptcy loophole

Before the House vote, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland had stressed the importance of the issue in a letter to union activists across the country. "No issue confronting the trade union movement is more important than the corporate abuse of bankruptcy to break collective bargaining agreements," Kirkland said.

When a company petitions for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, the existing management is normally appointed as trustee and given authority to take action to protect the firm's assets from creditors.

But under the House-passed legislation, any proposal to cancel a collective bargaining agreement would have to be approved by a bankruptcy court as meeting the following standards:

- Management has met in good faith with the union holding bargaining rights and provided the union representative with "relevant financial and other information" to document the need for a contract revision.
- Management has made a reasonable proposal and considered, but found inadequate, any counter-offer by the union.
- Unless the contract is repudiated as management has requested, the jobs covered by the union contract will be lost and attempt to carry out a financial reorganization of the company will fail.

No unilateral action

The legislation specifically prohibits the trustees from unilaterally changing or terminating employment conditions established under a union contract without getting permission from the bankruptcy court.

Rodino told his colleagues that the collective bargaining section of the bill would restore the standard that was in effect before 1978 amendments to the Bankruptcy Code were interpreted by the Supreme Court as weakening the worker protections intended by Congress.

Also included in the House-passed bill is a compromise on a personal bankruptcy controversy that has pitted lenders and retailers against consumer advocates. Another provision is intended to protect farmers whose crops are stored in bankrupt grain elevators.

The consumer provision is less creditor-oriented than a Senate-passed version and an AFL-CIO analysis concluded that it "strikes a balance between the legitimate needs of creditors to assure that the bankruptcy law is not abused by individuals and the rights of legitimate debtors to get the 'fresh start' which bankruptcy law is designed to provide."

On the House floor, the hottest debate came over adoption of the rule that barred all amendments except the one dealing with appointment of judges.

Republicans fought to open up the bill to amendments, and attacked especially the collective bargaining provisions, complaining that the House was being pressed to overrule the Supreme Court without full committee consideration and the chance for amendments.

Democratic supporters retorted that Congress never intended to weaken collective bargaining procedures when it changed the Bankruptcy Code, and quick action is imperative before additional groups of workers are victimized.

Rules Committee Chairman Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.) told his colleagues that the language in the bill assured "a fair and balanced procedure under which the bankruptcy court itself will adjudicate the merits of a company's claim that its financial situation requires abrogation of collective bargaining agreements."

On a key vote that closely followed party lines, the rule was approved by a 242-166 vote.

Republicans had a chance to propose detailed changes in the bill through a recommittal motion preceding final passage. Thus they could have forced a vote on the collective bargaining provisions. They chose not to do so because, as a Republican floor leader explained, they didn't have the votes.

Instead, a routine recommittal motion was made and promptly rejected by voice vote. Then the bill with its bargaining guarantees intact was then passed, also by a voice vote.

Deregulation plan hit as increasing mortgage risks

A Reagan Administration bill to reduce government regulation of securities based on pools of home mortgages poses risks for both investors and consumers, the AFL-CIO cautioned at House hearings.

Henry B. Schechter, who heads the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, expressed concern that the deregulation move would encourage lenders to make dubious second mortgage loans at high interest rates and pass on the risk to investment portfolios.

Such high-risk investment, easily subject to default, could find its way into pension portfolios, Schechter stressed.

Homeowners also would be put to risk, Schechter suggested, if lenders encouraged borrowing that would result in foreclosure of their homes because of a layoff or economic downturn.

The legislation being considered by a House Commerce subcommittee would enable mortgage-backed securities that meet minimal rating standards to be exempt from registration with the Securities & Exchange Commission.

New York—The Carpenters took their nationwide boycott of Louisiana-Pacific Corp. to Wall Street, organizing a noontime rally outside the New York Stock Exchange to dramatize the lumber company's refusal to bargain a fair contract with its employees.

Nearly 1,600 members of the Carpenters Western Council of Lumber, Production and Industrial Workers and of the Woodworkers Western Region Council 3 have been on strike since last June at 18 Louisiana-Pacific facilities in Washington, Oregon, California and Idaho.

At the demonstration, Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell said the union staged the rally to show that it intends to take its boycott activities "from Main Street to Wall Street" to spotlight the company's unjustified demands for wage rollbacks and concessions.

In a message delivered by AFL-CIO Regional Director Humphrey Donahue, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that the federation and its affiliates fully support the union members "as you say 'no' to L-P's irresponsible union-busting tactics."

"We stand with you," Kirkland said, "as you tell Wall Street that Louisiana-Pacific's bottom line must include justice for its workers."

The workers struck the plants after Louisiana-Pacific dropped out of an employers' group that agreed to an industry-wide settlement last summer that includes large and small forest products firms in the Northwest.

The unions launched a consumer boycott of Louisiana-Pacific home repair and construction products. The action was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last December.

Industry pattern

The pattern settlement, which Campbell called modest, provides for a wage freeze in 1983, a 4 percent increase in 1984 and a 4.5 percent increase in 1985.

Campbell told the demonstrators there is "absolutely no justification" for Louisiana-Pacific to turn down the industry settlement and "refuse to pay decent wages" to its employees.

Campbell pointed out that Louisiana-Pacific, the nation's second largest lumber company, has boasted of its "strong earnings" in 1983 while demanding wage cuts and contract takeaways.

He said the dispute "involves an effort by a billion-dollar corporation to completely undermine union-wages and working conditions in an entire industry."

Campbell said the purpose of the demonstration, which was joined by hundreds of workers, was to make the union's case not only "to the consuming public but also to the investing public, shareholders, government officials, and regulatory agencies."

The union said Louisiana-Pacific workers who are also company shareholders have formed the "L-P Workers for Justice Committee" and will conduct a formal proxy solicitation in conjunction with the company's next shareholders' meeting.

The "corporate campaign" against the company is part of a three-pronged strategy, the union said, which also includes the consumer boycott of the company's products as well as an organizing drive at Louisiana-Pacific plants in the South where the firm has been shifting much of its production.

Prior to the rally, Carpenters representatives testified on Louisiana-Pacific's use of strikebreakers in the dispute at hearings on labor relations held by New York State Assemblyman Frank J. Barbaro.

Reverse Logic

THE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING provisions of the bankruptcy law changes approved by the House represent such elemental justice that it is hard to see how any senator could object.

Since logic is not a prerequisite for election to the Senate, objection will nevertheless be heard. As in the House, there will be those who profess concern at the temerity of Congress in rushing to overturn a Supreme Court decision just a month old.

The objection falls apart under any sort of scrutiny.

It's not the Supreme Court's judgment that is the issue; it's the judgment of Congress.

No question of constitutionality is involved. The only question is whether Congress desires to give employers who file for bankruptcy reorganization a free hand to tear up union contracts. The Supreme Court says present law allows this. It's up to Congress to change the law if it doesn't want this to be the case.

It's even simpler if the question is turned around.

Suppose the Supreme Court had held—as even Mr. Reagan's Justice Dept. argued in the case—that employers in financial difficulties had to bargain in good faith for any contract concessions and that a bankruptcy court would have to be persuaded that abrogation of a union contract was necessary to protect the jobs of the workers and enable the company to survive financially.

And then supposed some senator introduced a bill to change the law so that a union contract could be nullified merely on the contention that it was "burdensome" to the company.

Surely not more than a handful of senators would vote for such a measure. By the same token, those who wouldn't should insist on preserving the intent of the House-passed bill.

The $850 Solution

FOR A MERE $850, a company executive can attend a two-day seminar to learn how to close down an "overfunded" pension plan and repossess millions of dollars that have been earmarked for an employee retirement program.

The seminar, sponsored by the Institute for International Research, will be addressed by officials from government agencies dealing with pension regulations as well as private attorneys and consultants, according to the brochure.

Pension terminations have become the hot thing in business these days, thanks to the high interest rates of recent years that have increased the value of pension plan reserves.

Under present law, it seems, there is nothing to stop a company not bound by a union contract from dropping an ongoing pension plan, buying individual annuities for employees to cover their earned pension credits, and pocket the balance.

The seminar brochure says that since 1980, 128 companies have been able to pocket more than $1 million each in "excess assets" after dissolving their pension plans. It says termination applications now being considered by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. "would free up to $1 billion in excess assets" and it estimates that another $150 billion in recoverable assets are still "untapped."

One big ethical question, obviously, is "whose assets?"

Another question, for Congress to answer, is whether the pension reform law passed a decade ago to assure that workers would receive the retirement benefits they had earned anticipated such a loophole.

As a first step, certainly, a halt should be called to further raiding of pension plans.

Then, with due consideration for all of the equities involved, Congress should seek to shape an equitable solution. And not, one would hope, the $850 solution of the pension-raiding seminar.

Medicare's funding ills laid to rising doctor fees

By Press Associates, Inc.

Medicare, established in 1966 following years of pressure by senior citizen and labor groups, is in financial trouble.

The government estimates that by 1990 the Medicare trust fund will begin running in the red and with its deficits growing sharply after that if nothing is done. It is generally agreed that Medicare payments will exceed its revenues before too long, but the question of what to do about it is now the subject of sharp debate.

The stakes are high—not only for Medicare's 29 million elderly and disabled beneficiaries, but for all present and future consumers of medical care, and taxpayers as well.

Senior citizens, labor and consumer groups propose to keep Medicare solvent by reforming its open-ended reimbursement system and controlling physician and hospital charges.

This approach is embodied in a bill sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) titled the Health Care Cost Control & Medicare Solvency Act of 1984.

Reasonable as this approach is, one would think it would be universally embraced. Not so. Powerful, monied medical groups oppose reforming a system which has enriched them for years.

The 'gift horse'

Ironically, groups such as the American Medical Association had attacked establishment of the Medicare program as a step toward "socialized medicine."

But that was before they learned how well they could profit from the system. Today, $20,000 of the average doctor's $100,000 income comes from Medicare and its beneficiaries.

The nation's $322-billion-a-year health care industry would prefer a solution that doesn't threaten its profits. The industry had reason to be pleased by the recent proposals of the Reagan Administration's Social Security Advisory Council.

The council recommended that Medicare be kept solvent by raising the eligibility age from 65 to 67, taxing employer-paid health insurance benefits, increasing beneficiaries' out-of-pocket Medicare costs and hiking the tax on alcohol and tobacco.

The council, after 15 months of hearings, failed to address the root cause of Medicare's financing problems—health care cost inflation. For the past decade, medical care charges have run double or triple the general rate of inflation.

Shrinking coverage

Health care profiteering and Medicare cutbacks during the Reagan Administration have combined to limit Medicare coverage to only 45 percent of the health care bill for the elderly. Senior citizens now pay almost as much for health care as they did before Medicare was set up.

However, it isn't surprising that the 13-member advisory council overlooked the cost control approach. Appointed by then-Secretary of Health & Human Services Richard Schweiker, the council was stacked with representatives of business, including private hospitals and drug and hospital supply manufacturers. It was chaired by former Indiana Gov. Otis Bowen, a Republican doctor.

The council excluded representatives of Medicare's 29 million beneficiaries, an omission protested from the start by the nation's senior citizen groups.

The council's two representatives of organized labor issued a dissenting report which rejected the majority's proposals and endorsed the Kennedy-Gephardt alternative.

Congress isn't likely to act on the politically explosive Medicare problem until after the 1984 elections. The course Congress ultimately chooses depends in large part on the election outcome.

The issue of Medicare as an institution that enables the elderly to enjoy their remaining years in good health should be debated in this year's elections.

MEMO FROM COPE

Senate Update '84

Timmy the Geek Sees It too Close to Call

(Following is a guest column by Timmy the Geek, well-known odds-maker of no fixed address. A word of explanation: The cliches of the sports world are T the G's stock in trade. The editors pray readers will be charitable and excuse this once-only lapse in the dignity and sober language they have come to expect of this page.)

When the dust settles next November 6, which party's going to be King of the Ring in the U.S. Senate? It's too close to handicap. The only sure bet is it'll be a Pier Six brawl.

The big picture is this: The defending title-holder is the GOP with a 55-45 bulge. The Democratic squad has got to come to play if it's going to hold on to all it has and whip six of its GOP rivals to nab the championship belt.

One factor going for the Democrats: The numbers are in their corner. Nineteen of the Republican team put it on the line, only 14 on the Dem side.

Look for a lot of leather to fly in all 33 fight sites, but most of the pros are watching a few telltale battles that'll tip off who's going to be the biggest kid on the block, the Democratic or Republican squad. Here are some of the big match-ups:

► North Carolina—A blistering battle between two Tar-Heel titans, the GOP's Jesse Helms, who now holds the crown, and tough, two-fisted challenger, Gov. Jim Hunt. There's as much fan interest in this one nationally—almost—as in the main event presidential bout.

Both are seasoned pros who know what to do in a scrap. One thing about Jesse that makes his strategy easy to figure: He always comes at you from the right. And he's not much for the Marquis of Queensbury rules. He'll rabbit punch, kidney punch and—when the referee is too busy mugging for the TV cameras to watch the fighters—land one below the belt now and then.

Even though he won his first two outings by close calls in 1972 and 1978, it would be a mistake to think Jesse's got a glass jaw and can be sent to the floor with one sucker punch. He's built up the most muscular mandibles in the entire Senate through hours of jaw-strengthening filibusters. Then, too, he's got money for pre-fight publicity: $12 million.

This one will go the full 15 rounds. Jim Hunt is a classy boxer, and if anyone can beat Jesse, he's it. He can pile up points with some well-timed combinations to Jesse's soft under-belly—his record and his failure to achieve much of anything for North Carolina except embarrassing publicity and the rep he's got for swinging at the defenseless—like the poor.

As of now, call this one a toss-up, with fair chance for a change of title.

Good opportunity to add one to Dem column.

► Texas—Typically, a donnybrook, and one of the big ones November 6. Defending GOP title-holder John Tower retires undefeated, leaving field wide open. Rugged preliminary bouts on each team will be settled May 5 or, if no one scores enough points for a decision then, in a June 2 play-off to see which two square off November 6.

Three Democrats throwing punches to see who survives: Former Rep. Robert Krueger, who came within an ace of dethroning Tower in 1978 Senate fight; progressive State Sen. Lloyd Doggett; Boll Weevil entry Rep. Kent Hance, who fights for the GOP side more often than for his own.

Even bigger intra-squad melee on GOP team. Rep. Phil (The Snitch) Gramm heads field of four. Smart money says he'll win rough and tumble fight to be finalist. Phil wore colors of Dem team for years but wasn't loved by mates. Snitched on their ring strategy in major budget battle with Reagan forces, lost status and jumped camp, making himself official Republican after years as unofficial Republican.

Chance for Dems to gain ground but tea leaves still swirling and hard to read.

► Iowa—GOP's Roger Jepsen now holds crown, but "uneasy lies the head" etc. It's his first defense since taking over six years ago.

Not known as cleverest scrapper in Senate, but not to be taken lightly, either. Has strong, well-heeled managerial team of right-hand swingers who'll see he gets whatever money he needs for battle.

A bit clumsy in the ring, but sometimes it's the clumsy ones who are hard to nail.

Tough challenger in Rep. Tom Harkin with skein of five straight wins for U.S. House and good form in the ring. Can score tellingly against Jepsen on basis of farm discontent with GOP and with straight shots to Jepsen record which ranks right up there (or down there) with Jesse Helms.'

Another one too early to call, but opportunity knocks for Dems.

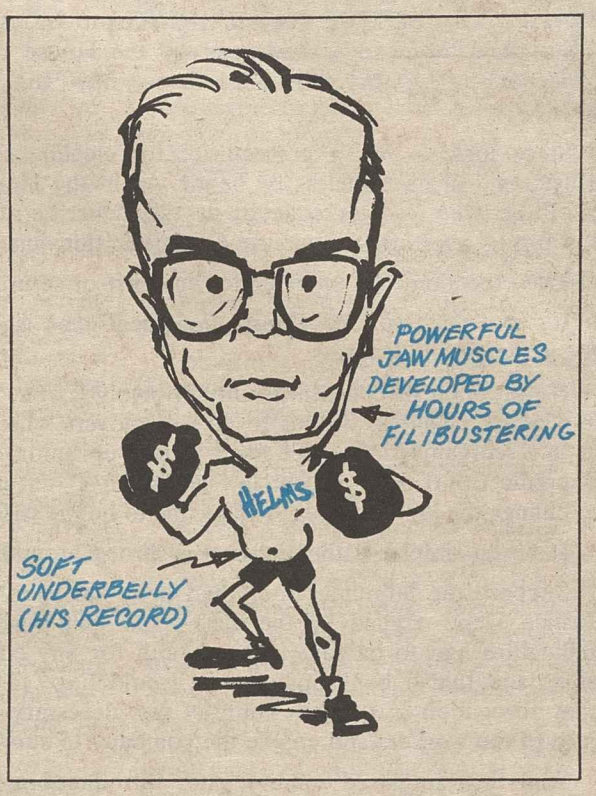
► New Hampshire—Another real rumble. Putting his title on the line for first time—he won it in 1978—is GOP's Gordon Humphrey. Same style fighter as Helms, Jepsen, Gramm—maybe a little slow of foot, but has been careful to pay some attention to home-state fans.

Looking to grab the championship belt is Rep. Norm D'Amours, a solid journeyman fighter with five wins in a row for U.S. House. Like most others in Dem stripes, D'Amours goes into ring facing long odds in that increasingly important aspect of the fight game, money to reach the fans with.

Right now? Flip a coin.

► Others to watch—Plenty of other good match-ups to keep your eye on—but hold all bets.

Dems face hard battles to hold titles in Massachusetts, Michigan, Montana, West Virginia. Bay State's Sen. Paul Tsongas forced to step down for health reasons. Top fighters in elimination series in both parties to see who goes for crown in November. West Virginia's long-time champ Jennings Randolph hangs up gloves. Two strong hitters collide to succeed him, both popular with fans—present Gov. Jay Rockefeller (D) vs. GOP's ex-Gov. Arch Moore.



Solid Dem team members Carl Levin (Mich.) and Max Baucus (Mont.) will encounter foes who'll get heaps of help from Jesse Helms' and Phil Gramm's right-wing money players.

Potential soft spots for GOP where Dem challengers have shot at crown are Illinois, Minnesota, Virginia, title-holders respectively Charles Percy, Rudy Boschwitz, John Warner.

Summing up—Dems face uphill struggle for Senate team victory big enough to control the ring for next couple of years. With a few breaks, several GOPers there for the taking. But Dems have to be on toes, make sure no one sneaks up behind and clobbers them.

With 33 separate bouts slated, Dems need to win 20 for King of the Ring status, a 61 percent victory record. High, but not beyond reach.

What They're Saying

Columnist Ellen Goodman, Boston Globe:

"If pessimism was an Olympic event," he (President Reagan) said, "they'd (Democrats) win a gold medal for sure."

There you had it in a sentence. Ronald Reagan, the upbeat, irrepressible, even cockeyed optimist in the White House was casting his opponents in the unenviable role of pessimists.

The fact that Reagan has pulled it off so far and has made his critics seem naysaying nit-pickers is one of the great scams of the era. . . .

At times he may seem vulnerable to opponents. This president has the gall to criticize the budget deficit that he multiplied. He can run against the big government that he leads. He can make the rich richer and then accuse the Democrats of making "an appeal to greed and envy" among the poor. He is wonderfully, breathtakingly unencumbered by facts. He should be an easy target.

But his awesome, unflagging cheer is hard to penetrate. Optimism is his Gardol shield against criticism; optimism is the reason why so many Americans have granted him immunity from responsiblity. He is the anchor of National Happy Talk News.

The president's chief weapon is the simple repeated assertion that America is standing taller, bigger, better, stronger than ever. His opponents are forced to counter the good-news-monger with tales of weaknesses and pictures of wounds. They have to put the hunched, the hurt, the unemployed, the poor on display. They present charts and forecasts of economic or nuclear disaster. In short, they play the role of a nattering nabob of negativism. Worse yet, they nag. . . .

Every reporter who has exposed Reagan in a state of flagrant misinformation is used to being accused of nit-picking. The president says that the homeless choose to live on the streets, and reporters find the chosen people in cardboard boxes on city streets. Nit-picking. The president changes policy in Lebanon, and the news analysts point out the contradictions. Nit-picking. The president says the economy is booming, and the newspaper shows that the middle class is shrinking. Nit-picking. . . .

Ronald Reagan frustrates those who believe in reason. He behaves as president the way he behaved as a sports-caster in Iowa inventively recreating baseball games. He is less interested in facts than in the flow. He talks in slogans and bumper stickers. . . .

It's tough to counter slogans with position papers. It's toughest of all to counter an optimist without sounding like a pessimist. In presidential politics, there isn't any silver medal. Maybe the main event this year ought to be a triathlon for realism.

Word Games

"The Democrats use foggy language like 'recovering revenue' or 'stopping the revenue drain,' but you don't need a Ph.D. in bureaucracy to know what they're offering: A choice between a tax increase, a tax increase and a tax increase." (Note: A tax increase on corporations and wealthy individuals, by the way.)

—President Reagan 3/3/84

(This is same President who described tax increases his administration promoted 16 months ago as "revenue enhancement.")

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Labor's candidate

Democrats pressed on platform keyed to full employment

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called on the Democratic Party to build its election-year platform on a foundation of full employment.

After a three-year battering by the Reagan Administration, "American workers are looking to the Democratic Party for a redress of grievances," AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons said.

Lyons, the president of the Iron Workers, is a cochair of the Democratic Party Platform Committee. He presented an overview of labor's concerns at its organization meeting in Washington.

Under President Reagan, more than 30 million American families have suffered unemployment "that could have been prevented and should have been combatted and alleviated," Lyons said.

He spoke of the damage to the American fabric from the Reagan Administration's pattern of favoritism to the wealthiest and charged the Democrats to restore balance to government.

"The Democratic Party has been most successful when it has been most inclusive," and when it has "worked hardest to guarantee equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity," Lyons stressed.

The AFL-CIO will spell out the details of labor's program for America over the next few months, when the Platform Committee will be holding regional meetings across America. The committee will then draft the platform proposal that will be put before the Democratic National Convention in July.

Winning platform

Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro (D-N.Y.), who heads the committee, urged a platform "that Democrats can run on and win on."

Lyons told the committee that jobs are the single most important issue in the 1984 elections. Under Reagan, lost wages came to $336 billion and lost production to $950 billion.

Along with their jobs, he testified, nearly 11 million families lost their health insurance coverage and 494,000 families lost their homes through foreclosure. Some 73,000 small businesses were forced into bankruptcy and tens of thousands of farm families have been driven from the land.

A Democratic platform must be concerned with the poor, both working and non-working, Lyons said.

Child nutrition programs have been cut, job training reduced, "a million needy persons have been stripped of every penny in food stamp assistance" and four million more had benefits slashed, he charged.

Lyons testified to the labor movement's outrage at Reagan's "packing the National Labor Relations Board with lifelong advocates of management" and filling the Civil Rights Commission and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission "with people who see no virtue in affirmative action and no harm in inequality."

He reiterated labor's support of the Equal Rights Amendment and the principle of "comparable pay for jobs of comparable worth."

House rebuffs Reagan on disability insurance

The House voted 410-1 for a labor-supported, Administration-opposed bill to protect persons receiving social security disability benefits from being unjustly dropped from the program.

A disability review process intended to save money by identifying persons no longer eligible for benefits was so brutally conducted during the first years of the Reagan Administration that Congress rebelled.

Hundreds of thousands of persons were dropped from the program by state review panels—and two-thirds of those who went through a federal appeals process were eventually reinstated.

Shocking purge

Even more shocking than the purge of physically handicapped men and women was the cutoff of benefits to mentally impaired persons who were dropped because they did not reply to an official notice or fill out a required form.

The Administration now promises to do better—but only Rep. Philip Crane (R-Ill.) had enough confidence in the promise to vote against the bill.

As passed by the House and sent to the Senate, the legislation would prohibit disqualification from benefits unless one of the following conditions were met:

- The beneficiary is currently working at a regular job.
- The original determination of disability was clearly in error or fraudulent.
- The beneficiary's medical condition has improved so that he or she can perform regular work.
- New evidence, such as a new diagnosis shows the impairment to be less severe than originally thought.

The bill also specifies that the combined effect of all of a person's impairments be taken into account in determining disability, even if none of the impairments by itself would meet the standard.

It further imposes a moratorium on review of disability cases involving persons with mental impairments until the Social Security Administration establishes new criteria. No such benefits could be terminated without review by a psychiatrist or psychologist.

The legislation gives persons receiving a preliminary notice of disqualification from a state agency the right to a face-to-face interview. And if disqualification is ordered at the state level, a recipient who appeals the ruling to a federal administrative law judge will continue to receive payments until the case is decided. Benefits received during an unsuccessful appeal would have to be repaid to the government except where hardship can be shown.

ILG to challenge new exemption for home knitting

The Ladies' Garment Workers will seek an injunction to prevent Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan from lifting a 40-year ban against industrial homework in the knitted outerwear industry in defiance of a federal appeals court order.

ILGWU Chief Counsel Max Zimny charged that Donovan's latest effort to promulgate regulations that would permanently lift the homework restrictions "clearly violates" last November's ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The ILGWU was joined by the Clothing & Textile Workers and major apparel companies in challenging Donovan's first attempt to lift the ban. The appeals court

Basis for union support

Mondale's agenda for America

A decisive factor in organized labor's support of Walter F. Mondale's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination was his firmness in taking positions on bedrock issues that effect the quality of life for working people and their families.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates, before endorsing Mondale, looked closely at his policies, examining not only what he has said, but also what he has done—and at his specific ideas for the future of the nation under his leadership.

What labor found was a candidate with a strong allegiance to the goals of working people—and with a record of public service to back it up.

The AFL-CIO's analysis of Mondale's record brings him into sharp contrast with President Reagan—both in philosophy and in action—on the issues that deeply concern workers and their families.

That agenda ranges from the critical need to rebuild the nation's industrial base, to the economic health of both cities and farmlands, the fading dream of home ownership, the affordability of health care and education, a safe workplace, a clean and healthy environment and protection from the economic havoc wreaked by plant closings.

The damage already done to the quality of life in America under the Reagan Administration—and the prospect of more of the same if Reagan has a second term—led to the AFL-CIO's early endorsement of Mondale as a proven ally of workers who shares their view of America's future needs.

One threat to that future is the erosion of the nation's "infrastructure"—roads, bridges, water supply and waste treatment systems, railroads and other public facilities.

The AFL-CIO supports programs and funding to get the rebuilding effort started quickly in both urban and rural areas.

The Reagan Administration, however, has attacked and cut the federal programs to do the job, gutting a range of community development, economic development and environmental programs and the agencies that once administered them.

In their place, President Reagan proposes "enterprise zones" which translate into big tax giveaways to business, takeaways of wage and job protections for workers and fewer public services for communities.

Kirkland to Hart: 'We're not buying it'

Address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Convention in Pittsburgh, Mar. 27, 1984.

We are here to affirm the right and the duty of working people to play a strong role in the decisions of their party and in the political life of their country.

We not only have that solemn right and duty; we have no real choice but to do this. If there is one thing that we have learned from the experience of the last three years, it is that all we have gained, through a century of struggle, can be stripped away by the raw political power of the forces arrayed against working people.

Yet that right is under a searching challenge today, at this critical moment in our history.

It has been challenged by the Reagan Administration—an administration that has made workers and their organizations prime targets and victims of its policies and practices. Those policies have served the avarice of a narrow predatory class at the expense of the people at large, and most particularly, working people. They have sought to weaken and destroy wherever they can the trade union organizations that workers have created for their defense and for the forceful expression of their aspirations. By creating a standing army of the unemployed, they have sought to divide and conquer the workforce, set worker against worker, and undermine their wages, standards and conditions of life.

Even beyond that, they have ruthlessly exploited the fact that capital is mobile and flagless, while labor is not—labor is and must be loyal to its country, its community and its flag—to export our jobs and import the products of the brutal exploitation of the most wretched on earth.

Stranglehold of deficits

And, by dissipating the resources of the public through extravagant handouts to the rich, they have brought forth staggering deficits to strangle the future and breed the disease they count upon to cause the crib-death of progress and change for years to come.

I, for one, am intensely proud of the fact that, during this entire bleak period, the labor movement—battered and defamed as we have been—never sought a separate peace for the sake of any special interest. Rather, labor has been the one steadfast rallying point of resistance to Reagan reaction and of dauntless affirmation of the goals of a humane society, in the public interest.

Our participation in this campaign to nominate a champion to challenge those policies and to spare this country from four more ruinous years of Reaganism is a further affirmation of that role and that responsibility. We have earned that role. We have earned that right by standing fast and fighting while the Gary Harts of this world were submitting to the "mandate" and yielding to the program of Ronald Reagan.

We have united, in the exercise of that right and the discharge of that responsibility, in support of the one candidate who can squarely stand and fight for what we believe in, the man who believes in what his party has represented in its winning years, the one man who can beat Ronald Reagan—Walter F. Mondale.

Turncoat politics

His most conspicuous opponent, who sought our support and didn't get it, has reacted with sour grapes and the use of code words to smear the role of labor in this campaign. Evidently, he believes that he can convince Democrats that the way to win in November is to appeal to anti-labor Independents and crossover Republicans.

In certain haunts of the Smart Set, this is now called "neo-liberalism." I'll tell you what neo-liberalism is. It's a little bit of watered down conservatism, laced with a slug of old-fashioned isolationism. Call it

Lane Kirkland addresses delegates to the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention.

"new" and "improved" and you can sell it like Cool-Whip, or so the hucksters say.

Have you ever noticed on television how the weaker and more insipid a product is, the more they plug it as "new" and "improved?"

Well, we don't have that kind of neo-jerk reflex, so we're not buying it. We'll take our liberalism straight. We'll take it Fritz Mondale's way.

Mr. Hart offers himself as the spokesman of the younger generation. Yet, he is for a youth subminimum wage, the exclusion of all the young workers in the fast-food chains from OSHA protection against burning grease and slippery floors, and a step-up in interest payments on college loans. So is old Ronald Reagan.

He's against legislation to keep jobs here in the United States. So is Ronald Reagan.

He's for a national sales or "consumption tax." We can get that from Ronald Reagan.

He claims to love working people, but he insults their organizations. So does Ronald Reagan.

He wants to "restructure" social security. Well, so does Ronald Reagan.

Presidents have come a very long way since George Washington.

George Washington couldn't tell a lie. Richard Nixon couldn't tell the truth. Ronald Reagan can't tell the difference. We had a President, Gerald Ford, who told New York City to drop dead.

Anti-worker vote on bail-out

Now we have a candidate for President, Gary Hart, who told Chrysler workers to drop dead. If anybody else gets in trouble in this country, they'd better not count on him. That would be "ad hoc" and, as Nixon used to say, that would be wrong.

His is NOT the path to victory in November.

You cannot beat Reagan with just a little bit of Reaganism. We don't need a choice, in November, between two Liberaces at the same piano. For the working people of this country, that's a sure loser.

Talking "Newspeak" and throwing the historic goals of the Democratic Party down the 1984 memory hole is not the way to win in November.

Dividing Democrats by generations and appealing to the narcissism and retarded adolescence of the "me" generation is not the way to win in November, or I hope to God it's not. To Mr. Hart, we should say—at long last, be your age. Peter Pan politics is passé. It's been done and overdone. It was tried and it didn't work. That is not the way to win in November.

The way to win is with a candidate who will challenge Ronald Reagan head on, all the way. The way to win is with a candidate who will fight, like Harry Truman, for the values his party stands for, for the enduring values and hopes of all generations, with malice toward none. The way to win is with a candidate who can count upon the enthusiastic support of the working people of this country who represent the bedrock strength of the Democratic Party, that the Democratic Party has never won an election without.

The way to win is with a fighting candidate who can clearly define the real difference between the parties and who can bring all good Democrats back to their natural home. That candidate is Walter F. Mondale.

Fritz Mondale is not some synthetic Masked Marvel or Mystery Man. He is not made of silicon and microchip flakes. He is made of flesh and blood and brains.

We know where he stands and what he really believes—yesterday, today and tomorrow.

Labor's 'special interest' demands

Some have asked publicly, in tones of snide accusation, what we will demand of a Mondale Administration elected with labor's support. I have answered that before and I will answer it again here and now:

We shall demand that he uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that he bear true faith and allegiance to the same, that he well and faithfully discharge the duties of the Office of President of the United States, with particular reference to that section of the Constitution that requires our government to provide for the common defense and for the general welfare—including that of working people.

We have one more outrageous "special interest" demand—that he breathe real life into the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag of the United States; that this nation shall become, in truth, one nation under God, indivisible with liberty and justice for all—including working people.

That is all. We have asked for nothing more, and we have been promised nothing more. The rest is trust—trust in a man whose entire record of public service has proved him worthy of that trust.

Ours is the real rainbow coalition, as labor always is and must be.

We stand today at the beginning of a crucial election year, and of a new chapter in the long history of our movement. What we do now, or fail to do, will largely determine where America is going for the remainder of this century.

Adversity breeds strength

We never thought it would be easy sailing. Labor has seldom had easy sailing. But we are at our best in hard weather. Adversity separates the easy riders from those who really care; those who can perform from the opportunists and the kibitzers.

I believe that soon we shall be able to say to those who scoffed and stood aside in this effort what, in times of yore, a king of France said to a faint-hearted absent warrior, after a victorious struggle for liberty—"Go and hang yourself, brave Crillon—we fought and won at Arc, and you were not there!"

The size of the challenge is matched by the scale of the opportunity, and we have in our hands one of those rare opportunities to make a very big difference in the shape of things to come.

Let us pledge to each other, here and now, that this will be one of those great times in our history—at which our children and our successors will one day look back and say:

No matter what the odds or the setbacks, they fought for what they believed. They did not run; they did not hide; they did not quit; they did their duty, and together they forced open the door to a better world, for all God's children.

NLRB policy upheld

Supreme Court backs union contract rights

The Supreme Court refused to tamper with a long-standing National Labor Relations Board policy that an individual worker who exercises a right provided by union contract is engaged in "concerted activity" and that employer retaliation against the worker therefore is an unfair labor practice.

The 5-4 decision involved a truck driver who refused to drive a vehicle that he had reasonable grounds for considering unsafe.

Although the worker did not cite his Teamsters contract provision in refusing to take out the truck, his action was clearly covered by a clause specifying that "the employer shall not require employees to take out on the streets or highways any vehicle that is not in safe operating condition."

Despite the contract language, City Disposal Systems, Inc., a Detroit trash hauling firm, treated the driver's action as a "voluntary quit," in effect firing him.

Precedent cited

The NLRB upheld an unfair labor practice charge brought by the worker, relying on its so-called "Interboro doctrine," named for a 1966 precedent which held that an employee who asserts a right embodied in a union contract is engaged in "concerted" activity because the contract itself is the product of group activity.

The U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the NLRB's reasoning and the doctrine on which it was based. There was no evidence that the employee "asserted an interest on behalf of anyone other than himself," the appellate court had ruled. "An individual does not act in concert with himself."

In the subsequent Supreme Court review, the AFL-CIO filed a brief supporting the position taken by the NLRB. While no AFL-CIO affiliate was involved, the federation told the Supreme Court that all union members have an important stake in the question at issue—whether "an individual employee's honest and reasonable assertion of a right that is provided for in a collective bargaining agreement is concerted activity protection by Sec. 7 of the National Labor Relations Act."

"When workers join together, form a labor union, and engaged in collective bargaining, they fundamentally transform the nature of the employment relationship from an individual to a collective one," the AFL-CIO brief asserted.

The doctrine that claiming a right assured by a collective agreement is an extension of the concerted actions involved in creating that agreement advances the purpose of federal labor law, the AFL-CIO contended.

The majority decision upholding that viewpoint was written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., joined by Justices Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun and John Paul Stevens. The other justices joined in the dissent by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

In another area, the Supreme Court granted the request of the National Labor Relations Board and dismissed a case involving a policy the board's Reagan-appointed majority has now reversed.

The case that the Supreme Court had accepted for review was based on a ruling that verbal threats made during a strike but unaccompanied by any hostile acts were not grounds for denial of reinstatement to a striker.

Since then, the NLRB has switched to a position that a striker may be denied reinstatement if he or she had engaged in "misconduct," even if merely verbal, that in a strike situation "may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate" an employee into joining the strike or respecting the union's picket line.

The Supreme Court vacated an appellate court decision that went against the NLRB's prior position and sent the case back to the labor board for reconsideration.

Rep. Geraldine Ferraro, presiding at Democratic platform hearings, welcomes testimony from AFL-CIO Vice President John Lyons.

Jobs, justice urged as basis for Democratic platform

cal hazards as a result of the Reagan Administration's downgrading of health and safety standards, Lyons charged. And much of the $750 billion in "Reagan tax giveaways" has been used "to finance corporate cannibalism" that has "concentrated more and more resources in fewer and fewer hands."

In world trade, Lyons said, America needs a policy that recognizes the need to maintain a strong, diversified economy.

Human rights should again be "the guiding principle of our relations with other countries," Lyons urged. "National defense must be aimed at avoiding confrontations, rather than seeking them out. The burden of defense must be shared with our allies, and its costs must be shared by the rich as well as by those who are least able to pay."

A Democratic platform should address the shrinkage in purchasing power of the minimum wage, Lyons reminded the committee. And an urgent job for a new Democratic Administration will be to rebuild morale among federal employees.

For most Americans, "life revolves around work," Lyons noted. So the key issue on the Democratic agenda "is the issue of jobs," he stressed, "not as a plank but as the foundation of our platform."

Candidates stump big delegate states

The hotly contested battle for the Democratic presidential nomination switched to New York, where 229 of the state's 285 convention delegates will be elected in the Apr. 3 primary, and to Pennsylvania, where 156 of the state's 195 delegates will be chosen one week later.

All three candidates came into New York with a share of delegates chosen in the previous week's round of caucuses and primaries.

Walter F. Mondale maintained his clear lead in elected delegates with a decisive win in Sen. Gary Hart's native state of Kansas and a probable plurality of delegates chosen in Virginia caucuses.

Hart was the winner in Montana caucuses, where 25 delegates were at stake, and completed a sweep of New England with his victory in the Connecticut primary.

And Jesse Jackson made a strong showing in Virginia where he and Mondale were just about tied in votes cast at the state's caucuses. After Ohio Sen. John Glenn dropped out of the race, Virginia Gov. Charles S. Robb sought an uncommitted slate, but few voters went along with him.

Hart's salvage of the Montana caucus ended a dry spell of nine consecutive losses in primaries and caucuses.

The restrictions of federal election law limits on primary campaign spending caused the Mondale campaign to husband its resources, relying on organization and volunteers in states where relatively few delegates were at stake. The Hart campaign, which spent little in the early days of his candidacy because it had little money to spend, has been able to pump money raised after Hart's upset victory in New Hampshire into a heavy television campaign.

In Kansas, a national political reporter noted, Hart mounted "a media blitz the likes of which Kansas had never seen in a Democratic presidential nomination contest." But victory still went to Mondale, who was credited with the better organization.

New York is second only to California in the number of convention delegates to be chosen, and all three candidates look to increase their delegate count.

With nearly 40 percent of the delegates chosen, Mondale had 698 pledged delegates as he went into the New York primary, according to a United Press International tally. Hart was credited with 428 and Jackson with 88 — not counting 35 votes for delegates aligned with Chicago Mayor Harold Washington.

Mondale agenda addresses key labor concerns

In contrast, Mondale strongly supports programs to restore the infrastructure along with urban and rural programs aimed at rebuilding the nation's strong economic base.

The AFL-CIO also backs a comprehensive national transportation policy that would insure the system's strength and the continued availability of all forms of transportation to citizens, business and industry and both urban and rural communities.

The Reagan Administration has slashed funding for transportation programs, ignored the chaos created by deregulation and mounted an active campaign to destroy safety standards and other protections for transportation workers.

Mondale, in comparison, has pledged strong government support of programs to rebuild the transportation system.

Many workers and their communities have already felt the devastating losses of jobs, income, stability and public resources that come from corporate or government decisions to close or relocate plants.

The AFL-CIO supports passage of plant closing laws requiring both private and public employers to recognize their responsibilities to workers and their communities before they shut down.

Mondale is already on record on the issue. While he was a U.S. senator, he sponsored plant closing legislation that paralleled reforms sought by labor.

Mondale's record also is clear on occupational safety and health. Throughout his career, he has been labor's solid ally in seeking workplace protection, and he has pledged to continue that alliance.

Beyond the workplace, the future is clouded for many workers and their families by the sky-high interest rates produced by Reagan policies. These rates have put home ownership beyond the reach of many middle-income Americans. And many jobless workers have suffered or face mortgage foreclosure and the loss of their homes.

Budget cuts

For the elderly, minorities, and low-income people, the Reagan Administration's housing budget cuts mean that not enough shelter is being built to meet their needs.

The AFL-CIO has called for credit controls to help keep mortgage rates down, relief from mortgage foreclosures for the jobless, and government assistance in building housing for the needy.

In his policies, Mondale stresses the link between the Reagan budget deficits and interest rates and their impact on home ownership and on construction employment. He proposes controlling the deficit through genuine tax reforms and a more moderate growth in defense spending.

The AFL-CIO and Walter Mondale also agree that the raging inflation in health care costs jeopardizes the ability of many Americans to pay for health services for themselves and their families.

An upward explosion in premiums for private health insurance plans has prompted employers to demand takeaways to trim costs. And millions of jobless workers have lost coverage for themselves and their families.

The Reagan Administration's budget cuts have added to the crisis by reducing health services for the elderly, the poor and other disadvantaged Americans, and the Administration is eyeing even deeper cuts in the Medicare system.

The Administration's "blame the victim" answer to high health insurance premiums is a plan to tax workers on the benefits they receive.

Mondale, in contrast, actively supports cost containment legislation to slow the increases in hospital costs and doctors' fees. He has offered a program to prevent the collapse of the Medicare system without hurting beneficiaries, and supports a comprehensive national health insurance.

Today, workers are also worried about the health of the nation's educational system.

Among the challenges the system faces are the need for higher educational and teaching standards, access to education for every student, more classrooms and essential courses, and adequate teacher salaries.

While all education costs are going up, the price of higher education is particularly straining many family budgets.

Educational approach

The Reagan Administration has gutted federal education programs, including putting sharp restrictions on student aid. As a program, Reagan offers only tuition tax credits to reduce the cost of private school education at the expense of public schools.

Mondale sees eye to eye with organized labor on the need for a federal role to restore and strengthen student aid programs and insure that schools have the facilities, funds and staff needed to teach. He also backs program to provide scholarships to attract talented students in to teaching. Mondale is on record opposing tuition tax credits while favoring measures to assure that private as well as public school students share in a variety of other federal programs.

AFL-CIO team finds Salvadoran voters persistent

By James M. Shevis

Despite some confusion due to a new voting system, El Salvador's presidential election reflected a "sincere and energetic desire" on the part of the Salvadorans to resolve the country's social and economic problems, a team of AFL-CIO observers declared.

"We found the main motivations among the many voters that we interviewed to be a belief in the democratic process, the hope that elections hold out for the future of El Salvador, and a commitment to the future of a democratic electoral system," the team said in a statement.

Headed by Federation Vice President Frank Drozak, the team went to El Salvador to observe the election at the invitation of two large Salvadoran labor federations.

William C. Doherty, Jr., a member of the team that talked with voters in rural and urban areas of the country, said:

"We were absolutely amazed at the patience of the Salvadoran people, and their love of democracy. Some stood in line as much as six hours to vote, and were content to do so to make their ballot count." He said he observed "no duress whatsoever" in the first-round voting.

While there was no official tally of the election polls, a government official estimated that 1.4 million of 1.8-million eligible voters cast ballots.

Official tally

An official tally is not expected until early April, but Christian Democrat Jose Napoleon Duarte was reported to have won more than 45 percent of the vote with almost all districts reporting. Roberto d'Aubuisson, the Nationalist Republican Alliance candidate, drew about 30 percent and the National Conciliation Party's Francisco Jose Guerrero, 19 percent.

Since neither Duarte, a moderate, nor d'Aubuisson, a militant right-winger, had an absolute majority, a runoff election must take place within 30 days of the official announcement of the final count.

Doherty, who is executive director of the federation's American Institute for Free Labor Development, said he was not sure whether the AFL-CIO team would return for the runoff election. Other members of the unit were Eugenia Kemble, special assistant to Teachers President Albert Shanker, and Jesse Friedman, an assistant to Doherty.

Neither the AFL-CIO team nor the Popular Democratic Unity (UPD), the political arm of the 500,000-member Salvadoran trade union movement, reported any pressure or intimidation at the polling places. Both said that many people were unable to vote because of the new voting system, and that guerrillas made open attempts to disrupt the election.

"From observation alone, we have drawn no clear conclusions about other abnormalities in the system that might have caused distorted results," the AFL-CIO team said. "Even though no such additional problems were apparent, we believe that further examination of the entire process is necessary before any decisive conclusions can be drawn."

Guerrilla efforts to sabotage the voting included the confiscation of identity cards, the kidnapping of voters, theft of ballot boxes, electrical power blackouts and disruption of public transportation.

The confusion, frustration and disorganization inherent in the country's new voting system appeared to affect voters of all three main political parties, the AFL-CIO observers noted.

Polling problems

"Many spent inordinate amounts of time looking for their proper polling place," the team reported. "Others, even after an extensive search, found no polling place to match their identification card numbers, or discovered that their names did not appear on the voter registration list."

Similar problems were reported by other observer groups, including an official U.S. observation team. Yet, the UPD stressed, "the good will of the people overcame many difficult situations and votes were cast in the full knowledge that these votes were necessary for preserving democracy in El Salvador."

Strategies for job safety

Strong coalitions of unions, environmentalists and other community groups can fight damage done by the Reagan Administration to worker safety and health and environmental regulations, Dr. Eula Bingham stressed at a briefing at the Auto Workers' offices in Washington. Bingham headed the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in the Carter Administration. The briefing was sponsored by the Urban Environment Conference.

Action of former OSHA director aided building firm that hired him

By Arlee C. Green

Thorne G. Auchter, former administrator of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, directly interceded in quashing $12,600 in penalties and proposed citations against the B. B. Andersen Construction Co., Inc., of which he will become president. Auchter also reprimanded the regional OSHA administrator handling the case, and eventually forced him from office.

Auchter's involvement is contained in court records of an appeal of a petition for a declaratory judgment against the Secretary of Labor, brought by the construction firm.

Auchter denied any link between his intercession in the case and his new job with the Andersen companies. He resigned from OSHA, effective Mar. 30, to head B. B. Andersen Cos., a group of construction companies based in Topeka, Kan.

In a statement, Auchter said, "It's absurd to say there is any connection between that incident three years ago and my acceptance only this month" of the company presidency.

In April 1981, OSHA inspectors, acting on a worker complaint, got an administrative warrant to inspect an Arkansas City, Kan., construction site where Andersen was building a high school. The two-day inspection, carried out over the verbal objections of company supervisors, found 10 "serious" and two "willful" violations of OSHA standards for which fines of $12,600 were levied.

OSHA Regional Administrator Vernon A. Strahm was reprimanded by Auchter for the actions of his inspectors.

Before OSHA could issue the citations, Andersen attacked the agency on two fronts. It filed a suit in U.S. District Court in Wichita, challenging the legality of the inspections, and later urged Rep. George V. Hansen (R-Idaho), leader of the "Stop OSHA Movement," to help get the agency off the company's back.

Hansen wrote Auchter demanding that "you look into this matter with a view toward correcting the injustice to the Andersen Co." Auchter dropped the penalties and proposed citations, and the federal court then dismissed Andersen's case. The company's motion for a new trial was denied, so it appealed to the U.S. 10th Circuit Court of Appeals, which eventually upheld the lower court.

Record of resistance

Andersen has refused OSHA access to its worksites since November 1980—shortly after the Supreme Court ruled in Marshall vs. Barlows, Inc., that the job safety agency cannot conduct inspection under certain circumstances without a search warrant.

The appeals court ruling cited an affidavit filed by John B. Miles, Jr., OSHA director of field coordination, which said that although OSHA deemed "the actions taken were legally proper and notwithstanding the extreme gravity of the violations which were discovered in the inspection, the appearance of impropriety and the agency's long-term interest of promoting good working relationships with employers caused OSHA to decide not to issue the citations."

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, charged that the "dropping citations against employers is not isolated. Auchter's enforcement record shows that from the time he came in, there was an immediate drop off in citations and penalties."

Seminario questioned Auchter's propriety in lifting Andersen's $12,600 fine. She also questioned OSHA's failure to follow up on the worker complaint.

She also scored the "degree to which this Administration bends over backward to cooperate with employers," adding, "I've seen no demonstration of care or consideration for workers under Auchter's three years as OSHA's administrator."

Strahm, the regional OSHA administrator, was subsequently given the option of retiring from the agency or taking demotion and reassignment. He said he feels the agency's action was due in part to the Andersen incident. He retired in May 1982 at age 50, after 29 years of government service.

An OSHA press aide said Strahm violated federal hiring regulations. "Strahm and another regional administrator hired employees in one place and transferred them to another," he said.

The other administrator was Curtis A. Foster, head of OSHA in Denver. Foster said Auchter offered him the same option as Strahm. Foster appealed to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan and was then offered a lesser demotion. His appeal to the Merit System Protection Board in September 1982 hasn't been resolved.

Foster termed the agency's performance under Auchter "extremely effective for the employer," while prior to that, it was "extremely effective for the employee."

Congress urged to ease curbs on pension investing

Legislation to make it easier for pension funds to invest in home mortgages was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. at House and Senate hearings.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine said rigid restrictions in the law governing investment of pension funds discourage mortgage investments that would bring a double bonus of expanded jobs and increased housing.

More pension funds could be made available for mortgages within the framework of prudent investment policies, he urged.

Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) in the Senate and Representatives Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) in the House have proposed a Residential Mortgage Investment Act to make the investment restrictions more flexible.

Georgine, who also testified in his role as chairman of the National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Plans, said the three-year slump from which the housing industry is just starting to recover "would have been substantially softened . . . if pension plans had been able to more freely invest in residential mortgages."

At the hearings, the Labor Dept. testified that it supports the "objective" of the legislation but doesn't think any change in the law is necessary to enable pension funds to invest in mortgages.

410-1 House vote rebuffs Reagan on disability purge

The purge of disability rolls that aroused Congress with its injustices was carried out under a 1980 law that requires a review of disability insurance cases at least every three years.

In a letter to House members supporting the bill, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed the government's "obligation to protect the rights of disabled beneficiaries and to show the highest regard for fair treatment and due process."

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), speaking for passage, reminded his colleagues that "massive numbers of people have lost benefits even though they are disabled." He said court decisions have found present standards "cruel" and "inequitable."

The legislation also applies to cutoffs of benefits under the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) program that assists needy persons who are aged, blind or disabled.

CLUW delegates press strong political role for women workers

By Susan Dunlop

Chicago — The urgent need for all-out political action by women workers in 1984 set the tone for the 10th anniversary convention of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, where delegates endorsed a strong resolution slamming the Reagan Administration for policies that have destroyed decades of progress for workers, women, minorities, the elderly and the disadvantaged.

CLUW President Joyce Miller, in her report to the convention, was sharply critical of Reagan budget cuts in social services, education and affirmative action, and of its "drastic" pullbacks in programs meant "to assure justice, equal rights and equality."

Miller told the 1,300 delegates, alternates and observers that the "destruction" of the Civil Rights Commission is an example of the Administration's "disregard for women and minorities." She called the Administration's hints that it may intervene against women workers in the landmark Washington State pay equity case "deplorable."

"Many women are angry and frustrated," Miller warned, stressing that "their interests — particularly the Equal Rights Amendment and ending the nuclear arms race—have been thwarted by the Reagan Administration and Congress."

Matched goals

Women are "politically mature" and prepared "to take power into our own hands," Miller stressed, adding that women's "special interests" go hand in hand with those of the labor movement, including the goals of full employment, quality child care, affordable health care, concern for the elderly, education, equal opportunity, equity in hiring and pay and the desire for peace.

The growing political power and increasing anger of women could be the "decisive edge" in the 1984 elections, Miller said, observing that "union women most of all will make that difference."

Miller, who is an AFL-CIO vice president and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, asserted that in the decade since its founding, CLUW has met its responsibilities in expanding the voice of women workers not only within their unions, but in every aspect of society.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland praised CLUW in his convention address as "the leading advocate for advancing the cause of women workers in the workplace and within the labor movement.

Women can find "no stronger instrument than their unions" in their struggle for social and economic justice, he stressed in pledging "the full support and encouragement of the AFL-CIO" for CLUW.

First Lady candidate

Joan Mondale, wife of Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale, told the convention that CLUW, through its history, had not just "helped unions, you've run them; you haven't just polled your members on the key issues, you've taken them to the polls, and you haven't just requested equality and fairness in the workplace, you've fought for it."

Mondale called Reagan "the most anti-union president" in recent history, and she stressed that the key political challenge of 1984 is "to select a Democratic candidate who can defeat Ronald Reagan."

She said her husband was the candidate "best qualified" to challenge Reagan, and she called his "belief in a fair society" the "central' motive behind all his policies.

Delegates adopted 31 resolutions on a wide range of issues, including ratification of the ERA and action to assure equal rights for women, child care, pay equity, affirmative action, solidarity with South African black unionists, employment, organizing unorganized women, social security, training and industrial policy.

The convention called for a ban on "computer homework" — the practice of hiring clerical workers to perform office tasks on computers in their homes. The ban would parallel existing prohibitions on homework in other industries vulnerable to serious exploitation such as knitting.

All key CLUW officers were elected to two-year terms and Anna Padia of the Newspaper Guild was elected to her first term as a vice president.

More than 500 delegates joined in a demonstration organized by the Auto Workers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. at the Chicago headquarters of Materials Services Corp., a subsidiary of General Dynamics Corp. The UAW launched a corporate campaign to publicize the company's union-busting activities at its Electric Boat Division in Groton, Conn.

CLUW convention delegates led by President Joyce Miller join in a march to protest anti-union policies of General Dynamics Corp.

Real wages drop in February as retail price index edges up

Workers' real earnings—wages adjusted for the impact of inflation—fell three-tenths of 1 percent in February after rising in each of the two previous months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Over the year, real earnings were up 2.9 percent, yet were still below the 1979 level. Expressed in constant, uninflated 1977 dollars, real weekly earnings last month averaged $173.08. In February 1979, such earnings averaged $186.15.

BLS attributed last month's drop in earnings to a three-tenths of 1 percent decrease in average weekly hours worked and a one-tenth of 1 percent increase in its Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W.).

By another measure—the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U)—the February price rise was higher, four-tenths of 1 percent. CPI-W is used for indexing social security and some other federal payments, and is commonly used as an escalator in collective bargaining agreements.

Last month's one-tenth of 1 percent rise in CPI-W followed a five-tenths of 1 percent jump in January.

BLS said the slowdown in retail price increases was due largely to a smaller rise in grocery store food prices from January to February. Other contributing factors were declines in prices for clothing, gasoline and public transportation. However, increases in medical care and housing costs were larger than during most of 1983.

Heating oil costs shot up 6.9 percent in February and local telephone costs, still reflecting the separation of independent regional companies from the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., rose another 3 percent on top of January's record 8.5-percent increase.

Prices of food and beverages rose a seasonally adjusted six-tenths of 1 percent in February following a 1.5 percent jump the previous month. Smaller but still substantial increases in prices for meat, poultry, fish, eggs, fruits and vegetables accounted for over four-fifths of the February grocery store food increase, BLS said.

Medical care costs have begun to accelerate after a year of moderate increases. They rose nine-tenths of 1 percent in February after rising seven-tenths of 1 percent in January.

Painters board elects W.A. Duval, Raftery to retire

William A. Duval has been elected president of the Painters to succeed S. Frank Raftery, who announced his retirement for health reasons effective June 4.

Raftery has been president of the Painters since 1965 and has served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council since 1970.

Duval, 56, was elected by the union's executive board. He will stand for election for a full term as president at the union's August convention in Washington, D.C.

For the past 12 years, Duval has been the union's vice president for Canada and headed the IBPAT "autonomous" trades—paint makers, glazers, artistic painters and floor coverers.

Duval joined Local 1288 in San Jose, Calif., in 1947 and was elected local president in 1950 and business agent in 1953.

In 1967, Duval moved to the IBPAT headquarters as director of education, apprenticeship, and training. He was elected to the union's executive board in 1972.

ITU group resists Teamsters merger

Members of the Typographical Union have formed a committee to press for merger of the ITU with the Graphic Communications Union and avert an ITU move to the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The Merger Committee for One Big Union in the Printing Industry will be campaigning against votes for merger with the Teamsters in a referendum vote May 16. The committee is headed by Robert McMichen, winner of the popular vote in last year's contested election for ITU president.

The federation statement noted that incumbent ITU officers, who are "holding office under a disputed election, have rushed into an agreement with the Teamsters, while refusing seriously to consider merging" with the GCIU. Merger with GCIU would "substantially increase the bargaining power and the prospects for further employment of ITU members," the AFL-CIO said.

The statement stressed that the ITU executive council's haste in scheduling the merger to referendum on May 16 denies its members "the opportunity to weigh alternatives and decide whether the GCIU or the IBT can best serve their interests."

The final decision on merger rests with the ITU members, the statement said, adding: "We hope that they will reject this proposal which would deny them an opportunity to be part of one united force in the printing industry and would force their separation from the house of labor."

An ITU-IBT merger would entail separation of the ITU from the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labour Congress. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland suggested last October that a merger of the ITU and GCIU "is the best solution to the needs of the workers in this industry, which has been so dramatically impacted by new technology and automation." Merger of the ITU with the Teamsters would result in "immediate separation" of the ITU from the AFL-CIO, Kirkland said, and the CLC has said the same.

ITU officers met with GCIU leaders on several occasions to discuss merger. GCIU President Kenneth J. Brown, however, said he believes ITU's negotiating team was "aiming for affiliation with the Teamsters all along."

The ITU executive council notified Brown on Mar. 14 of its decision to "cease" merger talks with GCIU and "proceed" with discussions with the IBT. A week later, the Teamsters and the ITU announced jointly the executive council's approval of a merger document.

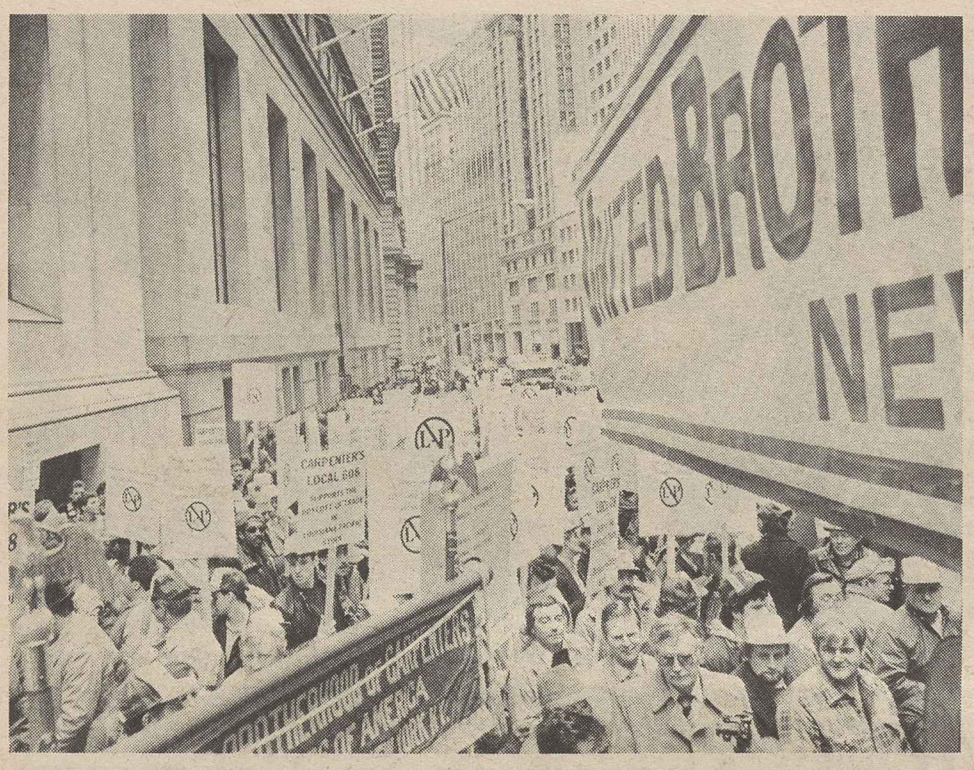
The ITU scheduled regional "mini-conventions" in Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Houston, San Francisco, Denver, Toronto, Washington, D.C., and Birmingham, Ala. to discuss the merger.

At a meeting of the ITU eastern conference in New York, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the printers he hoped they would vote down the Teamster proposal. Donahue said "better options are available which would better serve ITU members."

He said the federation was prepared to work with ITU members in the quest for one, merged union in the printing industry.

In the ITU election, McMichen outpolled incumbent President Joseph Bingel by nearly 5,000 votes. But the ITU referendum board, alleging violations of Labor Dept. rules governing union elections, voided the results of only the presidential contest in December and ordered a rerun election to be held later this year. A complaint McMichen filed with the Labor Dept. is being investigated by the Labor-Management Standards Administration.

The Merger Committee for One Big Printing Union has sent ITU members newsletters stressing the desirability of an ITU-GCIU merger. Pointing out the four successful mergers made by the unions comprising GCIU, the newsletter said an ITU-GCIU merger "would pay off not only at the bargaining table, but in the legislative arena, in organizing efforts and, when push comes to shove, on the picket lines." The committee also underscored that continued affiliation with the AFL-CIO and the CLC "would be guaranteed with the GCIU merger."



Message to Wall Street

Hundreds of union members throng Wall Street outside the New York Stock Exchange at a noontime rally dramatizing the boycott launched by the Carpenters and the Woodworkers against products of Louisiana-Pacific Corp. The workers took their case to the nation's financial hub to tell both consumers and the business community about the company's union-busting stance. The unions called for a boycott of L-P products after management rejected terms of a new industry-wide agreement and demanded stiff wage rollbacks and concessions. Workers have been on strike at 18 Louisiana-Pacific facilities in the Northwest since last June.

Marine Engineers gear up for wave of tough bargaining

San Francisco—This year's collective bargaining negotiations between the Marine Engineers and shipowners will probably be the toughest since 1923, MEBA President Jesse M. Calhoon told delegates to the union's convention.

Calhoon blamed both short-sighted management and an "oppressive bureaucracy" in government agencies for the anticipated difficulties in the negotiations for a new agreement to replace the three-year contract that expires June 15.

The news media tend to picture the problem as "seamen's wages," he said, but that is "unmitigated baloney." Wages have become such a small share of operating costs that their effect on competitive factors is almost nil, Calhoon charged.

In 1923, Calhoon recalled, the head of the War Shipping Board refused to turn back to private operation the ships used by the government during World War I unless a 15 percent pay cut was instituted. MEBA and other maritime unions conducted a bitter but unsuccessful strike, and it was 13 years before the unions were able to make a comeback on the merchant marine.

Fleet inefficiency

The American merchant marine, which has been shrinking continuously, consists mainly of "the wrong ships with the wrong engines," he told the convention. They are powered by "gas-guzzling steam turbines" instead of far more efficient diesel engines. The difference in fuel costs for a large modern cargo liner is nearly $3 million a year—"and that difference in the fuel costs is as much as the seamen's wages."

These inefficient fuel consumers are operated because the Navy tells the subsidized steamship lines that they want "small, fast, self-contained steam turbine ships"—which are not competitive in peacetime.

The 109-year-old union—which represents licensed marine engineers as well as many radio operators and deck officers—adopted a number of statements on U.S. maritime policy. It criticized the Coast Guard's practices on ship safety inspections and its life-saving functions for the merchant marine.

It charged the Navy with foot-dragging on "civilianization" of many functions that could be more economically performed by the merchant marine while allowing trained Navy personnel to concentrate on military activities. In another statement, the Maritime Administration was accused of failing to act on programs to aid the merchant marine.

In resolutions, the delegates called for support for the Jones Act, which preserves domestic shipping for American firms, and hailed congressional approval to bar the sale of Alaskan oil to Japan. The union hit a proposal to shift many costs of harbor maintenance to shipping firms, and urged Congress to take steps to help revitalize shipping on the Great Lakes.

The MEBA delegates gave full approval to a series of legal efforts against the Trinidad Corp., which it accused of trying to institute the same kind of "double-breasted" union-nonunion policies that have been instituted by some contractors in the construction industry to circumvent union agreements.

Brewery Local 9 votes to affiliate with UAW

Milwaukee—A 2,500-member brewery workers local representing mostly employees of the Miller Brewing Co., and Pabst Brewing Co., voted to affiliate with the Auto Workers.

Brewery Workers Local 9, a directly affiliated local union of the AFL-CIO since 1973, approved UAW affiliation by a vote of 746 to 437.

The local split from the Brewery Workers when the international union merged with the unaffiliated Teamsters 11 years ago.

On contract provisions

Bankruptcy reforms hit Senate roadblock

Labor's legislative battle to include collective bargaining safeguards in any bankruptcy legislation passed by Congress was at a temporary stalemate as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Key Senate Republicans in control of the scheduling of the bankruptcy bill had allied themselves to employer groups seeking to discard or drastically weaken the collective bargaining provisions the House approved.

Unions looked to the House to stand firm on the issue, one that has aroused the labor movement and brought a flood of mail and calls to congressional offices. In dispute is whether Congress will plug up a loophole in a 1978 bankruptcy law which the Supreme Court earlier this year ruled allowed employers to tear up union contracts if they seek reorganization under bankruptcy law.

Efforts to negotiate language in the Senate that would preserve the intent of the House provision has, thus far, been unsuccessful. Senate Labor Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), who is also a member of the Judiciary Committee, insisted on language that AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison termed "so weak as to be meaningless" along with a procedure for Senate floor action on the bill that would preclude further changes.

In response, the House Judiciary Committee voted to insist on a conference with the Senate if that body passes an unacceptable version of the bankruptcy bill.

With heavy time pressure to deal with the issue of tenure for bankruptcy judges by an Apr. 1 deadline, that was seen as the most likely parliamentary tool for getting the Senate to deal with a meaningful collective bargaining provision.

Some senators were discussing the possibility of a stopgap bill intended to keep the bankruptcy courts functioning another 30 days. But the legal status of such a measure appeared questionable.

If the bankruptcy issue is resolved, the House plans to turn to what is likely to be the first of heavily partisan battles over the budget.

The first step was taken by the Budget Committee, which adopted by a 19-9 vote along party lines a plan to match budget increases over the next three years with equal increases in taxes or cuts in other areas of spending. This would hold the projected deficits below the levels contemplated by the token budget reduction proposed by congressional Republicans and the White House.

For fiscal year 1985, which begins Oct. 1, 1984, the House Democratic version would hold the rise in military spending to 3.5 percent after adjustment for inflation, compared with 8.3 percent sought by the Administration. It would also add $5 billion in domestic programs, mostly for the poor.

John J. McNamara dies, headed Firemen & Oilers

Lewes, Del.—John J. McNamara, president of the Firemen & Oilers from 1975 until his retirement in 1981, died here Mar. 20 after a long illness. He was 74.

Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a message to his wife Barbara that "all public employees, including those who never met John, have benefited from his years of dedicated service in making the Firemen & Oilers a strong and effective union. In the process, he helped to strengthen the entire trade union movement."

McNamara had been a vice president of the union from 1950 until 1965, when he was elected secretary-treasurer, a post he held for 10 years until he was elected president. He also served as a vice president of AFL-CIO Metal Trades, Maritime Trades and Public Employee Departments.

Garment union assails bid to scrap ban on homework criticized Donovan's action as "arbitrary and capricious" and ordered the ban reinstated.

The court said it would require a more "reasoned decision-making" by the Labor Dept. to justify such a move.

The department's latest action calls for a suspension of the ban for the next four months. The decision, along with proposed new regulations permanently ending the ban, formally appeared in the Mar. 27 edition of the Federal Register.

The suspension was being issued under authority of the Administrative Procedure Act, Donovan said, which provides for suspending a court-ordered ban in "exigent circumstances."

Zimny asserted that Donovan's reinstatement of the ban under that section of the Act is inapplicable under the circumstances. Homework in the industry has been barred since 1942 in knitted outwear and seven other industries where wage-hour laws and restrictions on child labor were found to be widely violated.

Donovan said he has asked the Justice Dept. to seek a Supreme Court review of the appellate decision, but meanwhile will go ahead with a revised proposal.

Donovan's Newspeak

IN PAST administrations, the Department of Labor has at least sought to be an advocate of America's workers. That's been generally true under Republican as well as Democratic presidents. There is, after all, a Department of Commerce in the unlikely event that business should ever lack a friendly voice within government.

But this is 1984, and perhaps we should not be too surprised that under President Reagan we have a Secretary of Labor who shares his dislike of the wage-hour law.

In a speech to the National Press Club the other day, Secretary Donovan spoke with some eloquence of his fears for "a lost generation of Americans" if Congress did not open up job opportunities by allowing employers to pay teenagers less than the $3.35 minimum wage.

Now while some low-wage employers applaud the subminimum proposal, there are others who dismay Mr. Donovan with their lack of enthusiasm. Their concern, it appears, is that Congress might decide to raise the $3.35 wage floor for adults instead of dropping the pay floor for teens.

The buying power of the $3.35 wage has been badly eroded by inflation, but Donovan doesn't want the minimum raised for any group of workers.

Defying the views of most of his predecessors and rejecting the conclusions of the Labor Dept.'s own studies over the years, Mr. Donovan explains that whenever the minmum wage is raised, "People at the lower end of the scale" are the ones who "get hurt the most."

Shades of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the president who called for a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours.

With the erosion of America's industrial base, more and more workers who once earned fair pay for a fair day's work are being forced to take jobs at or close to the minimum wage.

As President Reagan and Secretary of Labor Donovan obviously see it, the lower the wage, the better.

Danger Signals

A PANEL of leading mortgage bankers bore ominous tidings to a briefing for Washington reporters.

Home mortgage rates are on the way up, they warned, and appear headed for 14 percent or higher. And that's when people stop buying homes, recent experience teaches. They just can't afford it.

High interest rates can wreck this still fragile recovery with the devastation of a tornado. A new recession could be under way while millions are still jobless from the ravages of the last one.

And the enormous burden of the Reagan deficit will become even more unmanageable because of the higher interest cost of the deficit.

What a tragic waste when people who need homes can't buy them and there are no jobs for workers who can build them.

Toward Equality

FOR CENTURIES, society has divided work into men's jobs and women's jobs—and has consistently set lower values on women's jobs, precisely because women do them.

Those who defend that arrangement, including the Reagan Administration and its New Right allies, argue that wages ought to be determined by the "free marketplace." In their eyes, pay equity is a radical notion that will disrupt our economic system and perhaps undo our civilization.

The same arguments were raised against the eight-hour day, the minimum wage, child labor laws, and other gains won by workers.

In a survey by District 925, women workers were asked what they really wanted out of their jobs. Their answers were precisely the answers that men give: better pay and more respect.

It is the job of unions to pursue both of those goals, at the bargaining table, through grievance procedures, through government agencies and through the courts.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to Coalition of Labor Union Women convention, Chicago, Mar. 23.

Washington Window

Grass-roots action vital to block OSHA's retreat

By Press Associates, Inc.

In many ways, federal job safety and health and environmental progress has suffered reversals that will linger years after the Reagan Administration has departed Washington.

But in seeking to grind federal regulatory efforts to a halt, the Administration and those businesses and conservatives who applaud it have inadvertently bitten a very large dog that is biting them back.

They forgot that aroused citizens and workers began both the environmental and the job safety and health movements. And they underestimated how strongly citizens feel about toxic chemicals, clean water and air and safe food.

Dr. Eula Bingham, director of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in the Carter Administration, sees an "enormous amount of potential" in grass-roots action on job safety and health and environmental issues. Bingham expressed her views in a Washington lecture sponsored by the Urban Environment Conference, an alliance of labor, environmental and minority groups.

Bingham recalled what happened after the Reagan Administration killed a chemical labeling rule early in 1981. Labor, environmental, community—and even business groups in one case—worked together to get strong right-to-know labeling laws passed in more than a dozen states and many cities. Chemical labeling became a "natural community organizing issue," she said.

Grass-roots VDT action

She pointed out that similar action on rules governing the health and safety of video display terminals (VDTs) is under way in nine states.

Citizen actions also were inspired by such chemical contamination disasters as Love Canal, Times Beach, Mo., the James River in Virginia, polybrominated biphenyl in Michigan and most recently, ethylene dibromide. Communities as diverse as liberal Berkeley, Calif., and conservative Wauconda, Ill., for example, passed regulations governing the use of pesticides, thus protecting workers who do the spraying, Bingham said.

Bingham tossed out ideas for the UEC participants on possible strategies for grass-roots coalitions to move job safety and health and environmental concerns forward.

Generic regulations

One way to move ahead would be through generic regulations, such as OSHA's cancer policy, proposed under the Carter Administration but waylaid by the Reagan Administration. The proposed rule would have set criteria for determining cancer-causing substances and prescribed action for protecting workers.

If the cancer policy had been implemented "the way we envisioned, we wouldn't have had to deal with EDB," Bingham said. Action on the potent toxic pesticide would have been required once it was listed as a suspected carcinogen.

With more than a half million chemicals in use in U.S. industry, "there is no way in the world that this country can deal with chemicals one at a time," Bingham said. "It's impossible."

In addition to a cancer policy and chemical labeling, other generic standards suggested by Bingham included a pesticide standard and a training standard that would require a certain amount of training before workers use a chemical or perform hazardous jobs.

Bingham said grass-roots coalitions could make use of "leveraging mechanisms" to implant job safety and health and environmental rules in city planning and local health department policies and in building and fire codes.

This type of "leveraging," she said, could make some health and safety and environment legislation invulnerable to hostile administrations.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Bankruptcy Bill Pushed to Big Victory in House

Under the leadership of House Judiciary Committee Peter Rodino (D-NJ), legislation on four aspects of bankruptcy reform (see box, below) was hammered into a compromise package that included collective bargaining provisions endorsed by the AFL-CIO. These provisions were designed to remove the threat to wages, pensions, health care, work rules, seniority, and other benefits of a union contract.

"...This bill clarifies Congressional intent with respect to the limited circumstances under which a collective bargaining agreement may be rejected in a bankruptcy case," Rodino told fellow House members. "This bill would require the bankruptcy judge to apply the standard used in the Second Circuit (court case)...Under this standard, the collective bargaining agreement would not be subject to rejection...unless the jobs covered would otherwise be lost and any financial reorganization of the debtor (company) would fail."

Desire to Operate Without Unions Is Not Reason Enough

Rodino noted that even the Reagan Administration's Solicitor General said it is proper to break union contracts "only when necessary to accomplish the bankruptcy goal of avoiding collapse of the business, not simply because an employer prefers to operate without the restrictions of the collective bargaining agreement."

The Rules Committee adopted a rule for debate that allowed consideration of an alternative approach on the question of bankruptcy courts, as well as a motion to recommit the bill, that is, send it back to committee with instructions for changes.

A few Republicans complained that the rule was overly restrictive, but Rep. Barney Frank (D-MA) squelched criticism by recalling the massive Reagan budget cut bill which amended hundreds of laws, including those affecting Social Security and other important programs, and which was pushed through Congress with no chance for amendment.

And just before the vote on the rule, Rules Committee Chairman Claude Pepper (D-FL) noted that the rule allowed any member to offer a motion to recommit the bill. "They have complete blank authority to knock anything out, to revise, offer a substitute, amend it in any way they wish to," he said.

A motion to send the bill back to committee was offered, but was rejected overwhelmingly by a voice vote. Republican Whip Trent Lott (R-MS), whose job is to count Republican votes, had also denounced the rule ("unusual, inexcusable, indefensible..."), but he did not ask for a roll call because he knew that at least 300 members supported the bill and had voice-voted against recommittal. The bill then received final passage, again on a voice vote with no demand from the handful of indignant opponents for a count.

Under the rule, any Republican who condemned the collective bargaining provisions could have moved to recommit the bill with instructions to delete or weaken them. But no one did so because everyone knew a roll call would only provide hard numerical evidence of support for the bill. And thus it would send a signal to the Senate that conservatives did not want to send, namely that any attempt in the Senate to gut the collective bargaining provisions would be resisted strenuously by the House.

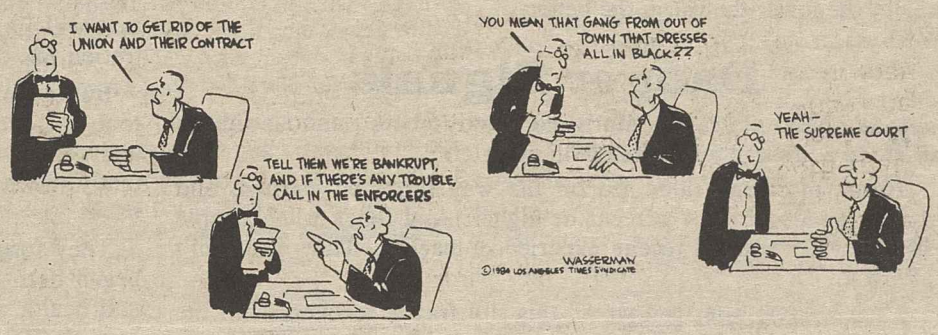
Here's What H.R. 5174 Would Accomplish:

1) Bankruptcy court reform. In June 1982 the Supreme Court declared the bankruptcy court system unconstitutional because bankruptcy judges were exercising broad powers comparable to those of federal district judges without the life tenure of district judges. The high court told Congress to revise the system.

2) Collective bargaining when corporations file for bankruptcy. Under the Supreme Court's recent Bildisco decision, employers can file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization in order to break their union contracts, and bankruptcy may be allowed if the union contract is "burdensome." The AFL-CIO urged Congress to overrule this decision and make clear that its intention in passing bankruptcy amendments in 1978 was not to allow companies to use Chapter 11 to break unions.

3) Consumer bankruptcy amendments, to prevent abuse but maintain bankruptcy as a fresh start for families with severe financial problems caused by recession, medical emergency, or other hardship.

4) Protections for farmers against grain elevator companies who store grain and promise payment when the grain is sold but go bankrupt, leaving the farmers' grain impounded in the elevators and unavailable for sale.



REMARKS ON THE BANKRUPTCY BILL:

Rep. Peter Rodino (D-NJ): "Addressing the Bildisco case, I would like to point out to the Members who take issue with that, that the Solicitor General of this Administration's Dept. of Justice took the position which we now codify, when he argued...that the REA Express case standard was the proper standard because it acknowledged federal labor policy."
(Note: Under the REA Express standard, a company can break its union contracts only if that is the only way to successfully reorganize, save the company and save jobs. This is much better than the Bildisco standard, which allows breaking of contracts if they are a "burden.")

Rep. Barney Frank (D-MA): (after Rep. Dan Lungren (R-CA) spoke out against Congress overturning a Supreme Court decision): "My friend from California knows the difference between constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court and matters of statutory interpretation...We are dealing here with the Court having said, 'This is what we think the law means,' and it is now up to Congress to say, 'No, we do not want it to mean that; we want it to mean the other.'"

UNETHICAL BEHAVIOR STANDARD PROCEDURE IN REAGAN ADMINISTRATION

Three years ago the Reagan Administration came to Washington with a promise of moral leadership and high ethical standards. Today it is clear that instead the Reagan Administration has set new standards for greed. At least 25 high-ranking officials have resigned, been fired or had nominations withdrawn after disclosures of ethical malfeasance. Following are some of the most notorious examples:

- Reagan Counselor Edwin Meese's nomination for Attorney General may be rejected because of Meese's habit of taking interest-free loans from people who later received government jobs. Six people who loaned Meese money received federal posts, including his own deputy.

- Assistant Defense Secretary Richard Perle urged the Department of Defense to buy munitions from a company that had paid him $50,000 in consulting fees.

- As head of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, Thorne Auchter approved the dismissal of $12,680 in penalties and 12 safety citations against a Kansas construction company. On March 30 Auchter resigned in order to take a job as president of the firm's parent company.

- CIA Director William Casey refused to put his extensive stock holdings into a blind trust until the Senate pressured him to do so. He traded more than $3 million in stock while serving as CIA director, raising questions about the possibility of trading on inside knowledge. Max Hugel, Casey's right-hand man, resigned following allegations of shady stock dealings.

- Attorney General William French Smith took thousands of dollars in questionable tax write-offs in an oil and gas drilling venture. He agreed to give up the questionable deduction--but only after unfavorable publicity.

New York voters say 'yes' to Mondale

Pennsylvania next big test for candidates

SATURDAY
APRIL 7, 1984

The presidential primary spotlight shifted to Pennsylvania but the glow from Walter F. Mondale's big New York victory put the Democratic nomination battle in a new light.

No one—and certainly not Mondale—was claiming victory with the delegate selection process still shy of the halfway mark. But the burden is now on Colorado Sen. Gary Hart to demonstrate that his media-propelled campaign has not run out of steam.

Hart was swamped in New York, losing to Mondale in virtually every section of the state and among all of the elements of the traditional Democratic coalition. He received only a minuscule vote in black neighborhoods where Jesse Jackson was the big winner and Mondale the runner-up.

In the tally, Mondale polled 605,000 votes or 45 percent to 369,000 or 27 percent for Hart and 344,000 or 26 percent for Jackson. Jackson could take encouragement from an improvement over past primaries—and for his role in bringing out a record black turnout in a presidential primary. But there was no solace for Hart, who had outspent Mondale heavily and went into the state with the updraft of a victory in neighboring Connecticut.

Widening lead

A series of television debates helped widen Mondale's lead, observers concluded. And Hart gave that view credence with an angry post-election comment.

No longer, Hart said, would he respond to Mondale's attacks on his record or accusations about his flip-flop on issues. "Mondale got me down to his level," Hart asserted. "He won't do that again."

As the exit polls and then the votes showed the extent of Mondale's victory, it was clear that union members were strongly supporting Mondale and overwhelmingly rejecting Hart. Nearly half the Democratic voters were from union households, exit polls indicated.

Another big plus for Mondale was active support—not just a nominal endorsement—from the state's leading Democrats including Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, New York Mayor Edward I. Koch and Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

Hart will again be outspending Mondale in Pennsylvania, as the pressures of an early start push the Mondale campaign close to the legal limits on spending in a presidential nomination contest. Again, Mondale will rely on televised debates, personal campaigning and the efforts of the groups supporting him to get his message across.

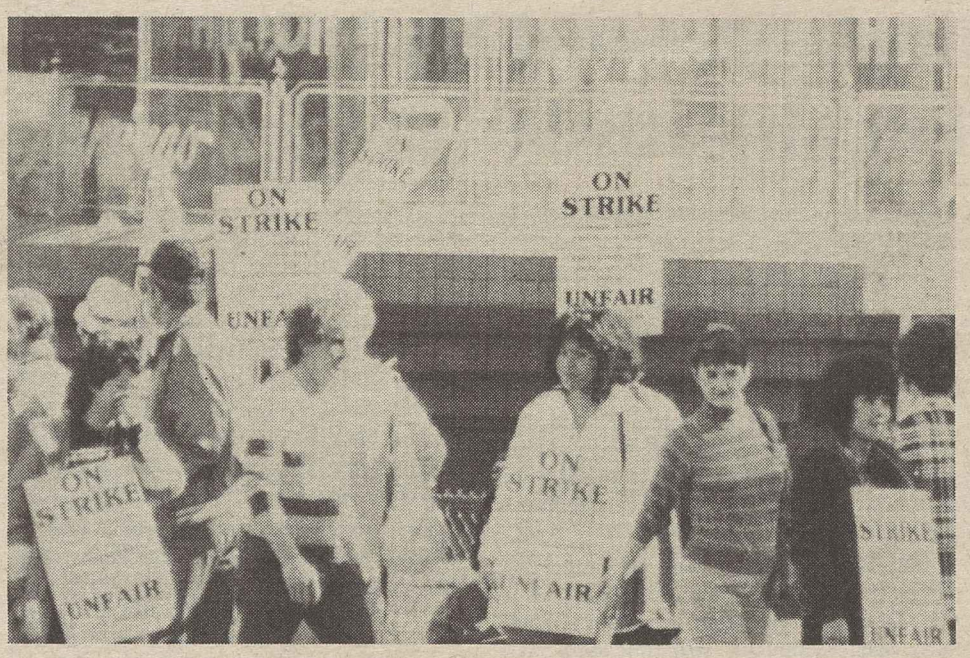
Wealthy gain, poor lose under Reagan's policies



Striking casino and hotel workers picket on "The Strip" in Las Vegas.

Studies show effects of tax, budget cuts

By Susan Dunlop

Two studies by non-partisan investigative arms of Congress confirm organized labor's long-standing charge that the Reagan Administration's policies are helping the rich to get richer at the expense of workers and the poor.

An analysis by the Congressional Budget Office of the combined effects of the Reagan budget and tax cuts shows that low-income families are actually losing money in 1984 while those in the upper brackets are pocketing thousands in cash gains.

In a separate study, the General Accounting Office found that the deep Reagan slashes in social welfare programs—such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children, food stamps and medical aid—have already resulted in lost income and increased hardship for poorer families. Many fell below the poverty line when they lost assistance in spite of the fact that they continued to work, the GAO found.

Giant step backwards

The CBO study looked at the effect of the Reagan budget and tax changes since 1981 on five income groups and found that families with incomes under $10,000 gained about $20 from the Reagan tax cuts, but lost $410 because of budget cuts in both cash and non-cash benefit programs, such as food stamps, for a net income loss of $390 a year.

Families with incomes of $10,000-20,000 drew meager benefits from the Reagan policies, CBO data showed, achieving on the average a net income gain of only $30 a year.

Those with family incomes of $20,000-40,000 were a little better off with net gains of $1,010 a year. The pace picked up for families with incomes of $40,000-80,000 who averaged $2,900 a year more in their pockets.

U.S. intervention urged

Police, guards attack strikers in Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Nev.—A strike by more than 17,000 employees of this city's multi-billion dollar hotel-casino industry has escalated into a major confrontation between the labor movement and corporate gambling operators.

Violence against strikers by police and hotel security guards brought a strong protest from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and a call for Justice Dept. intervention.

On the picket lines are waiters and musicians, stagehands and bartenders, hotel maids and cooks, the men and women who keep Las Vegas glittering day and night.

Some 40 percent of the city's hotels reached agreement with a union coalition without a strike, including such major establishments as the Dunes, Stardust, Riviera, Circus-Circus, Alladin and Fremont. The four-year contracts were ratified overwhelmingly by some 15,000 union members.

The struck hotels are members of the Nevada Resorts Association, which has demanded wage freezes, fringe benefit cuts and a string of takeaways affecting job security and working conditions. Management proposed virtual abolition of the guaranteed workweek and a wipeout of work classifications.

The AFL-CIO dispatched staff to Las Vegas to assist the striking unions—the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Musicians and the Theatrical Stage Employees. And Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue is sending letters to all federation affiliates urging them to make contributions to the unions' strike fund.

In a letter to Atty. Gen. William French Smith, Kirkland urged the Justice Dept. to send marshals to Las Vegas because

Crafts warn of cracks in economy

By David L. Perlman

America's building trades unions sounded a national alert that high interest rates and deteriorating public facilities threaten to snuff out the nation's economic recovery.

That was the message that more than 3,000 delegates to the national conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. brought to Capitol Hill. And when they had delivered it, they returned to their home communities with a new mission of coalition-building to further labor's program.

The conference's legislative goals meshed closely with an impressive display of political unity—a strong message of support for the presidential candidacy of Walter F. Mondale.

At the opening of the three-day conference, with representatives of 15 affiliated unions and nearly 400 state and local councils filling a huge auditorium, there was repeated applause for BCTD President Robert A. Georgine's praise of Mondale.

Mondale's journeyman skills

Mondale is "a journeyman skilled in the craft of government," Georgine said, "a person who understands what it is like to work with your hands" and a leader who can move the nation ahead.

The delegates cheered when AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland contrasted Mondale's record with the Reagan Administration's hostility to unionism and when Kirkland assailed the "cheap shots at the trade union movement" that have marred the presidential campaign of Sen. Gary Hart.

They applauded enthusiastically an innovative audio-visual biography of Mondale that the Building & Construction Trades Dept. produced for showing to union audiences.

And when Mondale spoke to the conference by telephone hookup from New York on the day of that state's primary,

Key role of retirees stressed in reaching union objectives

The crucial role union retirees play in the achievement of organized labor's goals was examined in a conference on retired members organized by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security.

More than 50 participants attended the meeting which included discussions on the part retirees are playing in the 1984 election campaigns, retired members' efforts in grass-roots lobbying, and other community programs where dedicated volunteers are needed.

The participants also examined programs for establishing retirees' clubs and methods by which unions can provide a variety of services to retired members.

AFL-CIO Vice President William Winpisinger, who chairs the Executive Council's Committee on Retirees, observed that as the life span of all Americans increases, the concerns and needs of older people are taking on growing importance.

Winpisinger, who is president of the Machinists, pointed out that working people and the elderly are natural allies in the 1984 elections since both have been badly hurt by the policies of the Reagan Administration.

He stressed that a major challenge of 1984 is for organized labor to do even more to "mobilize our retirees to elect Walter Mondale" as president.

James Kennedy, assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, said that both unions and retired members would be served by expanded efforts to "tap the talent, experience and energy that abounds among our retired members."

He called senior citizens an "important political power" and pointed out that in the Democratic primaries, older people have been among the strongest supporters of Mondale's candidacy.

Praiseworthy efforts

AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins reported on the overall progress made by Mondale through the Democratic primaries and applauded the key role retirees have played in grass roots campaign efforts among union members.

Perkins stressed that older members are more likely to weigh carefully the recommendations of union leadership before making up their minds on whom to vote for. He noted the successful responses many unions have received from mailings to retired members, and he urged other unions to maintain accurate lists of retirees.

In a wide-ranging discussion, conference participants exchanged views on the need for full-time union staff assignments to work on retiree activities and the importance of urging all retiree organizations to affiliate with the National Council of Senior Citizens and cooperate with the Concerned Seniors for Better Government.

The group also discussed the value of unions establishing a mechanism, through convention action if necessary, that will serve as a link to retired members.

Directory rates doctors on their Medicare fees

Doctors who are likely to accept assigned Medicare rates as full payment for their services are now listed in nationwide directories published by the Dept. of Health & Human Services.

HHS said its directories include the names and addresses of physicians and the percentage of Medicare cases for which they accepted the government's assigned rate for the previous year.

The directories will be available at social security local offices, in 725 state and local agencies on aging and at Medicare carrier offices.

Under Reagan's policies

Low-income workers pay for gains of rich

The big bonanza, the CBO figures showed, went to families in the $80,000-and-up bracket. A whopping $8,390 gain from the Reagan tax cuts and a barely noticeable loss of benefits from federal programs gave these wealthiest families an average of $8,270 more a year.

The CBO findings also supported organized labor's charges that the Administration's tax cuts amount to "a raid on the federal treasury."

CBO data said the government will lose $93.6 billion in revenues this year thanks to the tax package. That figure is more than four times higher than all the cuts in spending for benefit programs which the Administration sought as part of its failed effort to balance the federal budget by 1984. The budget deficit this year is expected to be more than three times larger than when President Reagan took office.

The study of the effect of the Reagan cuts in aid programs was conducted by the General Accounting Office at the request of Congress. It showed that even though most of the nation's "working poor" retained jobs after the Administration gutted AFDC, food, health and other aid programs, most have not been able to earn enough to make up for the loss of income from the programs.

Many of those families, GAO said, have slipped back below the government's official poverty line, which now stands at $9,900 a year for a family of four.

The GAO investigation, which focused on Boston, Dallas, Memphis, Tenn., Milwaukee and Syracuse, N.Y., showed that the Reagan assault on the aid programs has cut the number of households getting help from about 3.6 million in 1981 to 3.1 million in an average month today.

The GAO also found that few people who lost aid quit their jobs to requalify for welfare. But although many increased the number of hours they worked and the wages they earned, their actual purchasing power dropped significantly.

Compared to 1981, GAO said, average monthly income for those who lost benefits dropped from $923 to $808 in Boston, from $744 to $515 in Dallas, from $649 to $463 in Memphis, from $998 to $818 in Milwaukee and from $871 to $720 in Syracuse. The amounts were calculated in terms of the purchasing power of the dollar in 1981.

The report also found that many people who lost AFDC benefits lost their eligibility for food stamps and Medicaid at the same time, when the Reagan Administration tightened eligibility requirements for those programs. The GAO's data indicated that many families in the survey had little or no private health insurance. Many said they were forced to turn to charity for food after running out of money.

Hardest hit

Meanwhile, a separate analysis of the effect of the Reagan budget cuts charged that women and children have unfairly borne the brunt of the cuts.

According to the labor-supported Coalition on Women and the Budget, the Reagan Administration has cut more than $100 billion in the past three years from human resources programs whose prime beneficiaries are women and children.

At a press conference releasing the report, Eleanor Holmes Norton, former head of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, charged that the Administration has sought "unwarranted cuts in domestic survival programs that have weakened, not strengthened families; that have made children hungrier, not healthier, and that have added red tape and regulation to the lives of people depending on government aid."

The coalition includes 78 labor, women's, civil rights and religious groups.

Cost curbs pressed to avoid slashing of Medicare benefits

Cost controls on Medicare payments to hospitals and physicians are a fairer and more effective way to keep the programs solvent than putting a bigger burden on workers and retirees, the AFL-CIO testified.

Stan Arnold, secretary-treasurer of the Michigan Building & Construction Trades Council, told the House Ways & Means Committee why the two labor members could not go along with the majority recommendations of the Social Security Advisory Council.

One of the recommendations that drew a strong dissent from Arnold and President Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union would raise the age of eligibility for Medicare benefits from 65 to 67 over the next five years. Another labor-opposed recommendation would raise revenue for the Medicare program through the Administration's proposed tax on health insurance coverage employers provide for workers beyond a basic program. Others would raise deductibles to be paid by patients and impose new taxes on liquor and cigarettes.

Arnold said he and Heaps welcomed the conclusion of the advisory council that Medicare eligibility not be made contingent on income.

Any sort of means test "would violate the very essence of the Medicare program," they stressed.

But the labor members strongly disagreed with the majority conclusion that general tax revenues should not be tapped to make up any shortfall in the hospital insurance trust fund that pays for Medicare. Other advisory councils, appointed under prior administrations, have endorsed general revenue contributions to social security, Arnold noted.

Voucher system

The labor members also opposed a "voluntary voucher" proposal which would let private insurance companies skim off the healthier retirees while leaving Medicare to handle the bigger risks and highest costs.

On cost control, Arnold noted labor's strong endorsement of legislation introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.).

The Kennedy-Gephardt bill would tighten existing controls on hospital charges for Medicare patients and put comparable cost limits on in-hospital physician fees.

Bankruptcy bill delayed in Senate

The Senate remains the focus of labor's push for legislation to stop employers from using federal bankruptcy proceedings as a means of tearing up their union contracts.

Congress wasn't unable to resolve the issue before an Apr. 1 deadline for action on legislation to reshape federal bankruptcy courts, so it voted to put off the deadline until May 1.

That's the bill to which the House last month attached labor-supported legislation to remedy a Supreme Court decision allowing employers to abrogate union contracts as a byproduct of bankruptcy proceedings. As the Supreme Court read the existing bankruptcy law, virtually the only standard employers would have to meet is that the union contract is "burdensome" to the company.

The House-passed bill would clearly deal with the issue. But an attempt to negotiate an agreement with key Republican senators on a comparable protection for collective bargaining fell short. The version that was proposed by Senate Labor Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) was too weak to garner labor support.

Ineffective compromise

In a letter to Hatch, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the proposed compromise would likely be construed by the courts as merely continuing present law in terms of the standard that bankruptcy judges apply in considering whether to allow an employer to escape a union contract.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison alerted union legislative coordinators to the importance of building support in the Senate for language that would reinstitute the test used before 1978 changes in the bankruptcy law resulted in a different court interpretation.

That earlier test, adopted in the House-passed bill, would allow a company to disregard its contract obligations only if it couldn't get a union to agree to changes necessary for the company to stay in business and for the preservation of the jobs of its workers.

"As of now," Denison said, "virtually all senators agree" on two of labor's goals —a prohibition against companies tearing up union contracts when they file for bankruptcy, without first getting court approval, and a requirement that bargaining between the company and union continue during the bankruptcy proceedings.

Denison said the "stumbling block" in the Hatch proposal is retention of the standard that a union contract which is merely "burdensome" to an employer may be set aside by a bankruptcy judge. The AFL-CIO is asking senators to restore as closely as possible the stronger standard that had been in effect before 1978.

Israeli airline denounced on strike tactics

Negotiators for the Machinists and the Israeli government-run El Al airline met with federal mediators in Washington to try to resolve contract differences that forced the union to strike the carrier.

The walkout began Mar. 15 after the parties had exhausted all procedures under federal regulations governing labor relations in the airline and railroad industries. It involves some 250 IAM members.

El Al wants more than a dozen concessions in a new contract to replace the two-year agreement that expired Mar. 31, 1983, the IAM reported. As part of its hard-line position, El Al management flew in some 60 Israeli strikebreakers.

Responding to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's complaints over the use of scabs, Sec.-Gen. Yerucham Meshel of Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, condemned "in the strongest possible terms" El Al's handling of the dispute, and demanded that the strikebreakers be recalled to Israel immediately.

"Histadrut expresses its full solidarity with striking El Al employees," Meshel said in a cable to Kirkland, "and will continue pressing for speedy resolution of conflict in accordance with free democratic trade union principles."

Broken promise

While Meshel said El Al management had agreed to remove the strikebreakers, IAM's Gene Hoffman, the union's chief negotiator in the El Al talks, said they had not yet been recalled.

Hoffman charged that the carrier is attempting to "do away with a lot of our people" on the job. El Al has a domestic flight between New York and Miami.

"In the negotiations, which have gone on a year now, talks have been strictly one-sided and on a take-it-or-leave-it basis," Hoffman said.

Besides a three-year wage freeze, El Al wants to contract out work now done by IAM members in its automotive and commissary departments, weaken job security provisions and layoff various units, reduce vacations across the board by five days, and have the right to cross-utilization of workers in various job classifications.

IAM members employed by El Al include mechanics, storekeepers, commissary agents, cargo agents, flight dispatchers, passenger agents, reservation clerks and office personnel.

The union has held demonstrations both at Kennedy International Airport and at the Israeli consulate in New York. Joining the El Al employees at the Apr. 1 demonstration at Kennedy were IAM members employed by Aer Lingus, Alitalia, Eastern, Northwest, and British Airways.

El Al has a long history of labor disputes in Israel, experiencing 69 wildcat strikes in the past 10 years. In 1982, the airline shut down for four months as a result of labor problems.

Building trades President Robert Georgine warns of economic potholes.

Building Trades shape coalitions, gird for political, legislative drive delegates responded with a standing ovation and shouts of encouragement.

The polls hadn't yet closed, but Mondale was jubilant. "Everywhere I go," he told them, "building trades people are there. We're going to win this election. The issues are with us."

Besides meeting with their home-state congressional delegations, the conference participants took part in workshops dealing with issues ranging from pension legislation to labor law interpretations. And many of them stayed over for a separate safety and occupational health conference.

Georgine stressed in his closing remarks the need to follow through with grass-roots lobbying efforts, letter-writing campaigns and political education programs.

Earlier, he spelled out the type of coalition-building that the national leader of the construction unions sees as broadening local support for labor's goals.

Unions whose members work on housing construction should be working closely with community groups concerned at the lack of affordable housing, Georgine urged.

Likewise, unions involved with energy conservation have common ground with citizen groups with similar concerns. And Iron Workers who build bridges also "can build a coalition to rebuild bridges," he said. For other trades, common concerns might range from mass transit systems to historical preservation.

In the private sector, the building trades leaders are concerned that a rise in interest rates will choke off both commercial and residential construction. And in the public sector, communities just recovering from recession and some still devastated by unemployment have been unable to fund needed repair of the infrastructure—the roads, bridges, sewer systems and other essential facilities of an industrial society.

There is also concern at the inroads made by open-shop contractors—aided by a government-encouraged anti-union climate and such actions as the Labor Dept.'s decimation of the Davis-Bacon Act through regulatory changes.

Strength in adversity

An anti-union climate is nothing new, Georgine reminded the delegates. Unions have survived and gotten stronger in adversity. And "by raising the standard of living of working people, we created the greatest economy in the world."

He asked support for the department's "market recovery program" which is keyed to helping fair contractors become more cost competitive with open shop firms. By such measures as a critical examination of traditional work practices, Georgine said, "we will recapture work that is now going non-union."

In their home communities, Georgine urged, unions can use the expertise of their members to identify public facilities that need to be repaired, rebuilt or replaced. They can develop community needs surveys and publicize the findings in the news media, he stressed.

Kirkland told the delegates that "the building trades are not afflicted in isolation" by the regressive policies of the Reagan Administration.

"The hardships your members have suffered cannot be separated from the problems of the poor, the decline of industry, disastrous trade policies, outrageous interest rates, and repressive social policies that have brought pain to your brothers and sisters in other trades. We are all in the same boat," Kirkland pointed out.

Rail unions to seek 30% boost over 3 years in new contracts

Unions representing most of the nation's railway workers filed notices with major railroads that they will seek wage increases, improved fringe benefits, and work rule changes in bargaining set to begin this spring.

The filings, known under the Railway Labor Act as Section 6 notices, call for pay boosts amounting to 30 percent over a three-year period beginning July 1, 1984, continuation of cost-of-living adjustments, expanded health and vacation benefits, and other gains. About 300,000 workers are involved in the negotiations.

All but one union, the Yardmasters, now have filed notices. Under the Railway Labor Act, the parties must commence bargaining within 30 days after the notices are filed. Management's reply generally comes within 10 days of the union's filing.

The United Transportation Union and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers were the first to file. The most recent notice was served Apr. 2 by the Maintenance of Way Employees.

Other unions are the Signalmen, Railway & Airline Clerks, Dispatchers, Firemen & Oilers, Carmen, Machinists, Boilermakers, Electrical Workers and the Sheet Metal Workers.

The unions' wage proposal is for six 5-percent increases effective every six months starting July 1. In addition, they are asking for continued COL adjustments, without the current 4-percent "cap," payable at six-month intervals beginning July 1.

All unions also are asking for identical increases in health and welfare benefits, including establishment of a new vision care plan and improvements in early retirement, major medical insurance, and dental plans.

They also are seeking more personal leave days and paid holidays, and increases in overtime rates of pay.

Some unions are placing heavy emphasis on management's growing practice of contracting out work they feel their members should perform. The Waymen, for instance, call the issue a matter "most important to the well-being of our membership."

Contracting-out

BMWE President Ole Berge said the contracting-out issue will be addressed on a local basis, rather than nationally, and that the union will open negotiations on the matter with five railroads, the Missouri Pacific, Seaboard, Chesapeake & Ohio, Baltimore & Ohio and the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac.

Berge said that "hard bargaining" will be conducted with these railroads before pressing the issue with other carriers.

While the unions' proposals generally are the same, individual unions are seeking particular improvements. BRAC, for example, is asking that longevity pay be awarded employees who have one or more years of continuous service. It seeks additional pay of five cents an hour per year of service.

The BMWE seeks clothing allowances, shift differential pay, improved job security, and interest payment on retroactive wage hikes.

The shopcraft unions — Boilermakers, Carmen, Firemen & Oilers, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers and the Electrical Workers—want to establish a new $13.26 minimum hourly rate, with all other hourly rates adjusted upward to maintain existing differentials, before the general, percentage wage increases are applied.

Racial slur costs Coors

Los Angeles—Some 500 Southern California liquor store owners have joined the boycott of Coors beer to protest remarks made by the firm's chairman, William K. Coors.

Los Angeles NAACP President John T. McDonald III reported at a news conference that store owners in four heavily populated counties have been voluntarily taking Coors products off their shelves, refusing additional shipments of the beer and urging customers to buy other brands. McDonald was joined at the news conference by AFL-CIO Field Rep. David Sickler who has coordinated the federation's boycott of Coors since 1977.

The store owners' action was sparked by racial slurs made by the Coors executive earlier this year to a minority business group. He called black African leaders intellectually inferior to their former white colonial governors and suggested that "one of the best things (slave traders) did for you is to drag your ancestors over here in chains."

The AFL-CIO's boycott of Coors beer began in 1977 after the company forced workers at its Golden, Colo., brewery to strike over management contract demands that workers called insulting to human dignity and their civil rights, such as the use of lie detectors and body searches.

Kirkland blasts failure to enforce pay equity as 'basic human right'

Unions will continue to fight for pay equity at the bargaining table and in the courts because the concept is grounded on organized labor's most basic principles, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a statement to a House subcommittee.

Kirkland termed pay equity "a basic human and civil rights issue." It reflects the trade union premise that "every worker in this country has dignity and that the job he or she performs has worth for which the worker should be fairly paid," he said.

His statement of support for pay equity principles was submitted to a House Post Office & Civil Service Subcommittee on Compensation, headed by Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio).

Kirkland said unions have worked for many years to end pay discrimination against women through organizing, collective bargaining and litigation.

Organized labor doesn't believe that "any of the excuses that have been given for ignoring the segregation of women into low-paying jobs and the discrimination that exists in compensation is legitimate," he stressed.

The federation president noted that court decisions upheld by the Supreme Court make it clear that "existing law provides the legal tools to achieve pay equity."

Government inaction

But Kirkland was sharply critical of the failure of the Reagan Administration not only to provide a "strong government lead" to spur the private sector into voluntary compliance with the law, but also for its "shameful" failure to enforce the law in cases where charges have already been filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"It is an unhappy fact," Kirkland said, "that the message the Reagan Administration's inactivity is sending to the employers of America is that sex discrimination in wages and salaries is not really very important or very wrong."

In testimony before the committee, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney called the fight for pay equity "one more step in the long history of workers fighting for wage justice."

Unions have provided "tremendous leadership" in the achievement of pay equity, he said. But Sweeney warned also that "our efforts cannot flourish and cannot end discrimination without the total and dedicated enforcement of the laws enacted to end sex-based wage discrimination."

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock said achievement of pay equity in federal employment has been hampered by barriers that currently prevent many highly qualified female clerical workers in the federal service from promotion to better paying administrative jobs held mostly by men, although the skills and responsibilities are similar.

Barbara Hutchinson, director of AFGE's women's department and an AFL-CIO vice president, told the committee that many of the union's efforts to fight wage discrimination in federal employment have been stymied by Reagan Administration policies. Cutbacks in EEOC federal sector compliance programs and staff have made it more difficult for federal employees to push discrimination cases, she said.

Success at USPS

In other testimony, Postal Workers President Moe Biller pointed to the union's successful efforts to achieve pay parity and equal opportunity for women and minority postal workers as an example of how to eliminate workplace discrimination.

Biller credited the high rate of union membership among postal workers as the key factor in the achievement of equity goals in the postal service.

State, County & Municipal Employee Women's Activities Director Diana Rock said the union is committed to achieving pay equity through bargaining, legislative action and, where necessary, litigation. Of those means, she called collective bargaining "the best hope" for both workers and employees to successfully resolve pay equity issues and adjust salaries.

Florine Koole of the Communications Workers emphasized that pay discrimination is not only "offensive for social and moral reasons," but also amounts to a highly inefficient use of economic resources.

Koole told the committee that women who are "forced to work in a female ghetto" cost employers more in the long run in squandered talent and skills, high turnover, and higher health care costs for stress-related illnesses and lower productivity.

Injured striker is carried away for emergency treatment after he was run over twice by a car that crashed a Las Vegas picket line.

Hotel managements mount attack on Las Vegas unions

"local police have proven unable or unwilling to maintain order and protect workers' rights."

Kirkland cited the events of Apr. 4, when "in a melee created by a totally unwarranted attack upon peaceful pickets by private and public police, a dozen pickets were injured and 19 pickets were arrested and detained."

"Not a single private guard was charged or arrested in spite of clear evidence of their brutal conduct in knocking down and beating several pickets. Such evidence is still available from local television outlets which screened these scenes of violence. Similar violence against pickets occurred at other hotels as well, with more than a score of union officials and members brutally beaten and otherwise abused," Kirkland reported.

Most of the strikers are members of Culinary Local 226 of HERE. Members of Bartenders Local 165 and Musicians Local 369 also struck, as did members of Stagehands Local 720 darkening some of the resort city's most glamorous productions.

Hotels that were being picketed include the Las Vegas Hilton, Flamingo Hilton, Desert Inn, Tropiciana, MGM Grand, Caesar's Palace, Sands, Frontier, Union Plaza, El Cortez, Four Queens, Mint, Marina, Holiday Inn, Flashmark Center Strip, Holiday Inn South, Treasury, Castaways, Silver Slipper, Holiday International Showboat, Sam's Town, California Hotel, Golden Gate, Western and Western Ho.

In a letter to officials of the Hilton Hotels chain, Kirkland urged top-level intervention to end "the brutality of your hired guards" and to "save the good name of the Hilton Hotels Corp. with the public and trade union members" by negotiating a fair settlement of the dispute.

No discussions have been held since the start of the strike and none is scheduled, the unions reported.

Vincent J. Sirabella, director of organization for HERE, said the union's locals across the country were acting to alert prospective tourists to the situation in the struck Las Vegas hotels.

In a display advertisement in the Apr. 5 Las Vegas Sun, one of the 24 casino owners who signed the union agreement sharply criticized association members who refused to go along with the settlement.

Dan Pullian, owner of the Hotel Nevada & Casino, said in the ad: "We are concerned by this strike because it is not the huge corporate hotels that suffer. It is the working people who depend on these gluttonous and insensitive corporations for their living and for the survival of their families."

Pullian accused the struck owners of falsely claiming they couldn't afford to pay higher wages.

Houston Project Scores wins at 2 Beverly units

Houston — The Houston Organizing Project scored back-to-back organizing victories at two Beverly nursing homes, Green P. Lewis, Jr., the project's new coordinator, reported.

On Mar. 28, the Service Employees won a representation election at Caldwell, Tex., by a vote of 47-14, and two days later, SEIU scored another nursing home election victory in Texas City, 35-9.

Lewis, an AFL-CIO assistant regional director, succeeded Robert Comeraux as project coordinator on Mar. 19. Lewis formerly served as deputy coordinator.

Comeaux is now assistant director of AFL-CIO Region IV, which covers Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma and Texas.

Employer raids viewed as threat to pension plans

Pension funds are meant to benefit workers and employers shouldn't have the right to terminate retirement plans in order to take back the money that's left over after legal obligations are met, the AFL-CIO insisted.

The Senate Labor subcommittee is considering a bill introduced by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) to impose a nine-month moratorium on the termination of pension plans that have more than $1 million in "excess assets" that would revert to the employer if the plan were discontinued.

Lawrence T. Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, urged its passage and expressed concern at the wave of pension terminations undertaken to give employers a cash windfall.

High interest rates in recent years have increased the reserves of some pension plans beyond the minimum required for vesting of earned benefits, Smedley testified.

When such a plan is terminated, employers usually pay off workers with vesting rights by buying individual annuities in their names.

Smedley noted that even though such workers may be assured vested benefits earned prior to the termination of a plan, "they lose future benefits which would have been earned through future service with the employer."

A pension plan is a form of deferred wages, not a gift from an employer, Smedley stressed. Since the contributions paid in by employers have been earned by workers, labor's position is that an employer should not be able to take back a payment into a pension fund.

As a minimum first step, Smedley urged, a moratorium on further terminations should be imposed.

Labor outraged

Death squad suspect freed in El Salvador

By James M. Shevis

The release of a Salvadoran Army captain suspected of helping to plan the 1981 slayings of two American labor representatives has outraged trade unionists.

"Justice for our murdered brothers has once more been set back by the Salvadoran judiciary," said Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development. He added that the federation will spare no effort to secure justice in the case.

"The workers of El Salvador have great expectations that the murderers will be tried, and that this will restrain the death squads which have heretofore killed with impunity," Doherty said. He stressed that many of the victims have been union leaders.

It was unclear why Capt. Eduardo A. Avila was released from jail Mar. 22. He was let go on the condition that he not leave the country. Avila has connections in high places, including an uncle who sits on El Salvador's 13-member Supreme Court.

Avila had provided investigators significant information linking another suspect, Lt. Rodolfo Lopez Sibrian, and others to the murders of Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman of the AIFLD and Jose Rodolfo Viera, director of the Salvadoran Institute for Agrarian Reform. But now he "has once again been freed without giving official testimony, delaying even further the feeble efforts to resolve this brutal crime," Doherty said.

"The country's legal system is so inadequate and riddled with corruption that there has not been to date one trial or conviction of anyone for the tens of thousands of political murders which have taken place in that country in the past few years," Doherty charged.

Avila was arrested in December for a military discipline infraction after Salvadoran authorities were warned by Vice President Bush they might lose support from the Reagan Administration if they failed to act. The United States had sought Avila's testimony in the hope that it would enable the courts to bring charges against Sibrian, who reportedly ordered two Salvadoran National Guardsmen to carry out the killings.

The two Guardsmen have confessed to the killings, but under Salvadoran law their testimony cannot be used to implicate others in the crime.

A court summary of the brief legal proceedings against Avila quotes him as saying he had "no knowledge" of the killings, nor of the two National Guardsmen who confessed they shot down and killed the land reform advisers on Jan. 3, 1981, in the coffee shop of San Salvador's Sheraton Hotel.

Guns provided

According to earlier court testimony, Avila and Sibrian gave guns to the Guardsmen to use against the trio. Sibrian currently is on active duty in Chalatenango Province. The Guardsmen are being held.

El Salvador's failure to bring the killers of Hammer, Pearlman and other Americans to justice has been cited by congressional critics and the AFL-CIO as a major reason for opposing more military aid to that country.

Rep. Clarence Long (D-Md.), who heads a House subcommittee that considers all aid requests for El Salvador, used strong language to express congressional frustration over lack of progress in cases of killings of U.S. citizens.

"The thing that would most impress itself on Congress, do the most good for El Salvador, would be if we could get a conviction of a couple of these murderous creeps, get some of the swine put in jail or executed," Long told a news conference during a two-day visit in San Salvador in late March.

Panel hits policy of Coca-Cola in Guatemalan sit-in

A union and human rights delegation back from a fact-finding mission to Guatemala, where union workers have occupied a Coca-Cola bottling plant since mid-February, has demanded that the multinational company live up to a 1980 agreement with its workers.

During its four-day stay in that Central American nation, which has been ruled for many years by violently repressive military regimes, the delegation stayed overnight in the bottling plant, where the occupation has been orderly and peaceful. The sit-in began Feb. 18, the day after the company said it was declaring bankruptcy and closing the plant.

Members of the delegation included officials of the Food & Commercial Workers, the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, and the Clothing & Textile Workers. It also included Patt Derian, Assistant Secretary of State Dept. for human rights in the Carter Administration, as well as representatives of human rights and church groups.

At a news conference in Washington, UFCW President William Wynn said, "We're appalled by the attitude of Coca-Cola in letting this situation happen."

Wynn called on Coca-Cola, an Atlanta-based multi-national corporation, "to protect the sanctity of the workers' collective bargaining agreement and to protect their lives."

Wynn said the UFCW plans to take the case of the Guatemalan workers to Coca-Cola's annual shareholders meeting on Apr. 18. He said the UFCW pension plan owns stock in the company and is prepared to present shareholder resolutions or even mount a boycott of its products.

The UFCW and the Guatemalan union are affiliated with the International Union of Foodworkers (IUF) a worldwide trade secretariat. In 1980, the IUF organized a global corporate campaign against Coca Cola, including a boycott, after four years of management-directed violence against union members at the Guatemala bottling plant. Seven members of the union were killed during that period.

After a five-month campaign, Coca Cola agreed in July 1980 to remove the plant's franchiser, John Trotter, and to finance an ownership transfer, the U.S. reported.

The delegation included Luis Hernandez of BCTW, Richard Plumb and Stanley Gacek of UFCW and Bill Patterson of ACTWU.

Delegates to the Woodworkers convention picket Louisiana-Pacific Corp. headquarters in Portland, Ore. The IWA is boycotting the union-busting firm.

Woodworkers' convention gears up union for election

Portland, Ore.—The Woodworkers geared up for this fall's elections by forming a political action committee to get members more involved in the political process.

"We intend to have some influence in races that affect our members, particularly congressional and state legislative races," IWA President Keith Johnson said as the union announced formation of WOOD-PAC at its 33rd convention.

The political action committee will coordinate voluntary fundraising activities and programs at the union's three levels of operation—local, regional and international.

The more than 300 delegates to the four-day convention here had politics uppermost in their minds. Johnson in his opening speech made it clear that IWA members are demanding change:

"Four more years of unemployment? No! Four more years of union-busting? No! Four more years of discrimination? No! Four more years of military adventuring and profiteering? No! Four more years of repression? No! Four more years of Reagan? No damn way!"

Interest rate concerns

In an industry that has experienced unemployment of 20-25 percent since 1980, the foremost concern of the union is the trend toward higher interest rates. The lumber industry is extremely sensitive to interest rates, because as they rise homebuilding goes down, the demand for lumber declines, and workers lose their jobs.

The delegates denounced the Reagan Administration and the Federal Reserve Board for policies that foster higher interest rates.

Another major concern of the union expressed at the convention is the nation's dwindling timber supply. The delegates adopted resolutions calling for stepped-up reforestation of the West and separation of commercial timberland now locked into wilderness areas.

The convention urged congressional delegations in the Pacific Northwest to help unblock the reforestation logjam that has plagued the industry in recent years. The backlog of unplanted trees in U.S. national forests has soared to eight million acres in the past decade.

Reagan policies

In an address to the delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland blasted Reagan Administration policies that have led to high levels of unemployment.

The only ones better off today than they were four years ago, Kirkland remarked, are the "fat cats" who got the lion's share of the President's tax cut program. He cited big corporations whose tax burden "has all but vanished," banks bailed out by taxpayers for bad loans to countries that repress workers, and "unethical and ruthless" corporations such as Louisiana-Pacific. The IWA and the Lumber Production & Industrial Workers, a Carpenters' subsidiary, launched a boycott last December against Louisiana-Pacific because of the company's union-busting tactics.

Speakers besides Kirkland were President Howard Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Rep. James Weaver (D-Ore.), Canadian Labor Congress President Dennis McDermott, and David Barrett, former premier of British Columbia and leader of that province's New Democratic Party. About half the IWA's members are Canadian.

Six three-hour workshops dwelt on topics including financial manipulations in the forest industry, new technology in the wood products industry, and cooperative union-management programs.

U.S. trade deficit sets new record

The nation's foreign trade deficit hit a record high $10.1 billion in February, increasing the likelihood that it will top $100 billion for all of 1984.

The imbalance between the nation's imports and exports has grown steadily in recent years—last year it was $69.4 billion—and constitutes a direct threat to the economy. Mounting imports in a number of industries, particularly steel and footwear, are costing hundreds of thousands of Americans their jobs.

February shoe imports soared to record levels for the second month in a row. In February, 64.9 million pairs of shoes were imported into the United States, compared to 53.2 million pairs a year earlier, Footwear Industries of America, Inc., said. Imported shoes now have captured 70 percent of the American market, the trade association said.

Steel imports in February jumped to 2.2 million tons, an increase of 79,000 tons from January, and the first time in history that tonnage topped 2 million two months in a row. The Iron & Steel Institute reported that U.S. market penetration by foreign steel was an estimated 26.4 percent in February.

Unions and companies in both the footwear and steel industries have petitioned the International Trade Commission for relief from the import flood.

The poor February trade showing came despite a 1.8-percent decline in imports, to $27.3 billion, from the January level. But exports were down an even sharper 6.1 percent below January's $18.33-billion level. The figures are seasonally adjusted.

Presidential economic adviser Martin Feldstein said that the month's red ink "increases the possibility that the trade deficit will be $100 billion or over for 1984."

And the Footwear Industries of America, Inc., said in a statement: "Nothing shows more graphically the need for import relief than these appalling February figures."

As a direct result of the import surge, another 16 shoe factories shut down in the first three months of 1984, the union-industry group said. "Our industry and its workers clearly cannot continue to fight the import battle alone. We need to have our government on our side, too," the statement said.

President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers and President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers blamed President Reagan for inaction. His "failure to stop the destruction of the U.S. shoe industry is an outrage," they said.

"American shoe employers and their workers are now reaping the bitter fruit of the President's refusal to provide the import protection recommended by the ITC in 1981," they said.

In the steel industry, the Iron & Steel Institute said that employment in the 1975-79 period averaged 453,000 a year. But present employment is down by 200,000 to 253,000.

Of the 200,000 who have lost their jobs, 100,000 will never come back, the institute said, adding that the single most important factor in the job loss has been imported steel.

PCBs found contaminating newspaper ink

The two government agencies looking into the use of yellow ink contaminated with cancer-causing PCBs at the San Jose (Calif.) Mercury-News do not plan to expand their investigations, even though thousands of workers at newspaper and commercial printing plants could be at risk from contact with the ink.

Among the newspapers reporting having used the ink are the Los Angeles Times, Washington Post, Sacramento (Calif.) Bee, Oakland Tribune, Phoenix Gazette and the Arizona Republic.

The PCBs (polychlorinated biphenyls) have been found in ink pigment produced by Magruder Color Co. of Elizabeth, N.J. Magruder said it has begun a recall of the pigments it sent to ink makers.

California's job safety agency (Cal OSHA) and EPA are conducting separate investigations at the San Jose paper which first reported finding PCBs in its ink.

A Mercury-News official said the paper first learned of the contamination Jan. 24. Tests show levels of contamination up to 80 times higher than EPA limits.

Pressroom employees learned of the problem Mar. 16 through an anonymous tip. Ray Bales, chapel chairman at the paper's pressroom and a member of Graphic Communications Local 4N, said, "We're all upset about not being informed. We are filling the ink fountains all day long."

The federal Occupational Safety & Health Administration's compliance office said it knew of no current plans to investigate the ink problem in other states.

Both EPA and Cal OSHA indicated it would be at least a week before test results would be back from the samples taken at the plant. EPA is testing the ink to see whether the level of PCB exceeds its standard of 50 parts of PCB per million parts of ink. The state agency, meanwhile, is testing the air samples from the plants.

Both agencies took samples after Mar. 19. The company said, however, it stopped using the contaminated ink on Mar. 16.

Bayliner on unfair list

The Allied Industrial Workers have launched a boycott of Force marine engines made by U.S. Marine Corp. of Hartford, Wis., and of Bayliner boats made by Bayliner Marine Corp. of Seattle, U.S. Marine's parent company.

At the AIW's request, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has added both companies to the federation's Unfair List, and the department is urging union consumers not to buy the firms' products, usually sold through boat dealers.

The dispute grew out of Bayliner's union-busting tactics in its purchase of the Hartford, Wis., engine plant from Chrysler Corp.

AIW Local 879 has had a contract at the plant since 1945, but after Bayliner cut its deal with Chrysler the company immediately closed the facility and laid off some 325 AIW members. The plant reopened 10 days later as U.S. Marine and, although the company hired back about 220 former employees who were AIW bargaining unit members, the firm refused to recognize the union or honor the contract.

The AIW argued that federal labor law requires the company to recognize Local 879 since more than half the company's former employees were rehired and the company's new owners are still operating the same type of business at the same location.

The National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint in the case and a hearing has been set for May 16.

Mondale rides N.Y. victory to Pennsylvania's primary

There was a modest plus for Hart in a non-binding Wisconsin presidential preference vote on the same day as the New York primary. But convention delegates were to be chosen in an entirely separate caucus procedure on Apr. 7.

After the New York primary, the delegate count as tallied by the UPI news service showed 863 for Mondale, with 1,967 needed for nomination. Hart was credited with 515 delegates and Jackson with 147. All three are looking for reinforcements in the pool of 322 delegates who are technically uncommitted or pledged to candidates who have dropped out of the running.

The political swings have been so volatile in the first six weeks of the delegate selection process that no one is likely to call the contest over until the primary season nears an end.

For Mondale, big victories in the Illinois and New York primaries demonstrated the industrial state strength a Democratic candidate needs, and a strong showing in Pennsylvania would confirm this.

Hart campaign strategists are hoping for at least a standoff in Pennsylvania, pickups in some smaller caucuses and a rebound in the May 5 caucuses in Texas.

Jackson's strength in the black communities has held down Mondale's victory margin in the states where Hart's "new ideas" and his attacks on "special interest bosses" have not taken root. But Mondale's strong credentials as a "Hubert Humphrey Democrat" have given him a share of the black vote that Hart has been unable to match.

Liability limit opposed for chemical risk

The AFL-CIO registered strong opposition to new proposals for a Product Liability Act. In a statement submitted to the Senate Commerce Committee, the federation stressed its opposition to sections of the bill that would reduce the responsibility of manufacturers for thorough testing of new chemicals and adequate warning information on dangerous substances.

The federation testified against the measure in April 1983 in its original form. The bill was substantially amended by its sponsors in October 1983, and the federation's statement focused on those amendments, expressing continued opposition to the bill despite certain improvements.

On the testing of new chemicals, the AFL-CIO said it is "particularly concerned about the effects of exposure to the panoply of toxic chemicals and substances being introduced into the workplace at an accelerating rate." Given the number of these products, the limited understanding of their possible toxic effects, and the long latency periods often involved, "we do not believe that a lessening of the responsibility imposed on their manufacturers is the responsible course," the federation said.

Unreported deaths

The statement cited the recent trial of a large pharmaceutical company whose chief executive officer admitted to "shortcomings" in his company's failure to report overseas deaths related to one of the firm's products. The product was implicated in the deaths of more than 40 persons.

The AFL-CIO also scored the proposed measure for going "a long way toward immunizing manufacturers from liability for failing to provide adequate warnings on dangerous substances." A section of the bill would require that warnings need be given only to supervisors. As a result, if warnings are not conveyed by the supervisors, workers who sustain serious injuries would have no recourse against the manufacturer.

Park Police facility marks another Job Corps success

The dedication of a newly renovated U.S. Park Police facility in the Anacostia area of Washington, D.C., marked another Job Corps success.

The project, carried out under a nationwide training program supervised by four AFL-CIO building trades unions, was completed at a savings of more than $1 million in taxpayers' money. Had the job been done by a private contractor, it would have cost over $5 million. By using Job Corps trainees and skilled instructors from the Carpenters, Bricklayers, Plasterers & Cement Masons and Painters, the cost came in under $4 million.

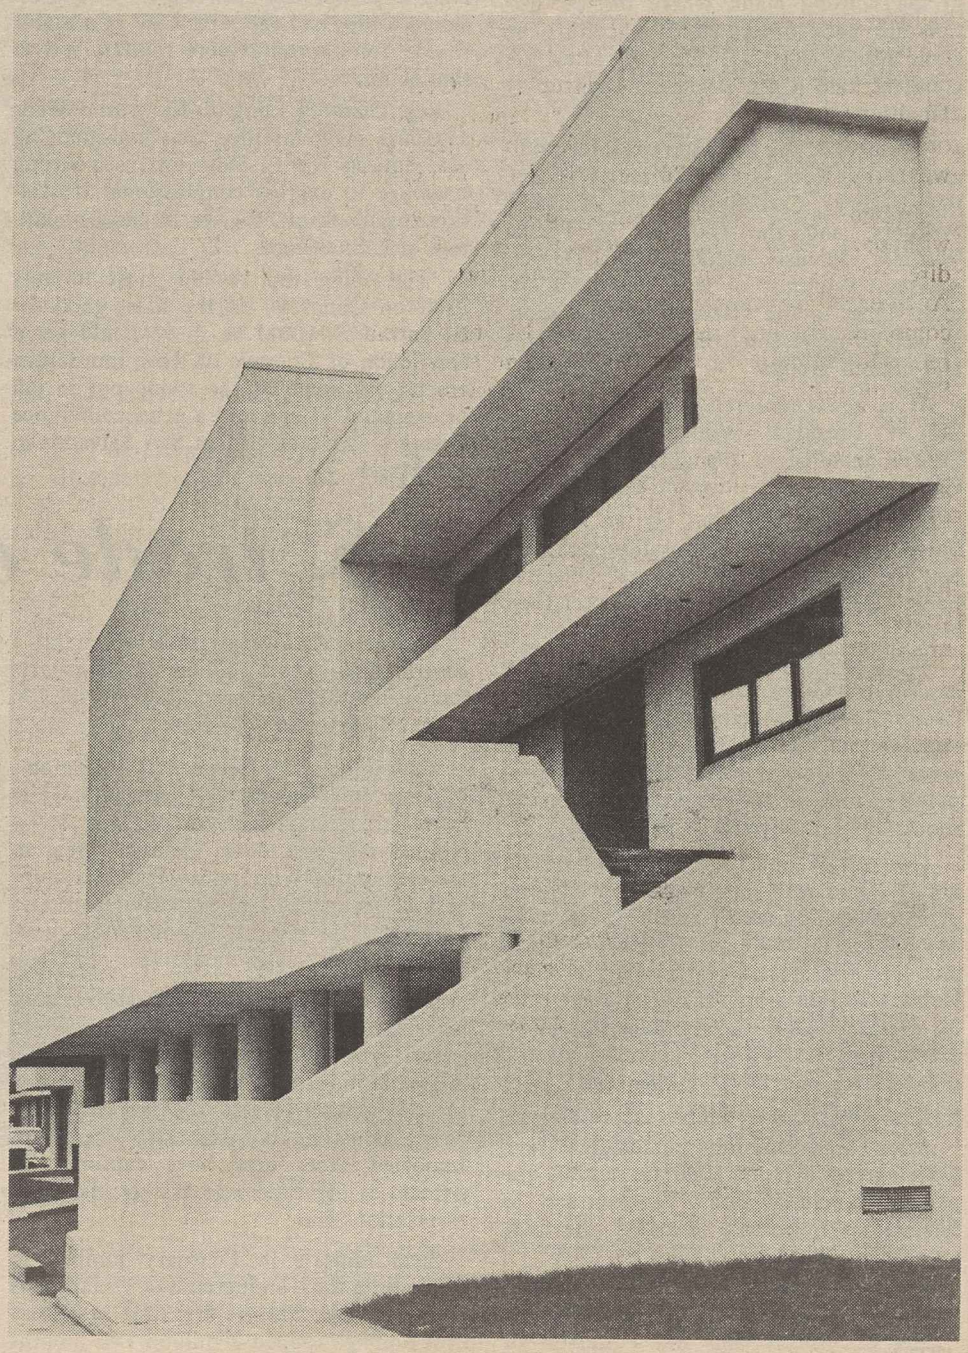
More than 700 Job Corps trainees, young women as well as men, from the Harpers Ferry, W.Va., Civilian Conservation Center and from the Potomac Job Corps Center, received training at the building site over the past five years.

The unions that coordinated the restoration subsequently placed some 75 percent of the trainees in jobs starting at $5.75 to $7.50 an hour.

"When they get through with their training on a project like this, they're well on their way toward acquiring a skill that will last them a lifetime," said Reese Hammond, director of education and training for the Operating Engineers.

The Job Corps came into being under the 1964 Economic Opportunity Act. Eight AFL-CIO affiliates currently sponsor vocational training programs through the Job Corps. Besides those engaged in the Anacostia project, they are the Operating Engineers, Auto Workers, the National Maritime Union, and the Railway & Airline Clerks.

At dedication ceremonies, U.S. Park Police Chief Lynn Herring thanks Job Corps trainees for work in restoring facility.



Completed renovation project saved taxpayers over $1 million.

The Mondale Trend

AT MIDPOINT in the campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination, Walter F. Mondale has demonstrated a breadth of support that neither of the other candidates has been able to match.

But even if the election returns were pointed the other way, there would have been no regrets about the decision to involve the AFL-CIO in the early stage of the selection of a President of the United States.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland made the point the other day in an address to the building trades conference:

"We have learned some brutal lessons in the last four years. The most important is that we cannot afford to be onlookers when the hard political decisions are being made. . . .

"Of course that entails risk. Any fight that's worth making is a fight that can be lost. But the alternative is to let others speak for us, to let others define what is in our best interest."

THE TRADE UNION movement has helped provide the bedrock of support that kept the Mondale campaign from collapsing after Gary Hart caught the media spotlight and rode it to an early string of victories.

A perceptive journalist who covered the Hart campaign, Elizabeth Drew, writes of the Colorado senator as the "ink blot candidate." It's an apt phrase. Hart's early success came in part because his "new ideas" were so shapeless. Voters, with a bit of wishful thinking, could find in their vagueness whatever they wished to see.

The campaign is far from over. At its conclusion, the winner of the Democratic nomination will face an even more difficult task—to pinpoint the unfairness and failures of the Reagan Administration and to identify the policies that have brought hardship to so many Americans with the publicly genial President who formulated them.

Last December, when delegates from the AFL-CIO's affiliated unions, departments and central bodies met in convention, Walter F. Mondale looked like the best qualified person for the task.

He still does.

The Coors Connection

THE VICIOUS union-busting policies of Coors beer earned the company its listing on the AFL-CIO's consumer boycott roster several years ago.

The outrageously bigoted remarks of the firm's chairman, William K. Coors, has made the beer equally unwelcome in black communities—and indeed, among people of decency of every ethnic group.

But the Coors family, among the most generous contributors to right-wing organizations over the years, is not entirely without friends.

It seems that the regional office of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in Denver sought to conduct an inspection of a Coors plant even though—horror of horrors—the company was not on a revised "priority list" for inspections.

Indignant Coors officials refused to admit an OSHA inspector without a warrant. Before the day was over the regional OSHA director received a chewing out in a telephone call from Thorne Auchter, who recently resigned to become head of a construction company that has tried to bar OSHA inspections. Later, it was reported, Auchter flew to Denver to meet with the Coors family. Subsequently, the OSHA regional director was ordered downgraded.

Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan was asked about the episode at an Apr. 4 hearing by a House Appropriations subcommittee on the department's budget request.

The Secretary of Labor was sure there was no connection. He has been a personal friend of one of the Coors family for some years, Donovan said, and he is sure that Coors officials are "very much concerned about health and safety."

With such assurances, who needs OSHA?

Delayed NLRB rulings deny justice to workers

By Press Associates, Inc.

"Justice delayed is justice denied," a wise jurist once said.

For workers seeking justice under the National Labor Relations Act, this legal axiom has been borne out through bitter experience, especially during the past year.

Take the case of a group of grocery store employees in Riverside, Calif., long-time members of Food & Commercial Workers Local 1167.

In September 1982, the store was sold, but the workers' collective bargaining agreement remained in force. The union's relations with the new owners went smoothly until the end of 1982, when the union discovered that the company was not contributing to the employee pension and medical trust funds as required by the contract.

Union representatives pressed the issue with company officials, who kept stalling. On Feb. 18, 1983, without warning, employees received letters announcing the closing of the store the next day.

But the store soon reopened under "new" management. It had been "sold" in secret to close relatives at a "loss." The "former" boss continued to run the store as before.

Company actions

Only eight of the store's 34 workers were rehired—on the condition that they quit the union. The remaining jobs went to new hires. The union was no longer recognized and its contract was ignored. Wages were cut, and pension and health benefits were eliminated.

The union filed unfair labor practice charges on Mar. 3, 1983 against the "new" and "former" owners. It also sought injunctive relief to force the company to rehire the 26 fired employees and restore the contract while the National Labor Relations Board and the courts went through the long process of deciding the issues in the case.

The NLRB's regional office in Los Angeles found merit in the union's charges and filed a complaint against the company. In February, 1984, an NLRB administrative law judge ruled that the company had committed seven serious unfair labor practices and recommended the employees be rehired with back pay. An expected appeal by the company to the full NLRB will cause further delay.

Stalling on relief

Meanwhile, the union's request for emergency relief under the National Labor Relations Act's Section 10(j) provision has gone unanswered by the NLRB for more than a year.

The board's delay has caused severe hardship and anguish among the 26 fired workers, UFCW attorney George Murphy told a House oversight subcommittee at a recent hearing.

The year-long delay "has had a devastating effect on the employees' morale," Murphy said. "When you tell people they are protected by the law, what do they think about the law or about their union or about their government?" he asked the legislators.

"Employers are going to great lengths today to get out of their union contracts. The only way to prevent it is to get timely injunctive relief," Murphy told the panel.

Congress enacted Section 10(j) in 1947 as part of the Taft-Hartley amendments to the NLRA to provide a legal means of timely relief in cases of flagrantly unfair labor practices where the victim would suffer immediate and lasting harm.

In the years prior to the Reaganization of the NLRB, the board's treatment of injunctive requests by unions and employers was roughly equal. Since Reagan appointees gained a three-member majority on the board last year, it has denied more than one of three requests approved by its own general counsel, almost unheard of in previous years. On the other hand, all but one of the 10(j) injunctions sought by employers in the past year were authorized by the board.

MEMO FROM COPE

Business PAC Funding Balloons Despite Slower Number Growth

The sharp growth in the number of business political action committees that characterized the late 1970s and the first couple of years of the '80s has braked. According to Federal Election Commission figures, the total growth in corporate and trade association PACs in 1983 was 58.

More than that number were formed, but others folded up PAC operations.

Don't worry about the future of business PACs, however. While the number might have seen its days of most rapid growth, the amount of money the business PACs pump into the campaigns of favored candidates continues to balloon.

Campaign spending by corporate PACs alone (trade PACs were at or near the same pace) went from $20 million in the 1979-80 election cycle to $27.5 million in 1981-82, about a 35 percent increase.

Nobody who's watched them burgeon thinks their rate of funding growth will slow. Allow them a minimum 33 percent increase in the 1983-84 cycle (they hit that pace last year) and they'll hurtle past $36 million for the upcoming U.S. House and Senate elections.

Allow trade group PACs similar growth after starting from almost the same base, and you've got another $30 million-plus in PAC political contributions.

And this is merely the tip of the corporate-trade group campaign funding iceberg. In aggregate, they pour even more money into state ballot issues and state legislative elections than into U.S. House and Senate contests.

In certain industries the increase in political giving has been enormous. From 1977-78 to 1981-82 aerospace PACs jumped from $472,650 in contributions to $2,276,644, a growth rate of 382 percent. Communications went from $479,188 to $1,942,081, a boost of 305 percent. The banks and other financial institution PACs soared from $1,378,153 to $5,306,181, up 285 percent.

The industry with the biggest bucks overall throughout was energy, which leaped 166 percent from $2,764,968 in 1977-78 to $7,357,329 in 1981-82.

A like growth rate in this cycle will mean the energy industry PACs alone will contribute at least half as much as all labor PACs.

Two other mega-bucks industry PAC groups were construction with $6,224,206 in gifts in 1981-82, and finance with $5,306,181. No other industry cluster reached $3 million.

More Figures from AWAH Front

The Administration with a Heart shoved 493,000 families off welfare rolls with its 1981 budget cuts and welfare revisions. If you figure an average of four to a family, you're talking about just short of 2 million individuals.

So that this group wouldn't get lonely out in the cold, AWAH slashed the benefits of large numbers of other welfare recipients and deprived millions of nutrition and medical benefits.

This is all according to a General Accounting Office report. A great many of those families thrown off the welfare rolls, according to GAO, were the working poor. Most of them failed to cooperate with AWAH, which has insisted from the outset that welfare rolls are cluttered with ne'er-do-wells who don't want to work. In the first place, they already worked. In the second, few of them quit their jobs just to get back on welfare, even though welfare benefits might have exceeded their earnings.

AWAH's theories are no better than its practices.

More on the Administration with a Heart:

The Center for the Study of Social Policy claims the poverty rate of welfare families headed by a single working mother soared from 18 percent to 42 percent in Michigan under AWAH's human welfare cuts, from 70 to 79 percent in Georgia, and from 19 to 45.5 percent in New York.

Depending on the state, from 39 to 60 percent of families with someone working were shut off from benefits, losing from $71 to $198 a month.

One Vote Counts!

Mike Shaw and Bryan King were tied at 85 votes each for the Washington, Calif., school board, and election officials decided to determine the winner by a best-of-seven drawing.

Each candidate's name was placed on 10 capsules that were put in a bingo-like drum. The candidates were still tied after the first six draws. On the seventh, King won it.

One vote . . . one draw . . . counts.

Odds 'n Ends

'LANDSLIDE' DEBUNKED, and a good time to be doing it. Reagan's 1980 victory, dubbed "landslide" by most of media, really wasn't if you look at popular, rather than electoral, vote. Princeton Prof. Stanley Kelley in recent book reminds us Reagan's share of total popular vote was only 50.9 percent, a half a point higher than Jimmy Carter's 1976 win over Jerry Ford. In the 20th Century, he recalls, 14 of 20 winning presidential candidates have done as well or better.

Reagan won 55.4 percent of major party vote (excludes votes for John Anderson, splinter parties), and more than half of presidential winners in this century did as well or better. Reagan's share of total potential vote was a mere 26.6 percent, third lowest of any winning candidate since 1932. So, next time you hear about Reagan's 1980 "landslide," point out the facts.

LANDSLIDE OF MONEY, however, now filling Reagan re-election campaign coffers. With Reagan unopposed in primaries, yet legally entitled to collect contributions for them, millions come in and hardly any has to go out. More than $8 million already in hand and coming in at a rate too fast to count. Reagan strategists will have happy decision to make: Whether to rely for campaign cash on public funding route—which would equalize spending of Reagan and Democratic nominee in range of $35 million—or to pass up public funds and outspend opponent by huge margin. Tough decision.

TAME STUFF compared to the "good old days" are the exchanges between Democratic candidates Walter Mondale and Gary Hart, which the media call "heated." Presidential candidates in the 19th Century, Texas Christian University Professor Paul Boller says in a new book, didn't hesitate to call one another things like "a carbuncle-faced old drunkard" or pickpocket, thief, traitor, lecher, syphilitic gorilla, howling atheist, crook, anarchist, murderer. Now that's "heated."

Fight's Off

The big battle the March 24 Memo predicted between Gov. Jay Rockefeller and former Gov. Arch Moore for the West Virginia Senate seat won't come off, after all. Moore announced instead he will seek the GOP nomination for governor. This increases the Democrats' chances of holding on to the Senate seat. The incumbent, Jennings Randolph (D), is stepping down.

'New Right' Eyes New Party, Expanded Base

It's been talked about on and off for years, but soon the "new right" is expected to bring us the Conservative Populist Party.

Not the whole "new right" (hereafter called the right wing; it's middle-aged, not "new" any longer). There is a split in the movement's leadership over starting up a new political party.

The prime movers behind it are direct mail-master Richard Viguerie whose movement sprung from the ashes of the Goldwater conservative drive in the early 1960s; Howard Phillips, head of Conservative Caucus, the man Richard Nixon appointed to dismantle the anti-poverty program; Paul Weyrich, one of the heavier intellects in the movement, a protege of the Coors brewing family, founder of its rightist think tank, the Heritage Foundation, and beneficiary of Coors bucks.

This triumvirate and other right wing leaders have been meeting weekly for years. Press reports say recently they've grown more determined to enter their own political party in the lists on a very measured scale.

If they can swing it, they'll field candidates this year in a small number of congressional districts, mostly in the South, where there is what they consider a "liberal" democratic incumbent and no satisfactorily "conservative" GOP challenger on the scene.

The new party will not challenge Ronald Reagan or the Republican Party under Reagan. Its leaders appear to be looking beyond Reagan to pick up his hard-core support when he leaves the political scene and the backing of way-right Republicans who feel the GOP isn't producing on their agenda—though it has brought before Congress, with Reagan's leadership and encouragement, their entire shopping list of issues.

Going with a new party means the glue that bound right wing leaders together is coming unstuck. In their early days, they were a fraternal band of snapping, carping, bushwacking political guerrillas on the outside wanting in, united in strategy, tactics and objectives—and more or less committed to working within the GOP.

Now, well past political adolescence, the leaders of the movement are heading off in different directions. Some major rightist chieftains are giving the new-party idea the cold shoulder. Among these are Terry Dolan of the National Conservative PAC—certainly one of the most effective, if unlovable, of the original "new right" groups—Rev. Jerry Falwell of Moral Majority, Rep. Phil Gramm, erstwhile Boll Weevil Democrat turned Republican.

It is not yet clear if the angels who fund so much of the right-wing political activity are themselves willing to sail the uncharted waters a split-off party would float them into. Somehow, the leadership trio of Viguerie, Phillips and Weyrich think their potential base of support extends far beyond discontented right-wing Republicans and Reagan backers looking for a home when Reagan no longer is their acknowledged general.

If Viguerie's publications are any indication—and they usually tip off where these right-wingers are headed—the new party sees itself with a vast potential among working people and minorities. A recent edition of Viguerie's Conservative Digest gave over most of its pages in an effort to show how the new party's agenda could appeal to these groups.

Here they clash head-on with themselves. They have typically opposed those economic and human welfare programs on which workers rely and others that help move minorities into the mainstream of economic and political life.

Kevin Phillips—himself a conservative who in the early 1970s predicted the emergence of the new right—says, "The new right doesn't know very much what it's doing in economics. If you favor populism, you have to have relatively populist economics. That can include the tax revolt, but it also has to include worrying about the little guy, and support for his programs."

That worry and support have been glaringly absent from the front-burner of right wing concerns.

Guestworker plan assailed as revival of bracero period

By David L. Perlman

American growers don't need to import an army of foreign workers to get their crops harvested, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue insisted at House hearings on the ingredients of an immigration reform bill.

Donahue stressed that the AFL-CIO's support for effective immigration controls does not extend to the "guestworker" program that some members of Congress are trying to write into the law.

Bringing in foreign workers, subject to exploitation and a "blackmail" threat of deportation if they don't please their employers, would revive the worst aspect of the discredited bracero program that Congress abolished 20 years ago, Donahue warned.

The House is expected to take up the immigration bill next month—if it can agree on a procedure for acting on a multitude of amendments and substitute bills that will be offered for the measure approved by the House Judiciary Committee.

The AFL-CIO has urged as essential ingredients of any immigration legislation:

- Penalties for employers who knowingly hire undocumented workers who are illegally in the United States, and
- A procedure for legalizing the status of the many undocumented workers who entered the United States illegally and have since established roots in this country.

Opposing guestworker plan

Donahue appeared before the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards to express the federation's strong opposition to a grower-supported amendment backed by the House Agriculture Committee to set up a large-scale guestworker program.

He also stressed the AFL-CIO's backing for amendments to the Judiciary Committee bill that have been endorsed by the subcommittee and the full Education & Labor Committee.

Donahue challenged the contention of the corporate growers that there will be a shortage of qualified farm workers if the influx of undocumented workers across the Mexican border is cut off.

Surely, he said, when unemployment is still at 7.8 percent, "there has been no demonstration of need for an open door for importation of foreign agricultural workers." Further, the legalization program will enable a large portion of presently undocumented farm workers to attain legal resident status and remain available for farm employment.

Any transition needs, he suggested, can be accommodated through the Education & Labor Committee amendment drafted by Subcommittee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.). It would allow strictly limited and declining use of foreign workers over a three-year transition period, subject to labor standards, wage laws and provision by the growers of adequate housing.

Miller, who presided at the hearings, said the guestworker program supported by the growers and sponsored in the Agriculture Committee by Rep. Leon E. Panetta (D-Calif.) would allow employers to blacklist foreign workers who look for help to unions or the Dept. of Labor by not requesting them the following season. Since employers would be allowed to specify the workers they want admitted to the United States to work on their crops,

Delegate lead grows

Pennsylvania victory propels Mondale drive

A strong victory in Pennsylvania brought Walter F. Mondale past the half-way mark in the delegate count he needs for the Democratic presidential nomination and continued his sweep of big industrial states with substantial union membership.

Besides his Pennsylvania win, Mondale also took a majority of the delegates chosen in Wisconsin's Democratic caucuses where he polled 60 percent of the vote.

The hectic pace of primaries and caucuses will ease temporarily. The next big-state contest is the May 5 Texas caucus, followed by the May 8 primaries in Indiana, North Carolina, Maryland and Ohio.

In the interim are April caucuses in Arizona, North Dakota, Missouri and Vermont, followed by May 1 primaries in Tennessee and the District of Columbia.

Colorado Sen. Gary Hart, a poor second in the large industrial states that Democrats must carry to win the presidency, is hoping for support in the Sunbelt and western states to send him to the convention with a momentum strong enough to dislodge delegates from the Mondale bandwagon.

No rainbow

For Jesse Jackson, there was the satisfaction of rolling up big votes in black neighborhoods despite prestigious endorsements for Mondale. But he found few signs of the "rainbow coalition" he had sought to put together.

Newspaper and network polls of Pennsylvania voters indicated that Hart trailed Mondale badly among union voters, and the Colorado senator sought to turn that into a virtue by arguing that a presidential candidate shouldn't appeal to "just one narrow base."

In fact, however, Mondale outpolled Hart among almost all persons who identified themselves as Democrats except for those who said they voted for Reagan in 1980. And in the black communities, Mondale was drawing 25 percent of the vote to just 4 percent for Hart. Mondale had demonstrated a comparable broad appeal in the Illinois and New York votes.

With the Pennsylvania delegate tally incomplete, the UPI news service credited Mondale with 1,047 of the 1,967 delegates needed for nomination. Hart had 571 and Jackson 152. Another 389 were uncommitted or for other candidates.

Obvious choice

If Hart was not convinced that Democratic voters had largely settled on Mondale, President Reagan didn't seem in doubt as to the candidate he would face in November.

The President took off on the first of a series of carefully scouted, supposedly non-political trips out of Washington—and the targets of his speeches were the themes that Mondale has been expounding.

Reagan attacked domestic auto content as a "snake-oil cure" and said the economy is "humming."

He proclaimed a boom in housing and generally pictured the nation as riding a wave of prosperity.

But a lot of people voting in the Democratic primaries were sending a different message.

Rise in interest seen threatening nation's recovery

By James M. Shevis

New hikes in two key interest rates are continuing signs that the Reagan Administration is wedded to tight-money policies that threaten to choke off economic expansion, the AFL-CIO warned.

The move by major banking institutions to raise their prime lending rate by half a percentage point, to 12 percent, and the Federal Reserve Board's action to lift its discount rate by the same measure, to 9 percent, could be the start of a spiral further hurting workers and their families, Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"Interest rates already are among the highest real interest rates in this century, and the higher costs of borrowing money will choke off the housing industry and capital goods industries so dependent upon the price of capital for their continued viability," Oswald stressed.

"These hikes will mark the start of an upward ratcheting of interest rates through anticipatory borrowing in fear of further rate increases, followed by further tightening by the Fed, more rate increases, more borrowing, and so on. The effect will be to price many potential home purchasers

Labor Dept. tilts against workers

The AFL-CIO accused the Reagan Administration of transforming the Dept. of Labor into an agency that represents the interests of employers against workers and their unions.

Key staff positions have been filled with persons hostile to the department's programs, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor testified, while cutbacks and reassignments have decimated and demoralized the professional staff.

Taylor urged a Senate Appropriations subcommittee considering the Labor Dept.'s fiscal 1985 budget request to "look skeptically at the recommendations made by a department which has shown no sympathy for its basic mission of protecting workers."

To the extent possible, she suggested, Congress should insist that the department give priority in allocation of resources to programs "protecting workers from hazards, discrimination and joblessness."

Deepest cuts

During the past four years, these areas have borne the heaviest cutbacks, Taylor testified. She cited a 49 percent reduction in authorized staff for job training and employment programs, a 23 percent cut in positions under the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, and a 22 percent decrease in enforcement of labor standards including the wage-hour law, the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act.

"The only significant staff increases requested by the Dept. of Labor during this time have been for criminal investigators and auditors to look into labor union activities," Taylor told the panel.

In terms of carrying out its mission, the Labor Dept. has regressed in key areas, Taylor charged.

She noted that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration issued only one new final health standard under the Reagan Administration—and that is "a standard which we find inadequate."

But over the same period, Taylor said, "six final actions have been taken to re-

Immigration testimony by Sec.-Treas. Donahue, Legislative Director Denison.

Guestworker plan denounced as revival of bracero period such a blacklisting would also have a chilling effect on other foreign workers who seek to assert their rights, Miller said.

Donahue also strongly endorsed the Education & Labor Committee amendment of Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.). It would provide stronger enforcement and tougher penalties for employer scofflaws than either the House Judiciary Committee bill or the bill the Senate passed last year.

The Hawkins amendment would also write into law an enforceable prohibition against discrimination in hiring on the basis of national origin—thus closing a gap in the equal employment opportunity provisions of the Civil Rights Act, which exempts small employers. The proposed amendment would also prohibit hiring discrimination against aliens legally entitled to work in the United States.

Other union witnesses who testified were Dolores Huerta, vice president of the Farm Workers, and Arnold Mayer, vice president and government affairs director of the Food & Commercial Workers. Agriculture industry employers declined the panel's invitation to testify, Miller said.

'Shocking' proposal

Huerta termed it "shocking" that Congress was even considering reviving a bracero-type program. She expressed concern that any immigration bill would become a tool against farm worker organization and said a guestworker program would put at a competitive disadvantage "those employers who have recognized their workers' right to organize" and are paying decent wages and benefits.

Mayer told the panel that the bracero program in effect before 1964 provided paper guarantees of working conditions that were disregarded in practice.

"The bracero program pitted the poor, the underemployed and the unemployed of Mexico against the poor, the underemployed and the unemployed of the United States," he said. "The result was the creation of still more poverty and misery."

Under Miller's amendment, legal residents of the United States would have first priority on jobs and any foreign workers brought in for limited periods would be assured wages and working conditions that would not depress local employment standards.

Hispanic groups have been divided on the issue of penalties for employers and on efforts to develop a tamper-proof identification card.

Threat to job standards

Donahue acknowledged the difficulties of getting legislation that would meet every concern. But he reminded the panel that the problem has been festering for years and that any pool of foreign workers—whether composed of undocumented workers fearing deportation or guestworkers brought in under a new version of the bracero program—poses a threat to wage standards and job opportunities for American workers.

As for the farm employers, he asked: "How long can the agriculture industry continue to ask to be subsidized by the poorest and most vulnerable workers? We suspect that at the root of some of these fears and complaints by the growers is an unwillingness to give up access to a servile, frighted worker willing to work at low pay, fearing deportation and anyone who symbolizes authority."

Such a worker, Donahue said, would be under heavy pressure not to protest exploitation or turn to law enforcement agencies or a union for help.

Anti-union tilt continues

NLRB ruling called attack on bargaining

A new ruling by the National Labor Relations Board that frees employers from the obligation to bargain before moving their operations was branded as further evidence that the agency has become a tool of management.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber assailed the NLRB's reversal of a previous position in a new decision that the Otis Elevator Co. had the right unilaterally to shift its research and development facilities from Mahwah, N.J., to a more modern plant in East Hartford, Conn. Bieber called the ruling "another in a series of frontal attacks by the Reaganized board on the collective bargaining process and the protections workers enjoy under the National Labor Relations Act."

The 17 Mahwah workers involved in the 1977 transfer case were represented by UAW Local 989, which sought to negotiate the selection of employees to be transferred, the terms of transfer, and whether the transfers were necessary. The union's overtures were rejected, and the company, a part of United Technologies Corp., declined to show union officials copies of corporate studies which it said justified the move.

Overturned decision

In a 4-0 decision the NLRB overturned a 1981 board finding that Otis's refusal to bargain over the workers' transfer was an unfair labor practice.

The Otis decision expands the powers of management set forth in another recent ruling. In a Jan. 23, 1984 decision involving the Milwaukee Spring division of the Illinois Coil Spring Co., the board held that companies were permitted to move production from a union to a nonunion plant unless a labor contract specifically prohibited it.

The rulings follow in the wake of a 1981 decision by the Supreme Court in First National Maintenance Corp. vs. the NLRB that management was not obliged to bargain if its decision to move a facility involved the basic scope and nature of a business enterprise, such as selling the business, consolidating or subcontracting work or installing labor-saving machinery.

Both Otis and the UAW asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to review the board's 1981 decision. Three months later, however, the board asked the appellate court to remand the case to the agency for reconsideration in iight of the Supreme Court's decision.

In its latest holding, the board said an employer's duty to bargain with a union over such a transfer applies only when the corporate decision is based on an attempt to reduce labor costs.

"The critical factor," the board said, is whether the employer's decision "turns upon a change in the nature or direction of the business" and "not its effect on employees nor a union's ability to offer alternatives." It upheld Otis's contention that the transfer was because the Mahwah plant's technology was outdated and its product was not competitive.

"The decision at issue here clearly turned upon a fundamental change in the nature and direction of the business, and thus wasn't amenable to bargaining," the board said.

Narrowed obligation

Bieber said the Otis case "obviously runs counter to the basic purpose of our labor laws, which is to encourage the peaceful resolution of disputes through the bargaining process. . . . The Reagan board's progressive narrowing of management's obligation to bargain could well bring back the era of chaos and confrontation which enactment of the Wagner Act in 1935 was intended to end."

The UAW, which has not yet decided whether to appeal the ruling, warned also that the Otis finding "threatens to unleash a new wave of plant closings, joblessness, and community misery as companies are released from any obligation to bargain with their workers before transferring or subcontracting work, or even to supply any information relative to the move."

He said the ruling should spur Congress to "restore balance and equity to our labor laws" and increase congressional support for such measures as the National Employment Priorities Act to stop the tragedy of further plant closings and community abandonment.

The Otis decision is the latest in a recent series of rulings against the interests of workers and their unions handed down by the NLRB's Reagan majority.

Reagan nominee for Labor Board raises concerns

The AFL-CIO is "gravely concerned" that the Reagan Administration's nomination of Rosemary M. Collyer as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board amounts to "another step in turning the NLRB over to management's agents lock, stock and barrel."

The federation expressed its deep reservations about Collyer in a statement issued following President Reagan's announcement that he would name her as the NLRB's chief legal officer to succeed William A. Lubbers, a Carter Administration appointee whose four-year term expires Apr. 24.

Collyer, who currently chairs the Federal Mine Safety & Health Review Commission, must be confirmed by the Senate. Her experience as a practicing attorney was limited to four years.

Experienced predecessors

By contrast, former NLRB general counsels, including Lubbers, a career NLRB attorney, have had extensive labor law experience either with the board or in private practice.

Collyer, 38, held a variety of public relations jobs prior to entering the University of Denver law school in 1974.

After receiving her law degree in 1977, she was an attorney with a Denver law firm until she was appointed to the mine safety board in June 1981.

The AFL-CIO has been critical of other Reagan appointments to the NLRB—which the federation charged have politicized the board — including Chairman Donald Dotson and Member Patricia Diaz Dennis, both former management attorneys.

Meanwhile, the Administration has yet to act to fill the seat left vacant by the retirement last August of Member Howard Jenkins, Jr.

Union scores breakthrough at Yale

New Haven, Conn. — Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34 signed a breakthrough first contract with Yale University, capping the struggle of the university's clerical and technical workers to win collective bargaining protections.

The three-year accord is unique because it provides for immediate settlement on a wide range of non-economic issues while leaving economic provisions to be hammered out in continuing talks.

Local 34 had told the university its members would strike on Apr. 10 if no agreement had been reached, but when Yale officials said they were poorly prepared to negotiate on the economic issues, the union proposed the arrangement in the interest of averting a walkout.

The first phase of the settlement provides for key gains sought by the HERE unit, including a policy on promotion and transfer rights, establishment of a grievance procedure, a system for review of job descriptions and classifications, improved safety and health protections and an agency shop arrangement.

The union agreed it would not strike over any of the resolved issues, but reserved the right to walk out if a settlement can't be reached on the major economic items.

That agenda includes wage increases across the board, cost-of-living adjustments, and improvements in health and welfare, pension and vacation plans.

A major issue on the table, the union said, is establishment of a wage scale to set pay for workers commensurate with years of service and experience. Under current conditions, workers make virtually the same pay whether they have been on the job for decades or days, and the union is asking for the upgrading of senior employees as well as a fair system of step wage increases for all of the workers.

The average pay for full-time clerical workers at Yale is currently about $13,700 a year, the union said.

Local 34 was certified as the employees' bargaining agent last year after a long-term organizing campaign.

The campaign had strong support from Yale students and faculty, and local community groups as well as from HERE Local 35 which has represented Yale service and maintenance workers for 20 years.

Postal unions prevail on food drive

Phoenix—Thanks to the determination of labor and community services organizations, local Letter Carriers, Postal Workers and Mail Handlers were able to conduct their traditional food drive for the needy on Apr. 14.

Although Phoenix postal employees had run the canned goods drive since the 1970s, Postal Service officials in Washington this year decided that good works interferes with postal work, and invoked a regulation prohibiting Phoenix postal facilities from being used as collection centers to help area food banks stock up.

The unions and labor Community Service representatives called a press conference to protest the hardlines policy, and with the help of a plea from local postal authorities, persuaded USPS to grant them an exemption.

The unions hoped to top last year's successful collection which brought in over 150,000 pounds of food for division among nine area food banks for the needy.

Labor asks foreign policy tied to quest for freedom

New York—American foreign policy should actively support workers and their unions wherever they seek freedom and democratic institutions, the AFL-CIO declared at a regional meeting of the Democratic Party's platform panel here.

In detailing the federation's position on American foreign policy, the advancement of American values abroad, and international trade, representatives of the labor movement urged the panel to have its foreign policy plank reflect utmost consideration for worker rights and human dignity.

"Our objectives emphasize people, not governments," AFL-CIO Vice President Kenneth Blaylock told the panel chaired by Rep. Geraldine Ferraro (D-N.Y.).

"In considering our relations with another country," Blaylock said, "we are less interested in the political coloration of its government than in the extent to which it permits its people the right to band together in their own institutions to protect their rights and interests as they see them.

"Without this right—this freedom of association—all other human rights wither."

Also testifying for the federation, Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development pointed out that organized labor has supported advancement of democracy, human rights, freedom, and justice for the past 100 years.

"Our respect for these values guides and shapes our international relationships and activities today as much as ever before, as we believe the foreign policy of the United States should be guided," he said.

Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers, warning that the nation is facing "an unprecedented crisis" in foreign trade and investment, called on the Democratic Party to include in its platform specific policies that reflect international trading realities.

Fair trade sought

The goal of U.S. trade policy must be the attainment of a "fair trading environment" that allows the nation to maintain an advanced and diversified economy while promoting full employment and rising living standards in the United States and other countries of the world, he said in remarks submitted to the panel.

Sheinkman defined "fair trade" to mean that the interests of the United States must receive greater emphasis in both domestic and international initiatives of U.S. international trade and investment.

Th AFL-CIO was among some 100 groups and individuals that testified at the Apr. 9 hearing. The panel is scheduled to hold a half dozen more sessions around the country through early June. The next hearings are set for Apr. 24, in Birmingham, Ala.

In his presentation, Blaylock stressed that the key question in foreign policy is where people are struggling for more democracy than they have, should the United States support them or sit on the sidelines?

"The American labor movement has chosen the former path," he said. "In Poland, in South Africa, in Central America—against communist governments or right-wing dictatorships—we actively support those who are struggling and sacrificing to build and sustain free trade unions and other democratic institutions.

"This, we contend, is a foreign policy worthy of the Democratic Party."

Doherty stressed in his testimony that support for free trade unions throughout the world is a key element in the advancement of fundamental human rights.

"It is no secret that in those countries where these values are threatened it is the popular democratic institutions such as trade unions that are the first and often the most effective line of defense," he observed.

In Latin America, he pointed out, the AFL-CIO has joined with free trade unions in demanding justice and workers' rights, in defending land reform and helping workers in their struggle for a true democracy. He noted the federation's support of the findings and recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America calling for profound reforms in the social, political, and economic structures in that region.

African unions

In South Africa, the federation continues to support the emerging black trade union movement while in other parts of the continent, such as Algeria, Tunisia, Zimbabwe and Namibia, it has been one of the major forces in seeking decolonialization, he observed.

Sheinkman, in urging immediate action to solve the nation's trade problems, called on the panel to promote legislation to give relief to American workers and industries hurt by imports as well as to deal with unfair trade practices.

He called for steel import quotas, domestic content laws in the auto industry, steps to revive the U.S. maritime industry, and other measures to balance the nation's foreign trade position.

Jobless rate holds at 7.8%, misery persists for millions

Unemployment in the nation remained unchanged last month, the Buerau of Labor Statistics reported, but the 7.8 percent rate still is historically high and means hardship for millions of Americans.

"Overall unemployment is 2.7 million higher than in 1979," AFL-CIO Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald pointed out. "Programs are needed to alleviate unemployment, particularly for displaced manufacturing workers, minorities, and young people entering the workforce."

Oswald noted that employment in manufacturing still falls 1.5 million short of 1979 levels and that, while economic conditions generally have improved since the depth of the Reagan recession, the situation for black Americans is dismal, with 16.6 percent of them out of work.

Besides the 8,772,000 workers officially classified as unemployed, BLS counted another 1.3 million jobless Americans too discouraged last month to continue the search for work.

The government does not include these so-called "discouraged" workers in its estimate of unemployment. Nor does it factor in the number of people working part time because they are unable to find full-time work. There were 5,463,000 in the latter category in March, BLS reported.

Full impact

The AFL-CIO estimates that if half of these part-time workers and all of the discouraged workers were taken into consideration, last month's true jobless rate was 11.3 percent, with 12.9 million unemployed.

Meanwhile, a steady increase in the number of new claims for state unemployment insurance benefits indicated possible troubles ahead in the economy. The Labor Dept. reported that initial claims for the week ended Mar. 24 rose 5,000 to 366,000. The total was 22,000 more than in the week ended Feb. 11.

The leveling-off of the nation's jobless rate followed a six-month string of declines. Even though civilian employment last month rose by 248,000 to 104,140,000, a corresponding rise of 219,000 in the work force to 112,912,000 resulted in the 7.8 percent civilian jobless rate.

Overall unemployment, measured against a labor force that includes members of the armed forces stationed in the United States, was 7.7 percent, also unchanged from February.

Figure unchanged

The jobless rate among adult women was unchanged in March at 6.9 percent, while the rate for teenagers was up six-tenths of 1 percent to 19.9 percent. For black teenagers, the rate rose 3.2 percent to 46.7 percent; for white teenagers, the rate increased from 16.5 to 17.1 percent.

The unemployment rate for Hispanics, both adults and youths, also rose—from 10.2 percent in February to 11.3 percent in March. The rate for adult men declined two-tenths of 1 percent to 6.8 percent over the month.

BLS's payroll survey of nonfarm establishments showed that seasonally adjusted employment in March increased 145,000 to 92.5 million, a smaller gain than in recent months. Employment in manufacturing and services increased, while construction employment declined.

The average factory workweek in March dropped half an hour from the 41-hour level recorded for January and February. At 40.5 hours, factory hours have returned to levels prevailing at the end of 1983.

Contract overboard

Members of Allied Industrial Workers Local 879 in Hartford, Wis., picket U.S. Marine Co., a subidiary of Bayliner Corp. of Seattle. Bayliner bought the outboard motor plant, fired the workers, and then reopened 10 days later, refusing to recognize the union that has represented the workers since 1945. Both Bayliner and U.S. Marine are on the AFL-CIO "do not buy" list.

out of the market, and drive more firms to invest abroad."

The increase in the prime rate—interest that banks charge their best corporate customers—was the second in three weeks, and brought the rate to its highest level since November 1982. The discount rate—the fee that the FRB charges on loans to banks and savings institutions—had stood at 8.5 percent since December 1982.

Most bankers and economists predicted that the prime would climb still further. The prime rate is critical because it is the basis on which banks set the rates they charge on many loans, especially to medium- and small-size businesses and, increasingly, to individuals.

The new upward movement of interest rates touched off a rise in some locations in rates charged on new-car loans, worrying dealers and auto executives who just emerged from a long slump caused in part by the high cost of credit.

Auto industry slump

Interest rates approaching 20 percent on auto loans in 1980-81 had a lot to do with the slump that saw auto sales plunge to 20-year lows, knock almost 4,000 dealerships out of business, and cost tens of thousands of Americans their jobs.

The discount-rate increase, which became effective Apr. 9, was approved by a 4-1 vote. The Fed issued a brief statement saying that the change "was undertaken in light of the relatively wide spread that has developed in recent weeks between short-term market rates and the discount rate."

In other reports on the economy, the government reported a big drop in retail sales last month and the business-oriented Conference Board announced that consumer confidence in the economy fell in March for the second month in a row.

Retail sales were off 2.2 percent in March, the largest drop in over 10 years and the second straight monthly setback, the Commerce Dept. said. If the decline were to continue, it would confirm economists' fears that interest rates are now high enough to dampen sales.

Hearing fails to bring bankruptcy accord

A joint hearing by two Senate committees failed to narrow the wide gap separating the positions of unions and management on a House-passed bill that would stop employers from using bankruptcy reorganization proceedings as a means of tearing up their union contracts.

AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold said the House bill carries out the intent of the National Labor Relations Board that differences be resolved through good-faith collective bargaining.

Under the House version, if bargaining fails, a bankruptcy judge could allow the nullification of provisions of a union contract if necessary to keep the company in business and preserve jobs.

Employer groups want to stay as close as possible to the Supreme Court's interpretation that present bankruptcy law considers a union contract not much different than any other type of business agreement and permits its abrogation if its terms are "burdensome" to an employer.

Obvious choices

Gold's wry comment on the reaction to the Supreme Court's decision was that "those who know their interests best—management and unions—divide as follows: the employer community praises the decision and we condemn it. The winners and losers are plain enough."

At the Senate hearings, presided over jointly by Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) of the Labor & Human Resources Committee and Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), employer witnesses bore this out.

The Chamber of Commerce representative, Robert T. Thompson, said his organization opposes any change in the test the Supreme Court prescribed for revocation of union contracts.

The way to proceed, he suggested, is to allow the employer to abrogate the union contract "and then let the parties talk."

Congress extended the deadline for action on changes in the bankruptcy court system until the end of April, but Hatch said he doubted the issue could be resolved by then. Earlier, he had proposed a substitute measure that the AFL-CIO opposed as inadequate to meet the problem.

Minnesota solidarity

Some 400 members from St. Paul, Minn., area unions rally in support of 211 Food & Commercial Workers who struck Iowa Park Industries over eight weeks ago. Firmly rejected employer demands for a wage freeze, two-tiered pay scale and overtime concessions resulted in 100-percent participation in the strike. Minnesota AFL-CIO President David K. Roe, at podium, pledged support for a new contract that would preserve workers' dignity.

20 Las Vegas hotels on unfair list, support mounts for 17,000 strikers

By Susan Dunlop

The AFL-CIO has responded to union-busting tactics and attacks on pickets by calling on union members across the country not to patronize the Las Vegas hotels where some 17,000 members of three unions are on strike.

Federation President Lane Kirkland, in messages to affiliates and state and local central labor bodies, said the AFL-CIO at the request of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Musicians and Theatrical Stage Employees had added 20 Las Vegas hotels to its "unfair list."

Union members struck the hotel-casinos that belong to the Nevada Resort Association on Apr. 2. The hotel culinary and service workers, bartenders, musicians and stagehands walked off their jobs after negotiators for the management association—led by the Las Vegas Hilton—refused to pull back on demands for a wage freeze and other stiff concessions.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue paid a personal visit to the picket lines drawing cheers from strikers with his declaration that "the AFL-CIO and the entire labor movement across the country supports this strike."

Donahue told the strikers that the federation would back the locals with financial as well as moral support. Earlier, he announced the formation of an AFL-CIO Assistance Fund to which affiliates would be asked to contribute.

Most of the strikers are members of HERE Local 226. Members of HERE's Bartender's Local 165, AFM Local 369 and IATSE Local 720 also walked off the job, idling most housekeeping and food services and darkening stage shows at many of the city's major hotels.

Employers' group

The member hotels of the Nevada Resort Association include the Las Vegas Hilton, Flamingo Hilton, Caesars Palace, MGM Grand, Desert Inn, Frontier, Sands, Tropicana, the Mint, Union Plaza, Four Queens, Silver Slipper, California Hotel, El Cortez, Golden Gate, Las Vegas Club, Sam's Town Hotel, Showboat, Castaway and Holiday Hotel.

In his message to AFL-CIO affiliates, Kirkland pointed out that the struck hotels had rejected terms of new contracts already agreed to by some 20 independent hotel-casinos. About 15,000 workers are covered by the pacts.

The AFL-CIO's alert to affiliates noted that violence against picketers during the strike had prompted Federal District Court Judge Robert Foley to remark in court that guards at the Hilton Hotel had "acted like labor goons in the 1920's; it was gruesome to see."

Strikers have been injured by cars crashing through picket lines, and the unions have charged that hotel security forces engaged in "brutal violence" in dealing with legitimate picket lines and demonstrations.

Although several of the struck hotels have hired replacements for strikers and others have used newspaper ads and personal letters to threaten union members with replacement, HERE said few workers have been intimidated.

The unions also sharply dispute the hotels' claims that they are operating near capacity, citing reports that large portions of several hotels are being closed off, and pointing to a memo obtained by the unions in which the manager of a major hotel urged department heads to trim all operating costs in response to revenue losses from substantially lowered occupancy.

Management demands

The key issues in the dispute, HERE said, are the employers' demands for a two-year wage freeze coupled with insistence on changes in work rules that could cut the number of hours of work guaranteed to workers each week from 40 hours to 20. The unions are also objecting to management attempts to cut the employer contribution to health and welfare programs. forcing employees to pay more out of pocket.

In contrast, the new four-year contract signed by the HERE locals with the independent hotels provides a wage package that will raise pay an average of $1.91 an hour over the life of the pact for employees who receive tips and as well as for those in non-tipped jobs.

Civil rights conferees decry retreat under Reagan policies

The Reagan Administration's policies on civil rights were pounded by participants in the 15th annual AFL-CIO Civil Rights Institute held at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The 65 participants, representing some 30 unions, denounced the Administration's stances on civil rights, women's rights and affirmative action as an outright attack on decades of human rights progress.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard told the group of union civil rights designees that the theme of the meeting—"To Fulfill These Rights"—can best be accomplished in the current political climate through the determination of unions and their members "to speak up and speak out on civil rights and women's rights," and to work vigorously within their own unions to carry out the policies of the American labor movement in these areas.

Election participation

The week-long institute included a wide range of reports and seminars on rights issues as well as discussion of strategies for increasing participation by women and minority union members in the 1984 elections.

The participants also examined techniques for stemming the backsliding on civil rights during the Reagan Administration. Among the techniques explored were the greater use of electronic media for information and education; stepped-up legislative action on the local, state and national level; and continued pressure on the Reagan Administration to insist that it uphold and enforce U.S. civil rights laws.

Other institute topics included the status of equal employment opportunity and other civil rights law enforcement under the Reagan presidency, as well as gains by unions in achieving pay equity for women workers.

A perspective on conditions for black workers in South Africa was provided by Piroshaw Camay, secretary-general of the Council of Unions of South Africa.

Among other speakers were Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young; Actors & Artistes President Frederick O'Neal, who chairs the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee; Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin; Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland; Rev. Joseph E. Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and Carl Holman, president of the National Urban Coalition.

The participants also held discussions with representatives of a wide range of civil rights, women's rights, religious youth, and labor organizations.

Boycott ends on consumer publications

New York—The Newspaper Guild ended its strike and called off a boycott of Consumers Union, Inc., following an agreement between the union's New York local and the publisher of Consumer Reports magazine.

The Guild's 140-member Consumers Union unit ratified a new three-year pact with the Mt. Vernon, N.Y., company on Apr. 4, ending a three-month strike.

The Guild also asked the AFL-CIO to remove Consumers Union and its publications and services from the federation's national boycott list.

Layoff protection

The new contract includes protections for employees against layoffs resulting from the subcontracting of bargaining unit work or assignment of those tasks to non-unit employees. The publisher's demands for unrestricted authority to contract-out or reassign work to employees not in the bargaining unit was a key issue sparking the strike, which began Jan. 9.

The new contract calls for wage increases of 5 percent on Jan. 1, 1985, and 7 percent on Jan. 1, 1986, as well as continued cost-of-living protections.

Other improvements include an increase in company payments to a jointly administered pension fund and provision for a joint labor-management committee to examine health and safety concerns related to the use of video display terminals.

Among employees covered by the contract are writers and editors as well as engineers, technicians and researchers who study, test and evaluate products for Consumers Union publications.

Vernon Kelley dies at 70, headed aluminum union

Zachary, La.—Vernon E. Kelley, president emeritus of the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers, died Apr. 8 in a hospital here where he was being treated for lung cancer. He was 70.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a message to his wife Ruby that Kelley was "a dedicated trade unionist and a trusted leader whose personal qualities did much to build and strengthen the present Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers International Union and the American labor movement as a whole."

Kelley joined the Aumnium Workers in 1946. He served as a shop steward and secretary-treasurer of Baton Rouge, La., Local 205, was elected vice president of the union in 1949 and became an international representative in 1951.

He later served as the union's director of education and research for 12 years before being appointed executive assistant to the union's president. Kelley was elected president in 1975 and retired in 1977.

Convention hails Mondale

Operating Engineers link goals to election

Hollywood, Fla. — Eradicating the scourge of "double-breasting" in the construction industry and plant closings in the industrial sector are top priority goals of the Operating Engineers, President J. C. Turner told some 700 delegates to the union's 32nd convention.

Success in both endeavors, Turner said, requires the defeat of President Reagan and his right-wing followers and the election of Walter Mondale and labor's friends to Congress in November.

The Reagan Administration, he charged, is "waging war against workers" and inflicting "heavy casualties."

Turner said the explosion of the double-breasting tactic — in which a union contractor establishes a second competing firm that operates nonunion — has been made possible by the anti-union decisions of the National Labor Relations Board.

"Through his appointments of people who have spent their lifetimes honing skills to help management weaken unions, Reagan has turned the NLRB into a management saber that is being wielded to systematically cut down the trade union movement," Turner declared.

Legislative package

He and other members of the administrative committee of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., he reported, have prepared a legislative package for Congress that would bring an end to double-breasting.

He also called on the delegates to give their wholehearted support to a bill before Congress that would curtail the hardships inflicted by plant closings.

"Passage of this legislation will end management's callous practice of milking ultimate profits from workers and their communities, only to throw them into the discards on a whim," Turner pointed out.

But he stressed that success in either legislative initiative "depends totally on our ability to replace our enemies with our friends in the Congress and the White House in November."

Labor Dept. changes

Turner had harsh words for the Labor Dept., which he said has become "a mockery of its name, stripped of those who were advocates of working people and replaced by champions of employer causes and dedicated to the destruction of the trade union movement."

The delegates heard AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assail the anti-union bias of the Reagan Administration, question Sen. Gary Hart's sympathies toward workers, and deliver a spirited endorsement for Walter Mondale for President.

"Sen. Hart, who actively sought our support in this campaign and accepted our support in the past, has defamed labor with code words and the 'special interest' label," Kirkland declared.

While Hart "offers himself as the spokesman of the younger generation," his record violates their interest, he said.

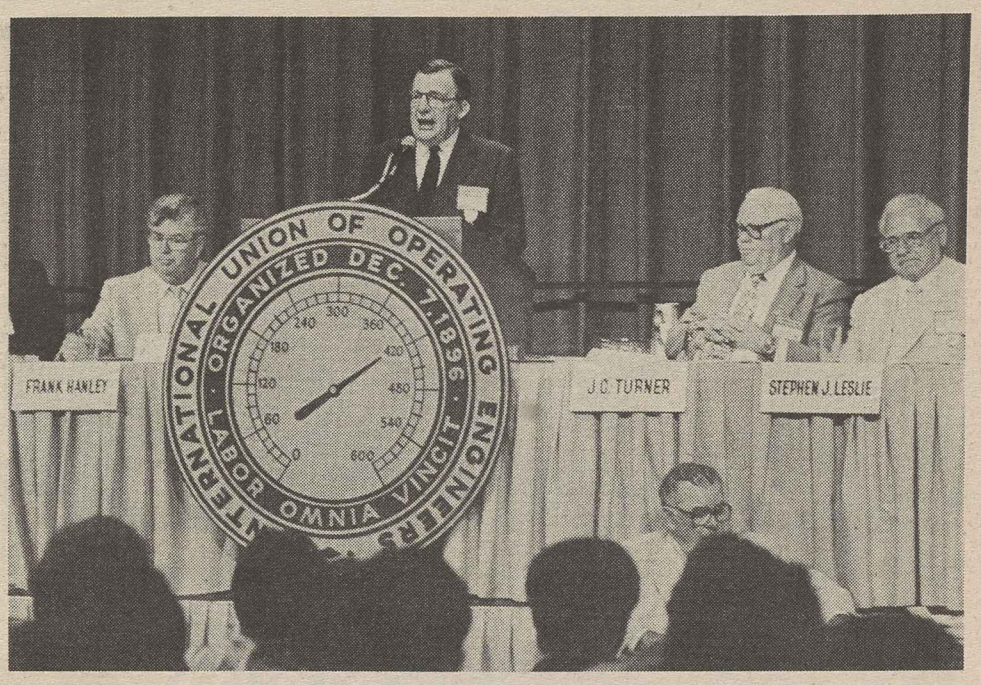
"He has favored a youth subminimum wage, the exclusion of all young workers in the fast-food chains such as McDonald's from OSHA protection against burning grease and slippery floors, and a step-up in interest payments on college loans," Kirkland noted. "So does Ronald Reagan. He professes concern for working people, but he insults their organizations. So does Ronald Reagan."

Head-on challenge

To the applause of the delegates, Kirkland said the way for unions to win in November is to place all of their energy in support of "a candidate who will challenge Ronald Reagan head on — all the way. That candidate is Fritz Mondale. We know where he stands and what he really believes — yesterday, today and tomorrow."

Mondale aroused a cheering, whistling and applauding reaction from the delegates when, in a telephone conversation on the day of the Pennsylvania primary he said: "Wherever I've gone, I've seen Operating Engineers doing the work for me. You never let up."

"I want to be President to rebuild this country," he said. "We rebuilt Western Europe and Japan, so for crying out loud, let's get busy and rebuild America."



AFL-CIO President Kirkland focuses on election issues in an address to the Operating Engineers convention in Hollywood, Fla.

Suit seeks to bar referendum to bring ITU into Teamsters

San Francisco—Six Typographical Union members are suing to block a May 16 referendum on the merger of the ITU with the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, seeks an injunction to bar the referendum and the merger conferences being held in cities around the country.

The suit also asks to have Robert S. McMichen installed as president of the ITU, and as trustee of the ITU pension plan and as chairman of the pension plan's administrative committee pending the outcome of any rerun elections.

McMichen won the popular vote in the contested November 1983 election over incumbent President Joseph Bingel, who is a defendant in the suit. The other defendants are Sec.-Treas. Thomas W. Kopeck, and Vice Presidents Allan J. Heritage, Robert L. Wartinger and Ray Brown.

The six ITU members pressing the suit are Carl M. Fry, Neoma R. Schultz, Arnold C. Sears, Agostino A. Stagliano and Roberto Bozarth, all of Bay Area Typographical Union 21, and retiree Ralph Kessler, a member of San Francisco-Oakland Mailers Union 18.

The injunction would seek to prevent the current ITU executive council from taking any "irrevocable steps" or spending any union funds to change the future structure of the ITU, "including any merger or affiliation, until the completion of any rerun to any of the executive council offices that were the subject of protest following the November 1983 election."

The suit also seeks to require the executive council members to repay to the union "all expenditures authorized by them" in violation of the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act of 1959, including all "funds expended on behalf of or in furtherance of a merger" with the IBT. It also asks for both compensatory and punitive damages, charging that the rights of the ITU members have been violated under various labor and pension laws.

Purposeful actions

The suit contends that the defendants "have engaged in a series of actions which, while entirely illegal, inconsistent and discriminatory in their application of both ITU and federal law, have had one entirely consistent purpose and effect—to prevent a properly elected executive council majority opposed to an immediate Teamster merger from taking office before the demise of an independent, AFL-CIO-affiliate ITU was a fait accompli."

The Merger Committee for One Big Printing Union, comprising ITU local officers opposed to merger with the Teamsters, expressed its support for the suit. The committee alerted local officers to sections of the Teamsters constitution that might not appeal to ITU members. A separate memorandum noted the salary of Teamsters President Jackie Presser and his powers under the IBT constitution.

In a related action, the Canadian Labor Congress reiterated its opposition to the merger.

CLC President Dennis McDermott said the ITU's Canadian caucus "made a wise decision in inviting Canadian members to vote against the merger with the Teamsters, who are outside the mainstream of the trade union movement in Canada."

He warned that the merger would "cut the long-standing ties of solidarity and friendship between their union and the rest of the labor movement in Canada."

Union-Industries Show opens May 11 in Memphis

The 1984 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show will open May 11 at the Cook Convention Center in Memphis, Tenn.

More than 200,000 visitors are expected to attend the six-day free public exposition which will include a wide variety of live craft and skill demonstrations by union workers as well as displays and working exhibits prepared by employers.

The show is produced annually by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

OSHA asbestos proposal scored

By Arlee C. Green

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposed revision of the asbestos standard is "just another public relations move by OSHA to give the appearance of protecting workers," the AFL-CIO charged.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, termed the revised proposal "outrageous and irresponsible." Although it may reduce the exposure level, it also allows employers for the first time to rely on respirators as a primary means of control, Seminario pointed out.

Exposure level

The OSHA proposal would reduce the ceiling on worker exposure to asbestos from the current 2 million fibers per cubic meter of air over eight hours to either 500,000 fibers or 200,000 fibers—depending on the testimony at public hearings scheduled to open June 19.

Seminario said the AFL-CIO supports and will continue to seek a standard with a maximum exposure level of 100,000 fibers. She noted that both OSHA and the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health had recommended a limit of 100,000 fibers in 1980.

OSHA estimates that some 375,000 workers are exposed to asbestos on the job in manufacturing, construction, automotive, shipbuilding and ship repair. It estimates that using respirators to reduce exposure levels from 2 million fibers to 500,000 fibers would cost agout $66 million initially and over $53 million annually. The number of excess worker deaths would drop from 64 per 1,000 to 17 per 1,000, according to the agency.

Dropping the limit to 200,000 fibers would cost $68 million initially and nearly $56 million annually, while reducing the number of deaths to 7 per 1,000.

Seminario said the proposed standard has nothing to do with "feasibly controlling asbestos. The revisions were put out with a lot of fanfare, but the proposal is not what is needed because it's not protective." She pointed out that the number of excess worker deaths would drop to 3 per 1,000 if the exposure level were reduced to 100,000 fibers.

OSHA issued an emergency standard on asbestos in November 1983, but this was ruled invalid last month by the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. That measure called for limiting asbestos exposure to 500,000 fibers per cubic meter of air.

Seminario said labor supports OSHA's plan to consider a separate final standard for the construction industry, but she said "such a standard should mandate work practice controls because of the very nature of that industry."

The Environmental Protection Agency said it has reinstated standards for exposure to asbestos on the job that were invalidated by the Supreme Court for technical reasons six years ago.

Among other things, the rules require that asbestos removed from buildings during demolition not be thrown to the ground or to a lower floor and that it be kept wet until removed from the premises. Also, the surfacing of roadways with asbestos-containing waste would be prohibited, as would the use of insulation containing asbestos.

Insurance claims

Meanwhile, seven asbestos manufacturers and their insurance carriers agreed to establish a third-party "asbestos claims facility" to help settle the thousands of health-injury claims against the industry.

Such a facility reportedly would provide a prompt, fair alternative to lengthy court battles. The facility would have the authority to settle current and future claims and would serve to keep asbestos producers from filing for bankruptcy protection against their future liabilities, as the Manville Corp. did.

Three more officials pull out of Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. announced the departure of three more high-level officials, including Mark Cowan, who will leave his post as chief of staff to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan on Apr. 20.

Paul Russo, deputy under secretary of labor for intergovernmental affairs, resigned to become chief labor affairs officer for the Reagan-Bush Re-Election Committee, and John J. O'Donnell, former president of the Air Line Pilots, has retired as assistant secretary of labor for legislative affairs.

The announcement came less than a week after Thorne Auchter stepped down as Assistant Secretary of Labor for occupational safety and health to take a post as head of a Midwest construction company. The firm, B. B. Andersen Cos., was excused from paying a $12,600 fine while Auchter headed the job safety agency.

voke, weaken or suspend existing health standards."

On wage standards, Taylor testified, "the department reversed a 40-year history under Democratic and Republican Administrations of consistent enforcement of the Davis-Bacon Act," which requires payment of prevailing wages and benefits on federally-financed construction. Instead, the Labor Dept. "gutted the effect of the legislation by regulatory action" and did the same on service contracts.

She cited recent House hearings that documented the "virtual abandonment" of enforcement of reporting requirements relating to the anti-union activities of management consultants, while the agency sought additional staff to investigate unions.

Taylor told the panel that under this Administration, "the political appointments at the Dept. of Labor from the Secretary through his Assistant Secretaries and their closest advisors predominently have come from the business community—company presidents, vice presidents or corporate management lawyers, and even from the employer-financed, anti-union National Right to Work Committee."

Without passing judgment on motives, Taylor said, "caution should be exercised in evaluating the program judgments of these people whose natural constituency is not the worker, the unemployed or the poor."

White House inaction hit

Economy threatened by rising trade deficit

The Reagan Administration's unwillingness to take steps to halt the decline of the nation's trading position with other countries is a threat to economic well-being, the AFL-CIO warned Congress.

Its attitude can only be viewed as "studied indifference," Federation Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald told a House Ways & Means subcommittee holding hearings on the massive trade deficit posted by the United States in recent years.

"While noting the record U.S. trade deficits, President Reagan merely reiterates his belief in free trade, and rejects governmental action in the apparent hope that problem will correct itself at some point in the future," Oswald observed.

"The tragedy of this approach is that the United States is frequently left defenseless in the international arena."

The concept of free trade and a free market is a myth, which foreign competitors long ago acknowledged, Oswald told the panel chaired by Rep. Sam Gibbons (D-Fla.).

Trade barriers

"Other countries see trade as a means to the larger goal of balanced economic development and employment," he said. Accordingly, their governments have established quotas, stringent inspection requirements, exchange rate manipulations, export subsidies and other policies to protect their markets, Oswald told the subcommittee.

Meanwhile, the U.S. market remains wide open to an ever-increasing volume of imports, he noted.

"This trade policy framework, together with the ill-conceived monetary and fiscal policies of the Administration, has contributed significantly to the massive trade deficits the United States faces today," he said.

"The sharp deterioration of the U.S. international economic position in recent years has had a profound and negative impact on scores of domestic industries and millions of American workers."

Record deficit

The nation's merchandise trade deficit reached a record $69.4 billion in 1983, 63 percent higher than the previous record of $42.7 billion set the year before. The Administration concedes that the trade imbalance will likely soar to $115 billion this year. Data Resources, Inc., of Cambridge, Mass., has estimated that this deterioration in the U.S. trade position will cost the nation more than 2.5 million jobs, three-quarters of which are in the manufacturing sector.

The United States recorded surpluses in only two merchandise trade sectors in 1983—agriculture products and chemicals. The U.S. trade position in manufactured products collapsed.

Contributing to the economic decline, the Administration's huge budget deficits and the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policies have kept U.S. interest rates high, encouraging massive capital inflows to the United States and keeping the dollar artificially strong. This, in turn, has made imports more attractive and held down export of American goods.

Oswald urged Congress to adopt trade law reform measures to protect U.S. industries and workers, along with a restructuring of monetary and fiscal policy, enactment of an industrial policy, and active intervention in foreign financial markets.

Tighter laws

U.S. trade law must be strengthened to reflect international trading realities, he emphasized.

Legislation is urgently needed to tighten and streamline laws already on the books, such as the Trade Act of 1974, that were designed to relieve industries and workers injured by imports, he said. Statutory improvements should assure, among other things, that the International Trade Commission evaluates more quickly and accurately the impact of imports on a particular industry and its workers through more specific criteria.

To address the problem of the overvalued dollar, Oswald recommended that the United States pursue a policy of currency market intervention, both unilaterally and in conjunction with other countries.

Adoption of a rational and coherent industrial policy also is of major importance to the future health of the U.S. economy, he stressed.

Labor educators focus on election

Chicago—The techniques of educating workers on political campaign issues was the focus of the annual AFL-CIO Education Conference here.

The four-day session, which drew some 130 union and university labor educators, was held jointly by the federation's Dept. of Education with the University & College Labor Educators Association. AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields cochaired the conference with UCLEA President Richard Hindle.

At the one-day session limited to union educators, James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, underscored the importance of educating members on the election issues. He detailed the economic issues of the Administration-induced recession, high unemployment and a dubious economic recovery.

Citing various polling techniques, Kennedy stressed that President Reagan did poorly in the polls when his name was linked to "fairness." Kennedy noted, however, that "voters don't associate the President with most of the disasters and scandals of his Administration."

Karen Wellisch, executive director of the Chicago chapter of the National Organization for Women, discussed the "gender gap" that exists between women and the Reagan Administration. She stressed the need for a voter registration drive aimed at working women.

Chicago Tribune reporter James Warren gave an analysis of the Illinois primary and explained how the labor movement got tagged by the press with the label "special interests."

Some two dozen mini-workshops covered such topics as computers, pre-retirement education and programs for women, minorities, immigrants, plant closings, and introducing labor to high school students.

In a session on collective bargaining, Seth Rosen of the Air Line Pilots explained the impact of company bankruptcy tactics on airline negotiations. Art Shy of the Auto Workers presented a slide show on a Michigan labor history project, and Cesare Poloni, chief of the Workers Education Bureau of the International Labor Organization held a workshop on technology changes.

Programs needed

Missouri AFL-CIO President Daniel J. (Duke) McVey, in a discussion of the challenges facing labor educators, cited the need to train union officials to speak to community groups and schools, the need for on-going education programs for members, and the need to maintain sufficient funding of university programs on labor education.

A memorial tribute was paid to Barbara Wertheimer, a professor at the New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations at Cornell University and director of Cornell's Institute for Women & Work, who died last year. Her husband, Clothing & Textile Workers Vice President Val Wertheimer, died in 1978.

Steelworkers, HRDI explore help for displaced workers

Local leaders of the Steelworkers from areas battered by layoffs and plant closings explored ways the trade union movement can help its members whose jobs are wiped out.

The first two in a planned series of leadership seminars were held in Pittsburgh and Chicago, cosponsored by the USWA and the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute. They were arranged by an international union task force headed by John T. Smith, assistant to USWA Vice President Leon Lynch.

No recalls

Smith stressed in opening the seminars that the restructuring of the steel industry has resulted in a permanent loss of jobs and that there is no end-of-the-recession recall for many workers.

At U.S. Steel Corp. alone, the most recent wave of layoffs affects more than 15,400 workers in eight states.

The USWA takes seriously its obligation to help its displaced members in every way possible, Smith stressed, and the seminars are intended to help acquaint local union leaders with the assistance available from community, union, education and government facilities.

Both seminars included AFL-CIO Community Services representatives from localities with heavy steel industry unemployment who spoke of the community resources to help with the multitude of problems stemming from joblessness.

HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold and Assistant Director Rod DuChemin urged the value of union-sponsored workshops to provide "first aid" to displaced workers—giving them the information they need on meeting immediate needs and exploring available retraining opportunities. HRDI Program Specialist Tony Sarmiento discussed the mechanics of organizing a workshop and encouraging worker participation.

Arnold also discussed the programs for dislocated workers provided under the Job Training Partnership Act, and representatives of state JTPA agencies described programs now under way in Pennsylvania, Indiana and Illinois.

Ralph Johnson, a former steelworker who is now a professor at the University of Alabama's Center for Labor Education, noted that job loss is much more stressful now than in previous years when alternate employment was more readily available. The byproducts include mental depression, drinking problems, divorce and health problems, he said. Support from the union can be "critically important" in minimizing stress, Johnson said.

Guild presses full access to Olympics

The Newspaper Guild has called on the U.S. Olympic Committee and Congress to support the right of an American-funded radio network to have its reporters accredited to the summer Olympic games in Los Angeles.

Reporters from Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty were barred from the winter games in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, in what Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., termed "a capitulation to Soviet pressure."

The stations, funded by congressional appropriations, broadcast from Munich, Germany, to eastern European countries in the Soviet orbit and to the Soviet Union.

The Newspaper Guild represents some of the reporters for the stations, but Perlik said the union would be "equally outraged" if its members weren't involved.

Urging strong efforts to assure full accreditation for the stations at the Los Angeles games, Perlik wrote Rep. Daniel A. Mica (D-Fla.) that it is "unthinkable that journalists for an American broadcasting station should be prohibited from covering an international event on American territory."

Mica is chairman of a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee that has scheduled a hearing on the controversy after Congress returns from its Easter recess, and Perlik welcomed the announcement.

The "shameful" action at the winter games was clearly "based on political considerations" and violated the principles of a free press, Perlik said.

Sunshine Politics

THE MESSAGE that President Reagan brought on his avowedly nonpolitical forays into a Ford assembly plant near Kansas City and a home construction site in Dallas bubbled with optimism.

"The sun is shining on a strong economy," the President declared, and anyone who says differently is guilty of spreading "gloom and doom."

A 57-39 majority of the Senate apparently believed him. It rejected a modest proposal to continue health insurance protection for unemployed workers who lost their coverage when they lost heir jobs.

The House passed such a bill last year. But Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.) said it isn't needed now because "the unemployment rate had dropped rather dramatically."

Sen. John Heinz of Pennsylvania had sought to include the health insurance measure in a tax bill before the Senate. Heinz also is a Republican. But he knows that people are still losing their jobs in Pennsylvania—and their health insurance.

The busy assembly line that President Reagan visited provided an enticing "photo opportunity" for his re-election campaign. It was scouted out by the White House staff for just that reason.

But some of the reporters covering the media event dug a bit deeper and found that the double shift and apparent prosperity was a byproduct of plant closings from California to Pennsylvania—and that more than 600 workers from those plants were still unemployed.

OVER ON the House side of the Capitol, where the Democrats have a majority, the House Banking Committee approved the labor-supported industrial policy bill introduced by Rep. John LaFalce (D-N.Y.), although not by the wide margin it deserved.

It includes both a Council on Industrial Competitiveness—to be drawn from government, business, labor and the public—and a bank that would support private sector lending to modernize older industries and assist emerging industries. A companion measure would foster research to keep the United States in the forefront of technological development.

Republicans on the committee plan to offer a substitute when the measure gets to the House floor.

Instead of doing anything about America's eroding industrial base, it would set up a council "to look at our troubled industries."

To such a proposal, the most apt comment is the phrase that has been making the political circuit this primary season, "Where's the beef?"

The Coalition Builder

IN OUR COUNTRY'S history, there has been no more successful alliance for social progress than the coalition that has bound together the civil rights movement and the labor movement for 40 years.

Clarence Mitchell, more than any other man, made that coalition work on Capitol Hill.

He understood that the fight for human rights cannot be fragmented. He knew that the fight for racial justice, economic justice, justice toward women is one fight, and that nobody is exempt by the accident of sex or race or income from bearing a part in the struggle.

When the battle moved to Capitol Hill with the long struggle for Civil Rights Act, the Voting Rights Act and the Fair Housing Act, it was the extraordinary skill and perseverance of Clarence Mitchell that brought victory.

We are proud that the AFL-CIO was at his side throughout these struggles.

And we are proud that in all of the battles for a fair minimum wage, occupational safety and health or labor law reform, Clarence Mitchell and the NAACP stood with us.

—From remarks by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a memorial service for Clarence Mitchell, Apr. 11, 1984.

Interest-free loans widen decency issue for Reagan

By Press Associates, Inc.

The President of the United States was "an amiable man of no lofty intellectual or moral stature; he had no conspicuous urge to improve anything. . . . And he was subsequently discovered to have had among his buddies in office some egregious grafters."

That was Warren G. Harding, as described by 1920s chronicler Frederick Lewis Allen.

That betrayal by his cronies from Ohio was said to have broken Harding's health and led to his death in 1923. He was succeeded by Calvin Coolidge, a tight-lipped conservative who believed "the business of America is business."

While Coolidge napped afternoons in the quiet of the White House, the Harding appointees continued their corrupt practices.

The worst scandal involved the betrayal of the nation's defense and conservation policies. Interior Sec. Albert Fall took an interest-free, unsecured "loan" of $100,000 and bonds worth $260,000 from two oil magnates in exchange for leases on the naval oil reserves at Teapot Dome, Wyo., and Elk Hills, Calif. Fall went to jail while the two bribers profited by some $100 million and went unpunished.

Prosperity myth

If business did better than ever before, the "Coolidge prosperity" proved a myth. The excesses of big business, the open shop campaign to destroy unions, the corruption of government, the unbalanced economy which left 60 percent of the people below the poverty line—all set the stage for the Great Depression.

Hopefully, the 1980s will not have a similar ending, although the parallels are scary.

The tone of the Reagan era was set when corporations and wealthy friends kicked upward of $10 million for the gaudiest inaugural ever. Reagan moved into the White House, took down Truman's picture and put up Coolidge's.

The White House, normally thought of as belonging to the people, needed some fixing up. Mrs. Reagan rejected $50,000 in public funds and the Reagan's solicited private contributions. A few weeks after Reagan decontrolled the price of domestic oil, some $270,000 poured in from oil executives. Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) called it "as blatant a presidential conflict as I can recall in more than 20 years I've been in Congress."

Questionable dealings

In three years, the Reagan Administration has chalked up some 40 cases of alleged conflicts of interest or improper financial dealings.

The most publicized case to date involves Reagan's closest buddy, Edwin Meese III, whose troubles started after Reagan nominated him to be Attorney General, a move seen as positioning him for a Supreme Court seat. Senate investigators found out Meese had not reported accepting interest-free, unsecured loans from people who later received government appointments. Meese denies any connection.

What standard of ethics should be applied to the President's men and women?

Former Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox notes that simple ethical guides have governed for a long time: public office must never be used or appear to be used for personal gain.

Reagan prefers a different standard. At his Apr. 4 press conference, he said "nothing but the highest integrity is required of those who serve in government." He then added, "you are innocent until proven guilty." That sets a pretty low standard, considering it took nearly a decade to round up the Teapot Dome characters.

The planned recession which brought misery to millions, the assault on unions, the rollback of welfare support, the attempts to gut social security, the $750 billion tax giveaway to business—all this has sown the seeds of discord for some time to come.

On Election Day, the people will have a chance to restore decency and fairness to their government.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Bankruptcy Deadline Extended; Urge Senate to OK Contract Protections

The Senate failed to meet its March 31 deadline for passage of legislation to reform bankruptcy courts, so Congress extended the current system to May 1, and as the AFL-CIO News went to press, began efforts to re-extend the deadline to May 25.

This means that union members have a few more days to consolidate Senate support for legislation to overrule the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision and prohibit misuse of corporate bankruptcy to break union contracts.

The House already passed legislation which would (1) require companies filing for bankruptcy to try to negotiate their way out of financial difficulty, instead of unilaterally breaking contracts, and (2) declare that bankruptcy judges, not company management, could allow breaking of union contracts--only as a last resort to prevent financial collapse and loss of all jobs.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to support legislation to safeguard union contracts during corporate bankruptcy proceedings (see sample message, right).

U.S. Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Senator _____ :

As a registered voter from (city) and member of (union and local #), I am concerned that the Supreme Court's Bildisco decision will allow employers to misuse bankruptcy law to break union contracts.

I urge you to approve, as part of any bankruptcy bill that comes before the Senate, language prohibiting employers from unilaterally breaking contracts upon filing under Chapter 11. And legislation should provide that bankruptcy judges authorize breaking of contracts only as a last resort, to prevent financial collapse and loss of all jobs.

Sincerely,

Reagan 'Brain Trust' Would End Worker Rights in Second Term

Working people have come to realize President Reagan's government is more hostile than any administration in decades to the interests of average working families. Nothing showed this more clearly than Reagan's willingness sit by while millions of people lost their jobs during the worst postwar recession--or his eagerness to cut or eliminate badly needed help.

You Ain't Seen Nothin' Yet

But if you think the first three years of Reagan have been bad, you'd better hope he doesn't get a second term. A new Heritage Foundation document reveals a blueprint for four more years. This 75-page outline shows that the damage done so far is nothing compared to what the Reagan brain trust has in mind.

The Heritage Foundation is the right-wing think tank that provided the Reagan Administration with policy papers containing many of the bad ideas put into effect during 1981-84. So, its platform for a second Reagan term must, unfortunately, be taken seriously. Many former Heritage employees are now in high-level government jobs, and former Reagan officials, such as National Security Advisor Richard Allen, now work for Heritage.

SOME OF THE REAGAN 'ACCOMPLISHMENTS' OF 1981-84:

- Reagan budget cuts eliminated the public works job-creation program, reduced education funding 20 percent, added new restrictions to eligibility for unemployment compensation, and cut health care for the poor by $1 billion.
- Reagan demagoguery and threats about Social Security led to changes the eventually will raise the retirement age to 67.
- The Reagan tax legislation nearly eliminated the corporate income tax. It now comprises only six percent of federal tax receipts. In many industries the tax rate is negative--companies get money from the government.
- Reagan "hands-off" trade policy has done nothing to open foreign markets to U.S products. The trade imbalance jumped to a record $59 billion, causing U.S. job losses in the millions. The Reagan Caribbean Basin bill, which expands duty-free access to U.S. markets, will cause further job losses.
- Davis-Bacon: Candidate Reagan promised not to seek repeal of this law, which guarantees fair wages on federally contracted construction work. Instead of seeking repeal, President Reagan's Dept. of Labor weakened the rules used to enforce it.
- The Trade Adjustment Assistance program, which provides worker retraining and compensation in industries hurt by imports, was targeted for extinction by Reagan. It was cut 80 percent, and he's still trying to eliminate it.
- OSHA/MSHA job safety laws: weakening of standards for hazardous substances, fewer inspectors, wholesale exemptions, "slap on the wrist" fines.

THESE ARE THE HERITAGE FOUNDATION'S PROPOSALS FOR A SECOND REAGAN TERM:

ISSUE		COMMENT
UNION SECURITY	-- Heritage Foundation recommends changing the law to treat labor unions as a violation of antitrust law.	So far the Reagan Administration has worked to weaken unions. In a second term we can expect attempts to eliminate unions.
JOBS	-- End "voluntary restrictions" on Japanese exports to the United States. (Such voluntary agreements currently limit imports of Japanese cars, for example, to 1.85 million vehicles per year.) -- Discontinue defense appropriations amendments that target contracts to areas of the country with high unemployment. -- Repeal Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law. -- Eliminate Trade Adjustment Assistance. -- Eliminate federal unemployment compensation "to reduce incentives for workers to accept voluntary unemployment." Replace with unemployment loans that would have to be repaid with interest. Unemployment compensation "makes layoffs more attractive" because workers enjoy "added leisure time." -- Establish a subminimum wage for teenagers, and freeze the regular minimum wage at $3.35 per hour.	Reaganites will not be satisfied until Japan takes 50 percent or more of basic U.S. industries such as autos and steel. But they take a strict "hands off" policy regarding foreign countries' quotas on U.S. products. And the message they give to laid-off workers is: "It's your own fault. So don't expect jobs programs, don't expect unemployment compensation, don't expect job retraining. Don't even expect us to target defense contracts on depressed areas of the country." For the lucky few who manage to hold onto a job, the Reagan brain trust urges wage cuts. And adult workers are to be replaced with teenagers, who can afford to work for subminimum wages.
TAXES	-- Reduce corporate tax rate. -- Replace corporate depreciation allowances for plant, vehicles, etc. with immediate "expensing"--in short, faster, more generous tax deductions for corporations. -- Tuition tax credits for families who can afford private schools.	President Reagan once betrayed his feelings when he suggested that the corporate income tax should be eliminated. He has made substantial progress toward that goal. With corporations paying less, you pay more.
CONSUMER PRICES	-- Accelerate decontrol of natural gas prices. -- Repeal automobile fuel economy rules. -- Increase tolls on interstate roads and bridges.	Four more years of Reagan means higher prices, higher taxes for working people, higher profit levels for corporations.
JOB SAFETY	-- Use "cost-benefit analysis" more extensively in setting OSHA/MSHA job safety and health rules.	This means placing a dollar value on human life.

Unions rally aid in hotel strike

Thousands of Las Vegas union members and their families join in a solidarity march for striking hotel workers.

Fund set up by federation in Vegas fight

By Susan Dunlop

The bitter strike by 17,000 union members at many major Las Vegas hotels ended its third week with workers determined to hold out against employer demands for devastating cuts in wages and working conditions.

The striking members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, the Musicians and the Stage Employees dramatized their solidarity on Apr. 14 with a massive, peaceful march the length of the city's casino strip.

They were bolstered by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's announcement that the federation has set up a strike assistance fund to help them fight back against employers determined "to bust their contracts and their unions."

Two HERE locals and the musicians and stagehands struck 32 Las Vegas hotel-casinos Apr. 2, after the owners—led by the 20-member Nevada Resorts Association—turned down terms of a settlement reached with other major hotels and instead demanded stiff concessions.

Among those demands, the employers want to slash the guaranteed workweek from 40 hours to 20 hours, a move the workers say could mean economic disaster for themselves and their families.

7,500 march

An estimated 7,500 marchers participated in a two-hour "solidarity march" along a three-mile stretch of the Las Vegas Strip where many struck hotels are situated.

The march, described by local authorities as orderly and peaceful, was joined by a number of supportive trade unionists, including Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez.

Although the marchers were not subjected to assaults by hotel security guards or the widespread arrests by county police that occurred at some earlier demonstrations, at least 80 demonstrators were arrested later in the day while attempting to conduct a silent vigil outside the struck MGM Grand Hotel to protest the hotel's reopening of a stage show.

Coors connection brews questions on OSHA favors

Democrats in Congress want an investigation into allegations that the Coors family used its right-wing political connections to shield the Coors brewery and its subsidiaries from enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) cited mounting evidence that Thorne G. Auchter, who recently resigned as director of OSHA, had applied a double standard to enforcement of the law.

Obey told House members that Coors facilities in the Denver area were inspected only four times during the 33 months that Auchter was in office compared with 20 inspections over the previous 33 months. Three of those four inspections were compelled by accidents that resulted in death or serious injury because of the company's failure to follow proper safety and health practices, Obey said.

One instance that resulted in the death of two workers and permanent injury to a third brought a fine of only $810, Obey charged. In another case, he said, a fatal accident brought a $710 fine.

Obey and Kennedy both cited the apparent retaliation against an OSHA regional director who was demoted after he angered the head of the Coors company by trying to inspect the firm's porcelain plants.

Bills pushed to bolster basic civil rights laws

By David L. Perlman

Legislation to strengthen the nation's civil rights laws and remedy a Supreme Court decision which weakened the government's ability to act against discrimination has been introduced in Congress with bipartisan support and labor's strong endorsement.

"We will do all we can to assure passage," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged.

Bills introduced in the House and Senate would assure that institutions and activities receiving federal funds do not discriminate in any of their functions on the basis of race, sex, religion, national origin, age or handicap.

Narrow reading

Most members of Congress thought that's what the various civil rights laws already provide. But the Supreme Court ruled differently in a recent decision involving interpretation of a law that bars sex discrimination in educational activities receiving federal aid.

A 6-3 majority of the Supreme Court adopted the Reagan Administration's controversial interpretation that the cutoff of federal aid applied only to a specific program that discriminated on the basis of sex. That reading of the law would allow a college to continue to receive federal funds for other programs that were not discriminatory.

While the Grove City College decision dealt only with sex bias in education, its principles were widely viewed as a threat to other federal laws that use a cutoff of federal funds as a weapon against discrimination.

A majority of the Senate has already joined Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) as cosponsors of the bill supported by labor and all elements of the civil rights coalition. Both Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R-Tenn.) and Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) are among the sponsors.

The House version, first introduced by Representatives Paul Simon (D-Ill.) and Don Edwards (D-Calif.), already has some 70 cosponsors, with others expected to

Long tradition for labor

Political activism deeply rooted

By Henry C. Fleisher

Organized labor's vigorous participation in the 1984 election campaign evolves from a long tradition of political activity by American trade unionists stretching back more than a century and a half.

Then as now the objective was to elect to government office candidates friendly to the labor movement and concerned with the public interest. The philosophy that "what's good for America is good for labor" is scarcely the expression of a narrow "special interest," as some observers would depict labor.

America's early trade unions were decentralized and often very weak. But their irregular, rather sporadic history shows that they recognized the critical role of political action in fighting for better conditions and higher living standards. A few examples:

- The Workingmen's Party was established in 1828 by the Mechanics Union of Trade Associations in Philadelphia. In 1829, the New York Workingmen's Party elected Ebenezer Ford, a carpenter, to the state legislature.
- Other labor parties in various cities usually lasted no more than a single election or for the duration of a single issue, but occasionally they were successful.
- The National Labor Union's decision at its 1868 convention to create a labor party was inspired by William Sylvis, a pioneer in the Molders Union. Sylvis, whose NLU reached a peak membership of 600,000—very large for its time—envisioned the labor party as a means of bringing about drastic reforms in the economic and social systems.

No dreamer of small dreams, Sylvis set as a goal for his projected new labor party the winning of the presidential election in 1872, as well as majority control of Congress and state legislatures. But Sylvis died in 1869 at the age of 47 and the party of his dreams never materialized.

- The Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions, at its founding convention in 1881, set as a first objective the passage of eight-hour day laws by the states and the federal government, a goal that obviously required both legislative and political activity.

The new organization, which five years

Wire service short circuit

Newspaper Guild members set up informational picket lines at the offices of Reuter news service in New York, Washington and Chicago to protest a 16-month deadlock in negotiations for a new contract. Reuter employees have been operating under new company-imposed work rules since the impasse.

Industrial policy bill gains as IUD spurs local support

The House Banking Committee approved a labor-urged industrial policy bill by a close vote and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. is setting grass-roots fires across the country to expand its support in Congress.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.), would establish a 16-member Council on Industrial Competitiveness, whose members would be drawn equally from government, business, labor and the public.

It would make recommendations on measures needed to shore up key industries, and a Bank for Industrial Competitiveness would be launched with a capitalization of $8.5 billion in federal funds for loan guarantees and stock purchases to finance modernization. Primary funding for modernization would come, however, from the private sector.

While the bill cleared committee by a 25-16 vote—with all Republicans opposed—the key provision for an industrial bank was retained only by a 22-20 vote.

To build pressure on Congress for action on this and related job-saving bills such as plant closing legislation, the IUD has scheduled a series of regional one-day conferences for local and state union leaders.

The first event, on Apr. 13, was a seven-state conference in Denver, with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers as the host union. Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall was among the speakers and representatives of the NAACP took part along with union officials.

It was followed by an Ohio conference, in Akron, with the Rubber Workers as host union. A five-state southern regional conference will be held in Atlanta Apr. 25, with the Clothing & Textile Workers as host. Ten other IUD conferences will be held during May and June.

The House Banking Committee also approved, 25-18, a companion bill to set up an Advanced Technology Foundation and an industrial extension service to promote research into technological moderni-

During the committee consideration of the bills, LaFalce said the goal of industrial strategy should be a diverse and internationally competitive economy that "to the maximum extent possible should be employment-oriented."

Rising interest rates blamed

Housing starts plunge by record 27 percent

An all-time record plunge in new housing starts led a series of negative signs indicating that the blush may be off the nation's economic recovery.

Construction of new houses and apartments dropped nearly 27 percent in March from the month before, the biggest one-month tumble that index has taken since the government began keeping track of the figures in 1959.

Deputy Director Henry Schechter of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research said rising interest rates were primarily to blame for the housing starts drop-off, with unusually severe weather also a factor.

Mortgage interest rates in many areas of the country are averaging nearly 14 percent and rising, which could prompt builders to cut back on new starts out of fear that the bottom will drop out of the housing market again.

The Commerce Dept.'s seasonally adjusted data showed that the annual rate of starts in March was about 1.6 million units, in sharp contrast to a rate of 2.2 million units in February, the highest in six years.

Building permits drop

In a separate index, the government reported that the number of building permits issued in March dropped at a seasonally adjusted rate of 12 percent from the previous month. In addition, the number of permits issued but not used in March was up 12 percent from February.

Schechter pointed out that even though there has been some softening in the availability of certain kinds of credit, indications that interest rates are creeping up and are likely to go even higher reinforce concerns that a new economic slump could result.

The Commerce Dept. also reported that the nation's gross national product grew at a brisk 8.3 percent during the first three months of this year, led by consumer spending and increases in inventories stocked by businesses.

However, another report from the department showed that as the quarter closed, consumer spending had begun to decline for both durable and non-durable goods, and personal income rose a modest five-tenths of 1 percent during March.

Personal consumption expenditures rose last month, but the department chalked up much of that increase to payments for higher utility bills brought on by the cold winter.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that producer prices rose five-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis from February to March. The rise was in line with increases for the two previous months, but significantly higher than for most months of 1983.

Within that index the BLS reported that prices for finished food products were up a seasonally adjusted eight-tenths of 1 percent, led by a 30 percent jump in the price of fresh fish. The wholesale food price increase followed a rise of seven-tenths of 1 percent in February and a 2.7 percent surge in January.

Energy index dips

The index for finished energy items fell by 1.2 percent overall after having gone up by four-tenths of 1 percent in February. Natural gas prices and gasoline prices declined, but prices for home heating oil were up.

Food and energy are the most volatile components of the producer price index and the BLS noted that when these are omitted, the index for other finished consumer goods rose nine-tenths of 1 percent in March compared with a rise of only two-tenths of 1 percent in the two previous months.

For the first quarter of the year, the producer price index for finished goods climbed at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.1 percent.

In another report, the Federal Reserve Board said industrial production went up only four-tenths of 1 percent last month, compared to increases of 1 percent in February and 1.4 percent in January. Monthly increases in this measure were about 1 percent through most of 1983.

Sales slip

The Commerce Dept. reported that retail sales dropped a steep 2.2 percent in March, the biggest monthly plunge for that index in some 10 years.

There was brighter news on state unemployment rates for February, which BLS said were below year-earlier levels on an unadjusted basis in every state except Alaska.

The agency's surveys showed New Hampshire at 5.1 percent and Connecticut at 5.2 percent with the lowest unemployment rates in February.

West Virginia continued to have the highest jobless rate, 16.5 percent, and eleven other states, Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia still posted double-digit unemployment rates.

Those states were Alabama at 12.8 percent; Alaska at 13.1 percent, up from 12.9 percent last year; Arkansas at 10 percent; Illinois at 10.1 percent; Indiana at 11 percent; Kentucky at 10.6 percent; Minnesota at 12.6 percent; Mississippi at 10.8 percent; Pennsylvania at 11 percent; and Washington at 11.8 percent, as well as Puerto Rico at 21 percent and D.C. at 12 percent.

Congress moves on taxes, deficit

The House and Senate approved separate versions of deficit-reducing legislation, leaving differences to be resolved in conference after Congress returns from its spring recess.

In the tax area, the House approved measures that will bring in an estimated $49.2 billion of new revenues over the next three years—partly by closing some tax loopholes and partly through temporary excise taxes which the AFL-CIO criticized as falling heaviest on workers.

The federation nevertheless supported the overall House bill, which was taken up under a no-amendment procedure.

On a companion deficit reduction bill, involving cost savings mandated by the budget resolution it passed, the House buckled under pressure from the American Medical Association and scuttled a provision to hold down Medicare costs.

It rejected by voice vote a proposal backed by the House Ways & Means Committee for a one-year freeze on physician fees paid by Medicare along with a requirement that doctors accept Medicare rates as "payment in full" for treating hospital patients.

Cuts that were adopted included limits on cost-of-living adjustments in pensions of federal, civilian and military personnel under the age of 62. The resolution did, however, expand Medicaid coverage for maternal and child care for the poor.

The Senate tax bill was slightly under the House version in total amount, but it included several labor-opposed revenue losers.

Among the plus factors were provisions similar to the House version curtailing various tax-shelter abuses and partially correcting some of the special-interest giveaways enacted in the early years of the Reagan Administration. The House did, however, reject by a 57-38 margin an attempt to delay tax indexing for three years, which would have raised an additional $51 billion in revenue.

Costly bills

The labor-opposed revenue-losers included:

- A new program of foreign sales corporations (FSCs), which would have many of the disadvantages of the domestic international sales corporations (DISCs) that it is intended to replace. Both involve tax advantages for overseas operations of U.S. firms. The AFL-CIO's position is that "such tax gimmicks cost billions in revenue but provide no meaningful benefit in terms of improved trade performance or increased unemployment."

- The Enterprise Zone plan of tax and regulatory benefits proposed by the Administration as an incentive to businesses to locate in depressed urban areas. The AFL-CIO's position is that the enterprise zones won't create any additional jobs and will drain the Treasury of revenues that could be used to directly fight urban problems.

- An extension of the so-called Targeted Jobs Tax Credit, which the AFL-CIO said has not generated jobs or been of real help to anyone other than employers who get a tax windfall.

- A further expansion of the deductions allowed for individual retirement accounts that are primarily beneficial to affluent households.

During consideration of the bill, a labor-supported amendment by Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) to provide a program of continued health insurance for workers who lose their jobs was beaten, 57-39. (Rollcall, Page 14.)

The Senate is scheduled to take up a spending reduction bill after the Easter recess, with battles likely over proposals for limits on both defense and non-defense spending.

Coors connection brews questions and President Reagan have been longtime personal and political friends of Joseph Coors, a major contributor to right-wing political causes. Coors beer has been on the AFL-CIO boycott list for its union-busting tactics in breaking a strike by its workers.

Kennedy asked Senate Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) to schedule "a full and immediate investigation of an apparent pattern of favoritism shown by top officials of OSHA toward companies they are charged with regulating and, in particular, toward the Coors family company."

As further evidence "that favoritism may have become a way of life at OSHA," Kennedy noted the agency's dealings with the Kansas City construction company that Auchter now heads. He suggested that Auchter may have been "directly involved" in the decision by OSHA to drop $12,600 in proposed penalties against the B. B. Andersen Cos. "for serious and willful safety violations."

Kennedy said the Senate committee, which has jurisdiciton over the federal job safety agency, has an obligation to determine "if OSHA officials are engaging in a pattern of favoritism toward businesses they regulate."

Mondale lead stretches with Missouri win

Walter F. Mondale increased his delegate lead in the Democratic presidential contest with a decisive victory in Missouri and pickups in several smaller states.

Missouri's precinct-level caucuses on Apr. 18, marked by big turnouts, assured Mondale of at least 50 of the 75 delegates who will be formally elected at the state Democratic convention in June. Eleven other spots will be filled by state party and elected officials, most of whom are Mondale supporters.

Gary Hart and Jesse Jackson were far behind. Hart's press secretary dismissed the Missouri results as "all labor," and in a Texas campaign appearance, Hart renewed his attack on Mondale's ties with labor's "special interests."

Missouri was the biggest delegate prize between the Pennsylvania primary the previous week and the May 5 Texas caucuses.

Hart's only consolation has been a modest win in Arizona. There, he claimed 17 of the delegates selected in caucuses to 15 for Mondale and one for Jackson.

The Colorado senator made the best of it, hailing the Arizona outcome as "a clear and decisive victory" that foreshadows other gains in the West.

Alaska switch

But in Alaska, Hart saw his lead in an earlier first-round caucus disappear in the second-round balloting. Not-quite-complete returns indicated that Mondale would end up with seven of the state's 11 delegates. And in North Dakota, where 14 delegates were chosen at a state convention, Mondale picked up six of the nine committed delegates.

Hart hopes to pick up a few more delegates in late April caucuses in Vermont and Utah. And Jackson is favored in the District of Columbia's May 1 primary. Tennessee will choose its delegates that same day.

Much more will be at stake in the May 5 caucus in Texas and in five-state delegate battles the following week.

California lecturers pick AFT in election

Berkeley, Calif.—Lecturers in University of California system selected the Teachers-affiliated University Council in a representation election.

The unit of 1,877 mostly part-time instructors, voted 702 for AFT to 447 for no union. The University Council is comprised of eight AFT locals on each of the system's campuses.

House panel approves ceiling on natural gas rate escalation

A bipartisan coalition of the House Energy & Commerce Committee mustered a 22-20 majority for a consumer-oriented natural gas bill intended to hold down home heating costs.

The measure, backed by labor and consumer groups, contrasts with the total decontrol of natural gas prices urged by President Reagan.

It would put a ceiling on the price escalation allowed by a 1978 law, which has been largely responsible for the sharp rise in heating bills that has taken place in recent years despite the existence of price controls.

It would also retain indefinitely the price controls Reagan has sought to abolish on what is known as "old" gas—from wells that were in production before Apr. 20, 1977. About 40 percent of the nation's natural gas production comes from these wells, although the ratio will be declining as supplies are exhausted.

Natural gas from newer wells would be decontrolled after Jan. 1, 1985, as provided under current law, but other provisions in the bill would encourage renegotiation of existing high-priced contracts for future delivery of gas to bring down prices.

The compromise that broke a committee deadlock was put together largely by Rep. Philip R. Sharp (D-Ind.) and Rep. Edward R. Madigan (R-Ill.), with strong encouragement from Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.).

Dingell and most other Democrats had supported a stronger bill that included a rollback in existing price ceilings, as did the AFL-CIO and allied consumer groups. But a test vote last November showed that it lacked a committee majority.

On the compromise, four Republicans joined 18 Democrats in supporting the bill. The opposition came from a coalition of Republicans and Democrats from states that are producers of oil and gas opposing it.

The consumer-labor alliance is looking to home-state resentment of apparent price-gouging on fuel costs to tilt Congress to action this year. The Senate last year defeated by one-sided margins both the Reagan Administration decontrol proposal and the price rollbacks sought by labor.

Focus on issues

Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts warns the 200 delegates to the CWA legislative-political conference that if President Reagan is re-elected, he could appoint as many as five new Supreme Court justices—a move that could result in undermining basic protections of federal labor laws. Delegates voiced support for legislation on pension portability for Bell System workers and opposition to a measure deregulating the cable television industry. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue called on delegates to rally support for Walter F. Mondale.

Political action tradition traced to early years of labor movement

later became the American Federation of Labor, accepted a fundamental belief of its leader, Samuel Gompers, that labor must be non-partisan and independent of any political party. But that did not mean lack of interest in the political process or inactivity by workers and their unions.

● The great Labor Day parade of 1882 in New York City, the first in the nation, saw thousands of union members carrying banners about the eight-hour day, the naming of a Labor Day holiday, and protests against poor housing and gouging landlords.

Over the years, the AFL consistently declined to endorse presidential candidates, but leaders of various unions were openly aligned with the parties or candidates of their choice. As Federation President Lane Kirkland recalls that period of labor history, unions had "substantial leverage, not control, but avenues by which we could convey our views." For the most part, Kirkland notes, the system worked. In the 20th Century, he has pointed out, that political system "gave us Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman and Jack Kennedy," not a bad record at all.

But sometimes that system didn't work. In 1924, following what the AFL called "two of the most reactionary" Congresses in history, the federation was appalled by the choice of nominees of the two major parties. The Republicans named Calvin Coolidge, who reveled in his success in breaking the 1919 Boston policemen's strike, and the Democrats nominated John W. Davis, a conservative corporation lawyer, the compromise candidate of a drawn-out convention deadlock between Gov. Al Smith of New York and William McAdoo of California.

Breaking with past practice, the AFL endorsed Sen. Robert ("Fighting Bob") LaFollette, candidate of the Progressive Party, a hastily put-together coalition of farm, labor and liberal groups which sought an alternative to the major parties' Tweedledum and Tweedledee. LaFollette polled a respectable 17 percent of the vote.

Simple support

In endorsing LaFollette, the AFL said "no other course can be pursued if we are to remain true to our convictions and traditions." Nevertheless, the federation emphasized its abiding non-partisan philosophy by declining to be identified with an independent or third party movement; the endorsement and support were simply that, and no more.

A somewhat different and more activist course was adopted by the CIO, which was created a dozen years later by a group of leaders of industrial unions. It endorsed and worked intensely for the re-election of Franklin Roosevelt in 1936 and again in 1940 and 1944. It took similar action on behalf of Harry Truman in 1948 and Adlai Stevenson in 1952, the last election before the 1955 AFL-CIO merger.

In 1943, with the political campaign of 1944 in view, the CIO made another break with past practice. Under the joint proposals of President Philip Murray, who headed the Steelworkers, and Sidney Hillman, president of the Clothing Workers, the CIO created its own Political Action Committee—the nation's first "PAC."

Slander campaign

The uproar from opponents of FDR was loud and continuing. In a campaign not unlike that of 1984 against labor as a "special interest," Republicans spread the story that Roosevelt had knuckled under to union labor by telling political associates to "clear it with Sidney." The slander campaign failed; FDR was re-elected, and the CIO had a permanent political action organization.

In 1947, the AFL — incensed at the passage of the restrictive Taft-Hartley Act over President Truman's veto and the "tragic failure of the 80th Congress"—decided the times had made imperative "the need for sound political education and effective political action by organized labor."

The AFL convention that year created Labor's League for Political Education. In 1948, LLPE and CIO-PAC helped mobilize the winning votes for the re-election of the underdog Truman and produced what the AFL called a "stunning defeat" for the "lavishly financed reactionary interests and their advocates in Congress." Truman, in his formal post-election statement, credited union members' votes with providing his margin of victory.

Following the 1955 labor merger, CIO-PAC and LLPE became a single entity: the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, or COPE as it is commonly known. COPE does not itself make political policy, but carries out the policy and program of the AFL-CIO. It endeavors to provide information to union members on the issues and the candidates and to persuade them to register and to vote.

In the years after 1955, it was the policy of the AFL-CIO to decide on a Presidential endorsement, if any, only after the two political parties had completed their conventions, adopted their platforms and nominated candidates. But in 1968 there was a widespread feeling among union people that the nomination of Hubert Humphrey, a liberal and outstanding senator, was essential if Republican candidate Richard Nixon was to be defeated.

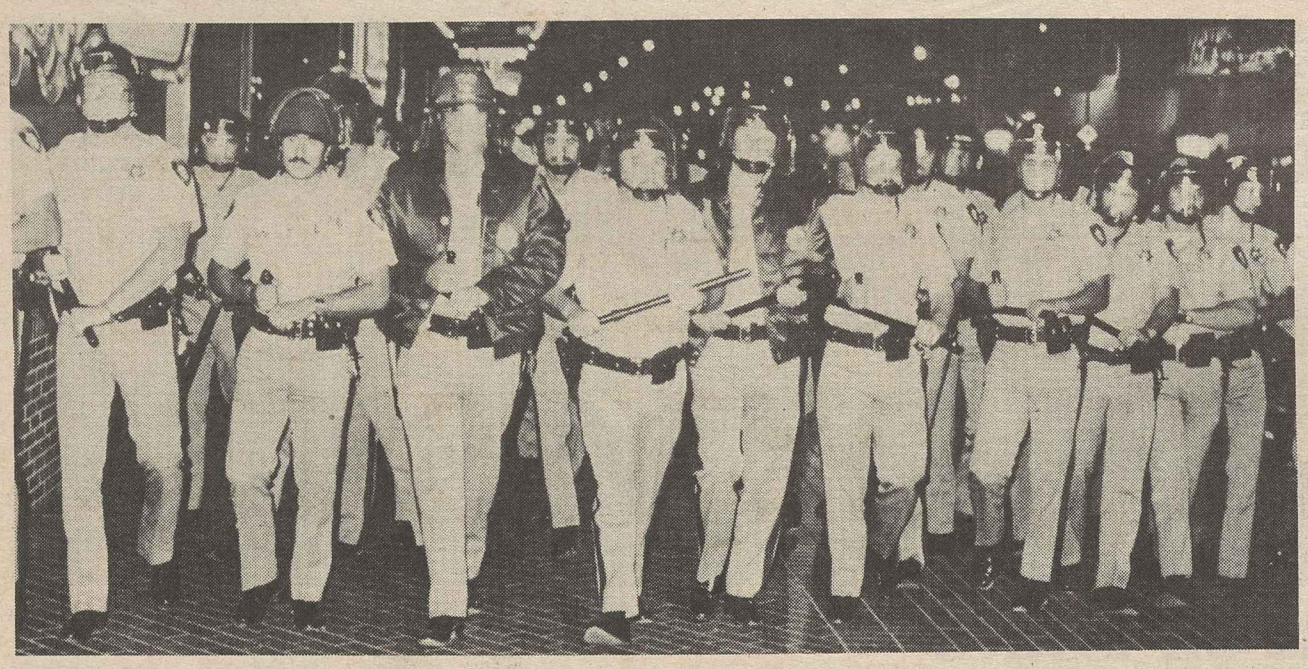
Humphrey effort

Kirkland recalls that after Lyndon Johnson's decision not to run for another presidential term in 1968, "we wanted Humphrey in that race. . . . I was involved with others in putting together a committee—a labor committee for Humphrey. It was an informal operation, but it had the blessing of George Meany (then the AFL-CIO president), or I wouldn't have been doing it. The members of our committee included every general officer of every affiliate of the AFL-CIO." The committee worked for Humphrey's nomination by the Democrats and continued to support his candidacy until the election—which Humphrey lost by a narrow margin.

Throughout the years, with changing tactics to deal with contemporary problems, the trade union movement has had one constant political philosophy—to decline to become a dependency, or an attachment, or an instrument of any national political party. That policy, however, leaves lots of room for flexibility and pragmatic judgments as to what course of political action will work best in a particular election. As in 1924, and 1936 and 1968, the AFL-CIO this year is functioning within its framework of organizational independence from political parties.

In the 1984 campaign, a great majority of unions and their members approved the AFL-CIO's early endorsement of Walter F. Mondale for President. No international union has endorsed any other candidate.

Back in 1982, Lane Kirkland, addressing a group of leaders of state federations of labor, talked about his hope for an early AFL-CIO endorsement of a presidential candidate and for united action in support. He told the union people: "God knows, we've tried everything else. Why don't we try a little unity?" This year, the unions have indeed been "trying unity."



Riot-equipped police advance on a silent vigil of strikers outside the MGM Grand Hotel in Las Vegas. About 80 demonstrators were arrested.

Vegas strikers press battle against union-busting hotels

Among those arrested was Robert F. Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. He was charged with criminal contempt and destruction of property and was later released.

HERE reported that the demonstrators were standing silently arm in arm on a sidewalk just outside the hotel when a large squad of police officers lined up in front of them and ordered them to disperse. When the demonstrators did not move, the police began making arrests.

MGM Grand, one of the largest hotels involved in the strike, was attempting to reopen a much pared-down version of its stage show "Jubilee" using scab labor.

Earlier, the hotel darkened its major showroom when Academy Award-winner Shirley MacLaine refused to cross picket lines.

HERE reported that since the strike began, about 400 persons have been arrested. Most of the charges have involved questions of the number of people permitted on picket lines by a court order.

Aid for strikers

The labor-wide effort to provide financial aid to the strikers was launched by the AFL-CIO on Apr. 17. In a letter to presidents of federation affiliates, Kirkland said the Executive Council had authorized a $20,000 contribution as a starter.

He charged that the hotel employers "have demanded sweeping changes in shifts and work rules which drastically alter established patterns. Aggressive use of hotel security guards inciting picket line violence and other management actions give every indication these employers are out to break the unions involved."

Kirkland asked affiliates able to help to send checks payable to the "AFL-CIO Strike Assistance Fund" to Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

Thousands of union members joined demonstrations on Apr. 19 in Boston, Denver, Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and Washington to show solidarity with the Las Vegas strikers and to protest incidents of violence against picketers. The rallies, organized by the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., were staged outside offices of key investors in Hilton Hotels and MGM Grand, Inc.

Customers alerted

Last week, the AFL-CIO put the struck hotels on the federation's unfair list and urged affiliates to alert members planning visits to the city about the strike. HERE has also begun leafletting customers of Hilton Hotels, Holiday Inns and Ramada Inns in other cities, urging them not to stay at the struck hotels in Las Vegas.

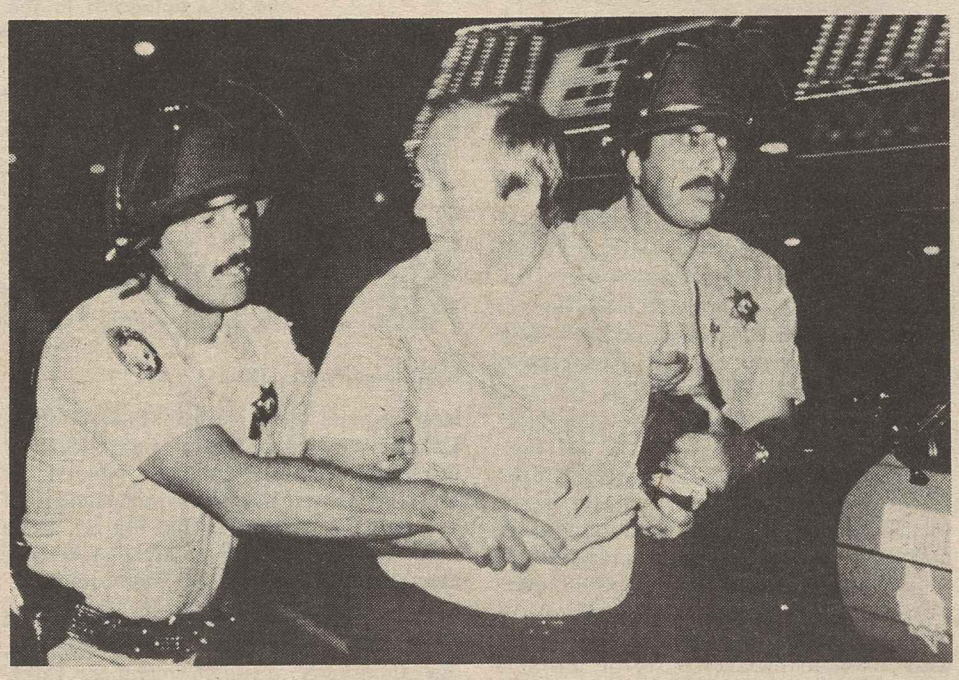
Las Vegas properties of the three big chains are the leaders of the Nevada Resorts Association.

Vincent Helm, executive director of the association, has been quoted as saying that because of "the national mood of the times toward unions" the employers chose this year to try to extract contract concessions such as a wage freeze and a slash in the guaranteed work week.

The HERE locals contend, however, that with current wages ranging from $6 to $10 an hour for non-tip workers and from $4.60 to $6.70 an hour for employees who also get tips, any cut in the guaranteed workweek will be a financial disaster for workers and their families.

In contrast, 24 hotels have come to agreement with the hotel unions on a new pact that will raise pay an average of $1.91 an hour over the four-year term for both tipped and non-tipped workers. The health and welfare programs were improved in those contracts covering some 15,000 workers.

At press time, the unions were called to the bargaining table where the Hilton hotel chain presented a new proposal.



President Robert F. Harbrant of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. is taken into custody during the silent vigil.

Louisiana labor spurs action to revitalize state's economy

Baton Rouge, La.—Louisiana's worst financial crisis in 20 years requires "drastic action" to get the state moving again and to provide needed services for its citizens, the State AFL-CIO declared at its 29th annual convention here.

A convention resolution fixed blame for the crisis on the policies of the Reagan Administration and outgoing Republican Gov. David Treen, charging they had failed to properly fund federal and state programs for children, the elderly, sick, poor, handicapped, and the unemployed.

Gov. Edwin Edwards, who returned to office last month after soundly defeating Treen, promised an effective jobs program and revitalization of programs that had severely degenerated under his predecessor's administration.

Edwards also pledged to make long overdue pay raises possible for state employees, improve Louisiana's public education system, and make improvements in highways, bridges, and other services for the public.

The convention noted that the state's economic crisis had sent Louisiana's unemployment rate to a level far above the national rate. The February jobless rate was 9.8 percent, with levels of 15 percent in some areas such as Lake Charles. Hardest-hit industries are manufacturing and construction.

State tax action

At a special session on the opening day of the three-day convention, the state legislature voted to raise $735 million through increased gasoline, sales, and hazardous waste taxes, effective July 1.

The 600 convention delegates adopted 49 other resolutions, including measures supporting a pay raise of at least 10 percent for all state employees, more equitable unemployment insurance benefits, and adequate workers' compensation benefits.

In another resolution, delegates charged that the state's so-called right-to-work law enacted in 1976 has wreaked havoc with Louisiana's economy, causing thousands of out-of-state workers and hundreds of out-of-state contractors to move into the state, lowering contract prices and wage rates and creating heavy unemployment and bankruptcy of many contractors and suppliers.

"Not a single new industry has been brought to Louisiana because of this infamous law," the measure said. A labor-endorsed bill to repeal the RTW law already has been prefiled in the state senate, which convenes this month.

The convention delegates re-elected Victor Bussie and Gordon Flory as president and secretary-treasurer, respectively.

Speakers included Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, Jr. (D-La), Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.), and a number of state officials.

Bills pushed to bolster rights laws sign on after Congress returns from its Easter recess.

With several committees sharing jurisdiction over the subject matter of the legislation, a measure introduced near the halfway mark of the second session of Congress normally would have little chance of enactment. But supporting groups have made clear that its passage is the highest priority on the civil rights agenda and both House and Senate hearings have been tentatively scheduled for May.

The bills would clarify the language of three other civil rights measures in addition to Title IX of the 1972 education law that was the subject of the Supreme Court decision. They are:

- Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits discrimination based on race, color or national origin in any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance.
- Sec. 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which bars discrimination against the handicapped in federally aided programs and activities.
- The Age Discrimination Act of 1975, which has a similar prohibition against discrimination based on age.

Language change

By changing the term "program and activities" in all four statutes to "recipients" and by including an appropriate definition, the legislation would overcome the narrow interpretation adopted by the Supreme Court and the Reagan Administration.

Kirkland expressed the AFL-CIO's strong support for the legislation which, he said, "would restore to full effectiveness" the four civil rights statutes weakened by the Supreme Court decision.

"Discrimination is wrong, whether it's based on race, sex, physical handicap or age," Kirkland stressed.

When the federal government gives financial assistance, whether to states or public or private institutions, it must be conditioned on "an enforceable obligation not to discriminate," Kirkland said. The only "proper standard," he insisted, is that an entire institution or government entity must adhere to the nondiscrimination standard when any of its component parts receives federal funds.

At the bipartisan Capitol Hill news conference announcing the introduction of the legislation, Republicans present said they did not know whether the Reagan Administration would actively oppose its passage —and implied they did not much care.

The bill will pass overwhelmingly "with or without Administration support," Packwood predicted.

Kennedy was likewise optimistic. The legislation, he said, will "send a message to the White House that the bipartisan coalition on civil rights is alive and well in Congress."

UNEMPLOYMENT

STILL A KEY ISSUE

By Markley Roberts

Unemployment is still high in 1984: nearly 9 million American workers are recorded officially as jobless — but millions more workers are suffering lost jobs, lost worktime, and lost earnings.

The costs of unemployment in human terms and in economic terms are tragic and wasteful.

In spite of the 1983-1984 expansion of the U.S. economy — which has cut the number of jobless by 3 million — there are 2 million more people out of work than there were when President Reagan took office. There are still 2.7 million more people without jobs now than there were in 1979, and average duration of unemployment is 18 weeks — more than four months.

But official unemployment statistics don't tell the full story.

Almost 1.3 million "discouraged" workers don't get counted when they stop looking for jobs that don't exist. And another 5.5 million workers who want full-time jobs and full-time paychecks are working only part-time.

So, more than a year after the worst of the Reagan recession, at least 15 million working men and women are still suffering lost jobs and lost income as a result of unfair, job-destroying economic policies put into effect over the past three years by President Reagan.

Full employment — a good job at decent pay for every American willing and able to work — remains a distant dream in 1984.

Workers' Families Suffer

Millions and millions of American workers and their families have suffered lost jobs, lost income, lost security, and lost dignity as a result of the Reagan Administration's economic policy disasters.

In 1981 there were 23 million workers — 20 percent of all persons who were in the labor force during the year — who were hit by unemployment.

In 1982 more than 26 million workers — 22 percent of all persons in the labor force — suffered unemployment some time during the year.

Even with the improvement in the economy in 1983, it is likely that 1983 will show 24-26 million workers hit by unemployment some time during the year and 1984 will show 22-24 million jobless for part of the year.

Human Costs of Unemployment

Few of us can grasp the huge size of the nation's unemployment problems measured in millions of people and billions of dollars worth of lost production. These millions and billions numb the mind and erase the fact that these numbers represent real flesh-and-blood people. To these people and to their families, unemployment is a personal human tragedy.

Huge economic losses result from the poor performance of the U.S. economy and from the never-to-be-retrieved waste of human resources during the Reagan years. The Congressional Budget Office estimates the 1981-1984 gap between actual production and potential production at almost $500 billion worth of lost goods and services. This is a loss of more than $2,000 per man, woman, and child in the United States.

And every 1 percent of unemployment, every 1 million workers without jobs, is costing the federal treasury $30 billion — $25 billion in lost taxes and $5 billion in additional unemployment compensation and extra welfare costs. So high unemployment is bad for the federal budget.

The human costs of unemployment are even more startling. The bottom line on recession-depression, joblessness, and poverty is human misery.

It's small consolation to people who want steady work that unemployment compensation and welfare offer temporary, partial, limited relief. But most unemployed workers receive neither unemployment compensation nor welfare. These traditional "safety net" protections have been seriously cut and weakened by Reagan Administration budget cuts.

How to put bread on the table? That's one worry for the jobless worker. But also there are mortgage payments, medical and dental bills for themselves and their children, and all the other bills that are coming in. Most workers are in debt for their homes, cars, refrigerators, television sets and other appliances. So the fear of unpaid bills haunts unemployed workers and their families.

The wider human and social dimensions of unemployment can be seen by looking at some key social indicators. For example, high unemployment raises death rates and infant mortality, and increases the incidence of cardio-vascular and kidney diseases, cirrhosis of the liver, suicides, homicides, admissions to mental hospitals, child abuse, family breakdowns, drug addiction, crime and imprisonment.

Dr. Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University, in a study for the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, found more heart ailments, more suicides and murders, more crime, more mental and physical diseases as a result of periods of recession and high unemployment.

The Brenner study found that a 1 percent sustained rise in unemployment was accompanied by 5.7 percent more murders, 4.1 percent more suicides, 4 percent more prison admissions, 3.4 percent more state mental hospital admissions and 1.9 percent more deaths from cirrhosis of the liver and cardiovascular and kidney diseases.

Shock of Job Loss

Social and community problems as well as personal and family problems are clearly direct results of high unemployment.

The National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity discussed these issues in detail and noted the "crippling impact" of unemployment on a worker's self-respect, particularly among those in low-level jobs.

"Losing a job can set in motion a vicious cycle of other personal catastrophes that are much more difficult to handle for people who lack both the material and the emotional resources that a decent, stable job provides," the council observed.

"Unemployment represents the loss of one of the most important social ties — the connection to the workplace — that can help cushion the impact of personal crises. The effect is intensified if job loss and searching for new work necessitates a change in residence or a break in ties with friends, relatives and the community. Even if the loss of a job does not force relocation, it involves the diminishing of social ties with friends and former associates. The unemployed may fear rejection, want to hide their lowered status, or feel too humiliated by their loss of income and loss of opportunities to maintain their personal relations with others.

"Unemployment and compounded impact of joblessness on an individual's personal life serve to isolate the victims from the social ties and family support they need most. It sets in motion a cycle of deprivation and multiple crises."

Characteristics of the Jobless

Who are the unemployed?

One of every 15 workers is without a job in early 1984, according to the monthly report from the Labor Department's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Almost half the jobless are men aged 20 years and over.

Women aged 20 years and over make up about one-third of the unemployed.

Youths aged 16 to 19 years account for about one-fifth of the total number of jobless workers.

Unemployed men, 20 years and over, numbered 4.1 million. Unemployed women aged 20 years and over totaled 3.1 million. There were 1.6 million jobless teenagers.

Of the 8.8 million officially listed as unemployed, 71 percent or 6.6 million were white, 22 percent or 2 million were black, and 7 percent or 733,000 were Hispanic.

Black, Hispanic, and teenage workers have particularly serious job problems. One of every six black workers is jobless and one of every nine Hispanic workers is unemployed. Over the course of a year, one of every three black workers and one of every four Hispanic workers experiences some unemployment. Among youths, one of every five teenagers and one of every two black teenagers is unemployed.

Blue-Collar, White-Collar

One of every eight blue-collar workers and one of 10 service workers were jobless — but only one of 20 white-collar workers was unemployed.

The lowest unemployment, 2.4 percent, is among white-collar managers and professional specialists. The highest unemployment by occupation is among construction workers.

By industry, construction has the highest unemployment rate with one of seven workers jobless. In this industry the typical worker even in good times gets only 1,400 hours of work a year.

Manufacturing shows the ups and downs of the business cycle, particularly in heavy or durable goods manufacturing industries. In 1979 there were 21 million wage and salary workers in manufacturing. In December 1982, the bottom of the recession, there were only 18 million. By early 1984, employment in manufacturing was up to 19.5 million, still 1.5 million jobs below the 1979 level.

And jobs in manufacturing in March 1984 were 807,000 below the level of July 1981 when the Reagan recession began. Another 131,000 jobs were lost in mining and construction.

The changing structure of industry employment is reflected in the loss of jobs in these goods-producing industries and the gain in service-producing industries.

The biggest service-sector job increase from July 1981 to March 1984, some 1.7 million jobs, came in the personal and business services industry. Another 576,000 jobs were created in retail and wholesale trade, finance, insurance, and real estate.

Humphrey-Hawkings Goal

The Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Economic Growth Act of 1978 expressed this nation's commitment to cutting unemployment to 4 percent by 1983. But in early 1984 joblessness was about double that promised goal.

In the 1960s, civilian unemployment was down to 3.5 percent in 1969.

In the 1970s, unemployment stood at 5.8 percent in 1979.

The Reagan years have produced a serious worsening of joblessness. In 1981 unemployment rose to 7.6 percent. By the end of 1982 civilian unemployment rose to 10.7 percent, almost 12 million people, the highest unemployment of the post-World War II years and the highest since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Unemployment High Through 1980s

A shortage of jobs is expected to continue through the 1980s in spite of a slowdown in population growth and slowdown in labor force growth and in spite of the 1983-1984 increase in employment.

In early 1984, out of a civilian labor force of 113 million, there were about 9 million workers without jobs. By contrast, in 1978 there were 6 million jobless workers out of a labor force of 102 million.

The AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work warned in August 1983 that the job shortage in the United States is getting bigger and bigger, that unemployment is getting higher and higher and staying higher and higher.

The existence of a persistent job shortage, resulting in a permanent pool of 4 to 6 million unemployed workers without a constructive economic role, threatens the stability of America's economic, social and political institutions, the AFL-CIO Committee warned.

The Reagan Administration's optimistic scenario is projecting a drop in unemployment over a five-year period to 5.8 percent in 1989 — the same unemployment rate as it was in 1979 before President Reagan took office.

A more pessimistic — also more realistic — view from the Congressional Budget Office projects a slower decline to 6.5 percent in 1989. This CBO projection is based on the assumption that there will be no new recession and that there will be continued economic growth for the rest of the 1980s.

The odds are that unemployment will continue high through most of the 1980s. And with a growing labor force, each 1 percent of unemployment will represent more jobless workers, close to 1.3 million in 1990.

Even these horrendous forecasts still fall short of the total impact of unemployment. They do not include hidden unemployment, discouraged workers, and lost earnings of workers cut back to part-time work when they want full-time 1 jobs.

And these forecasts don't include the many billions of dollars worth of lost production of goods and services.

Poverty in America

Unfortunately, recession-depression and unemployment push more and more people into poverty.

Poverty in America has increased during the Reagan years. More Americans are now living in poverty — 34 million — than at any time since poverty statistics were first collected in the mid-1960s.

The number of people living in poverty is up from 26 million in 1979 to 34 million in 1982 — a rise from 12 percent to 15 percent of the population. The Census Bureau reports that even if aid-to-the-needy programs like food stamps and Medicaid are counted as income, poverty still went up more than 25 percent from 1979 to 1982.

The 1981-1983 Reagan recession-depression sharply increased unemployment and poverty to the highest levels since the Great Depression of the 1930s. At the same time, President Reagan's merciless attack on federal social welfare programs — including unemployment compensation, food stamps, and Medicaid — resulted in drastic cutbacks in aid for unemployed and needy people.

America's middle class has suffered. The buying power of the average worker's paycheck is lower now than it was in 1979. The middle-income class has gone down from 55 percent of the population in 1978 to 40 percent in 1983, according to studies by Maryland economist Stephen J. Rose.

At the same time that the ranks of the middle class are getting smaller, Rose says, the percentage of low-income Americans who live in poverty and those who live below the "low-budget" line — based on Bureau of Labor Statistics standards — has gone up from 30 percent in 1978 to 40 percent in 1983.

Inequality of income has increased partly because of President Reagan's help-the-rich tax policy and partly because of Reagan's attacks on social programs and job programs that help low and middle-income Americans. A recent Urban Institute study by Frank Levy and Richard Michel found that disposable income of the poorest 20 percent of American families actually fell by 9 percent from 1979 to 1984, whereas disposable income of the richest 20 percent of American families was not eroded at all during this period.

A Decent, Living Wage

Workers should earn enough to achieve a decent minimum level of living for themselves and their families.

The decline of jobs in manufacturing and the increase of jobs in the service sector have significant implications for earnings and income and decent levels of family life. In 1983 average weekly earnings in manufacturing were $354. By contrast, weekly earnings averaged $265 in finance, insurance, and real estate, $237 in personal and business services, and $207 in wholesale and retail trade.

Thus, the shift of employment from the goods-producing sector to the services-producing sector of the U.S. economy is shifting the distribution of employment from higher-paying jobs to lower-paying jobs.

In the 1970s, about 90 percent of all new jobs added to the economy were in predominantly lower-paying service occupations. By 1990, service industries will employ 72 percent of the labor force, about 90 million workers. And job growth in the 1980s will be biggest in traditionally low-pay, high-turnover jobs in sales, clerical, janitorial and food service work. Too often these jobs don't have career ladders leading to higher-skill, higher-pay jobs.

Thus, the changing industrial and occupational mix will bring a relative lowering of the overall wage base and a debasing of the nation's wage structure. Under the current wage system for valuing workers' contributions, there are going to be a lot of poor working people. Society must accept the idea that the people in these traditionally low-pay jobs must get a decent, living wage.

To restore the buying power of the minimum wage to the last time the minimum wage was changed by Congress would require a $4.20 minimum wage, rather than the $3.35 an hour that has remained frozen for nearly three years. It is time to remedy that situation.

Until about 1960, most people thought a worker's wage or salary should be adequate to support a family. But that condition has disappeared. Real wages, the buying power of the worker's paycheck, have fallen.

The average worker earning $280 a week has only $14,600 for 52 weeks of work — far below the $16,000 a year required for an austere life for a family of four. Even with two earners, families have problems reaching the $26,000 income required for moderate, non-luxury living for a family of four. Even a $10,000-a-year, just-above-poverty level of living for an urban family of four would require full-time, year-round work at $5 an hour — 50 percent above the present federal minimum wage.

Two-Tier Work Force

As computers and robots take over more functions in the office and the factory, a two-tier work force is developing. At the top will be a few executives, scientists and engineers, professionals, and managers, performing high-level, creative and fulfilling, high-paid, full-time work in a good environment. At the bottom will be low-paid workers performing relatively simple, low-skill, dull, routine, high-turnover jobs in a poor work environment, jobs often part-time and usually lacking job security and opportunities for advancement.

Between these two major tiers will be fewer and fewer permanent, well-paid, full-time, skilled, semi-skilled, and craft production and maintenance jobs which in the past offered hope and opportunity and upward mobility to workers who start in low-paid entry-level jobs. Many middle-level management jobs will also be gone.

The loss of middle-level, good-pay jobs raises serious questions about inadequate growth of consumer buying power in the future and about loss of opportunities for upward economic and social mobility. It also raises serious questions about social stability if middle-class America becomes relatively smaller and has less job security and lowered income expectations.

One key answer is to raise the minimum wage to a decent living wage and to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act so as to better protect workers at the bottom of the economic ladder — the working poor and those who suffer most from various forms of discrimination in the labor market.

Another key answer is recognition and support for unions and collective bargaining as an essential part of achieving fairness in income distribution by pressing for better wages and salaries and other job-related benefits for America's working people.

Unemployment Insurance

In the 1973-75 recession, two out of three unemployed workers got unemployment insurance benefits to cushion loss of earnings and income.

Those who didn't get UI payments were mainly those newly entering the labor force — or those re-entering after a period out of the labor force.

In the 1981-1983 Reagan recession, only one out of three jobless workers got UI payments. Millions of long-term unemployed men and women exhausted their UI benefits.

The original intention of the federal-state unemployment insurance system set up under the Social Security Act of 1935 was that UI benefits would be the first line of defense for workers who lose their jobs through no fault of their own. UI would help replace lost family income and maintain consumer buying power. Funds for UI payments come from small payments by employers into state UI trust funds.

The usual duration of state unemployment compensation is 26 weeks. Even with this limited compensation, jobless workers often suffer an immediate loss of income since most states require a "waiting week" during which no benefits are forthcoming. Even if a week's worth of compensation is "rebated" later, the delay seriously diminishes the value of UI benefits that are needed immediately.

And UI benefits are low. The average weekly UI benefit payment in 1983 was $120 — only 40 percent of average weekly wages in industries covered by the UI system.

Benefits should be two-thirds of average weekly wages. The purpose of maintaining UI payments at a decent, minimum living standard is not simply to help jobless people for humanitarian reasons, although such reasons have a basic priority.

Adequate UI payments also help the economy by maintaining consumer buying power in time of recession. Therefore the 35 percent drop in buying power of UI benefit payments to long-term jobless workers from 1975 and 1976 to 1982 and 1983 was bad for the U.S. economy as well as morally wrong in loading still more hardship on needy people.

The Reagan recession with its large-scale, long-term unemployment seriously strained the federal-state UI system. State UI trust funds ran out of money and went broke. They borrowed money from the federal treasury to make UI payments as required by law.

To pay back borrowed money, many state UI programs were under pressure to make big cuts in UI benefits to jobless workers or to raise substantially the UI tax payments by employers.

The pro-business, anti-worker Reagan Administration, of course, demanded drastic cutbacks and restrictions on benefits for workers.

Cruel and punitive anti-worker restrictions supported by the Reagan Administration and passed by Congress forced many states to —

- cut UI benefits payments,
- make UI eligibility requirements much more restrictive, and
- cut duration of UI benefits.

The Federal Supplemental Compensation program (FSC) passed by Congress in September 1982 gave some income protection to hundreds of thousands of long-term jobless workers who exhausted regular or extended benefits.

In 1983 Congress gave the FSC program an extension to March 31, 1985. However, FSC income protection is still unfair because the size of UI benefit payments and duration of benefits depend on the state where the jobless worker happens to work or live. So workers in similar circumstances get widely different benefits.

Hours of Work

Hours of work should be reduced to provide more job opportunities.

The standard 40-hour workweek of the 1930s should be brought in line with the historic downward trend in hours of work. There is nothing sacred about the 40-hour workweek, just as there was nothing sacred about the 84-hour or the 60-hour workweek.

In the first 40 years of this century the average workweek fell from 60 hours to 40 hours. But the standard workweek has been unchanged now for almost 50 years.

Past and future gains from rising productivity make the reduced workweek affordable and justifiable and, indeed, necessary. To create more jobs and to increase leisure and to strengthen family life, a reduction of the workweek is in order.

Existing overtime pay requirements do not sufficiently deter employers from requiring frequent and continuing overtime work. This puts an excessive and unhealthy strain on currently employed workers and deprives unemployed workers of jobs. Raising the Fair Labor Standards Act overtime penalty can produce more leisure, more health, and more jobs.

Full Employment

The Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Economic Growth Act of 1978 is a blueprint for recovery from recent economic disasters that have thrown millions of American workers out of their jobs.

Planning for full employment, as outlined in the Humphrey-Hawkins law, is based on the belief that all Americans are entitled to the freedom, dignity, and security that comes from having a job.

The law sets a national policy of promoting full employment. It calls for primary reliance on the private sector. Job creation activities should give priority to private sector jobs, then private sector jobs with federal assistance, then conventional public sector jobs, and finally last-resort government jobs.

Government as the employer of the last resort is a key component of the Humphrey-Hawkins law. When fiscal and monetary policies and existing employment and training programs fail to bring America to full employment, the Humphrey-Hawkins law says it is the responsibility of the federal government to become the employer of last resort.

The planning structure and the job-creation mandate of the Humphrey-Hawkins law offer a reasonable, practical, workable system for coordinating action to stimulate the American economy so that public and private-sector jobs will be available for all Americans who want to work.

The Humphrey-Hawkins full employment law builds on a long tradition of government action and job creation to fight unemployment and poverty.

In the Great Depression of the 1930s, one of every four workers was out of a job. In response to the urgent problems of unemployment and poverty, Franklin D. Roosevelt and a concerned Congress put into effect a variety of programs:

- The Civilian Conservation Corps, the first federal work and work-training program, put young men 18-25 years of age to work on conservation projects. The successful CCC program continued from 1933 to 1942.
- Federal Emergency Relief Administration began channeling federal financial aid in 1933 to hardpressed state and local governments to support public welfare and unemployment relief.
- Work Progress Administration — later Work Projects Administration (WPA) — from 1935 to 1942 enrolled able-bodied unemployed workers in public service jobs. Their achievements are national assets, including public parks, schools, literature and art.

Employment Act of 1946

After World War II, widespread fears of massive unemployment impelled Congress to pass the Employment Act of 1946. It gave the U.S. government the responsibility "to create conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities, including self-employment, for those able, willing and seeking to work, and to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power."

The Employment Act of 1946 was a statement of good intentions — but it lacked the structure and the tools to turn the promise of "maximum employment" into a full employment reality.

In the 1960s, various programs were aimed at preparing workers for jobs and creating jobs for unemployed workers.

The Area Redevelopment Act of 1961 was designed to develop jobs and stimulate economic growth in areas of high unemployment. So was the Public Works Acceleration Act of 1962.

The Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962 was aimed at retraining skilled workers and giving education and training to unskilled, unemployed workers to prepare them for private industry jobs.

The Neighborhood Youth Corps, a work-training program for youths aged 16-21 years, was aimed at cutting school dropout rates and giving youths paid work experience. The Job Corps took disadvantaged youths into residential centers for basic education, vocational training and work experience.

Last-Resort Jobs Urged

In 1966 the Automation Commission — the National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress — called for a massive public service jobs program. "With the best of fiscal and monetary policies," the Automation Commission observed, "there will always be those handicapped in the competition for jobs by lack of education, skill or experience, or by discrimination. The needs of our society provide ample opportunities to fulfill the promise of the Employment Act of 1946: 'a job for all those able, willing and seeking to work.'

"We recommend a program of public service employment, providing, in effect, that the government be an employer of last resort, providing work for the 'hard-core unemployed' in useful community enterprises."

In response to the 1969-70 recession, Congress passed the Emergency Employment Act of 1971 to set up the first important public jobs program sponsored by the federal government since the 1930s. This public employment program (PEP) opened up a limited number of public service jobs in state and local governments.

In 1973 Congress passed the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) to combine existing training and public service jobs programs and also to create more jobs in areas of high unemployment. As the 1973-75 recession got worse, Congress added a new emergency public service jobs program which eventually enrolled more than 800,000 workers.

In spite of many CETA accomplishments in providing jobs and training to unemployed and disadvantaged workers, the Reagan Administration pressed Congress for a reorganized system which would emphasize private industry-oriented training and jobs. The new Job Training Partnership Act of 1982 decentralized training responsiblities to business-dominated Private Industry Councils in the states and local communities.

Job Training Program

JTPA is not a jobs program; it is a training program. Unfortunately, JTPA is seriously underfunded, and it fails to provide for training allowances or stipends for workers who are taking training. As a result, many jobless workers who need and want training cannot afford to go into a training program because they must look for a job to put bread on the table right away.

With unemployment persisting at distressingly high levels in 1984, the labor movement is deeply concerned about the unparalleled need for appropriate job and training services to return the victims of the recession and of structural changes in the economy to productive employment. For this reason, strong labor participation in planning and providing these services is more vital than ever before.

The dramatic change in the nation's employment and training system resulting from enactment of the Job Training Partnership Act has wide-ranging implications for organized labor. The greatly diminished federal role under JTPA is of grave concern to labor. However, the state-run system established by the new law offers opportunities for labor involvement in planning and providing programs. JTPA also embodies certain labor standards and consultation rights which labor must be vigilant to protect. The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, with its broad experience and technical expertise, is working to help organized labor make the most of these opportunities and rights.

JTPA looks to the private sector — labor and management alike — to serve as a partner with government in planning and providing effective training services to disadvantaged and dislocated workers.

HRDI is continuing its work with labor organizations at the national, state, and local levels to develop employment and training services for dislocated, disadvantaged, unemployed, and underemployed workers.

In 1984 current and continued high unemployment threatens to tear apart the fabric of America's economic and social life. Without jobs and without adequate unemployment compensation benefits, many more millions of American workers will suffer still more hardship and personal tragedy.

Aid for the Jobless

To improve basic income support protection for jobless workers, the AFL-CIO is urging Congress to restore the protections which in the past have been an important part of the unemployment insurance system and to reject any further attempts to weaken the UI program.

Federal minimum benefits as recommended by the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation are needed. Until that goal is achieved, the AFL-CIO is urging states to remove harsh eligibility and disqualification provisions and to restore — and if possible increase — weekly benefits amounts and benefit duration periods.

The AFL-CIO is also urging Congress to enact a permanent program of federal supplemental benefits with a maximum duration of at least 65 weeks and either eliminate triggers or, at the very least, allow total unemployment rather than insured unemployment to be used as the trigger.

A system of federal UI reinsurance is needed to help state UI trust funds meet extraordinary costs of persistent high unemployment.

The AFL-CIO is urging federal legislation to require states to increase the taxable wage base to 65 percent of the average annual wage by 1990 and to give states flexibility in repayment of UI trust fund loans by the federal government in time of recession and high unemployment.

AFL-CIO Program for Jobs

Job-creating policies are needed to stimulate the economy and move the nation faster toward full employment.

The commitment to full employment set forth in the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Economic Growth Act of 1978 must be fulfilled. Full employment is a moral, social, political and economic imperative. Economic efficiency and productivity improve at higher levels of output.

To move America faster toward full employment and balanced economic growth, jobs must be created in the private sector and in the public sector for the millions of men and women who cannot find jobs. It is clearly in the economic and social interest of the nation to put Americans who are able and willing to work in productive jobs that produce useful goods and services, generate taxes, and stimulate the economy, particularly in communities with especially high unemployment.

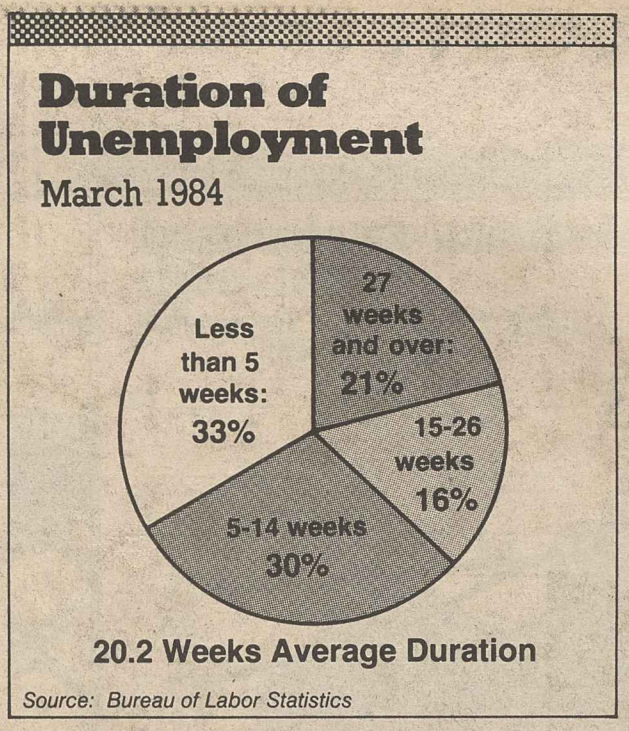
Direct, targeted and adequately funded public job programs are needed on a large scale when, as now, the private sector fails to create enough jobs. Needed community services should be expanded, planned community facilities should be constructed, and low-and moderate-cost housing should be built and rehabilitated. Jobless workers should have the opportunity for training in skills that lead directly to jobs. The Job Training Partnership Act of 1982 with its lack of income support during training, its business-dominated structure and its abysmal underfunding is totally inadequate to the nation's employment and training needs.

Private and public sector training, including on-the-job training and upgrading and apprenticeship programs, needs to be broadened. Training allowances and income support should be available for workers in training programs.

At the same time, the AFL-CIO continues to oppose wage subsidies to private employers — whether done directly through public grants or through the back door of tax credits.

Job and training programs for displaced workers and youths should be greatly expanded and training allowances should be provided. There should be more targeted job training opportunities for adult workers, including women and minorities, and other groups with special needs.

Legislation is needed to protect workers and local communities against serious injury from plant closings. Such legislation should stop tax incentives for plant closings, require advance notice, protect workers' health and pension rights, provide training for dislocated workers, assure union successorship, and provide other protections and assistance for workers and communities hit by plant closings.



1984 Agenda for Congress

Healthy economic growth based on sound monetary, fiscal, and industrial revitalization policies is necessary to achieve full employment. To create jobs, to rebuild the economy, to help workers and their communities, the AFL-CIO is pressing for prompt action on these pending bills in the 1984 session of the 98th Congress:

1. The industrial policy bill (H.R. 4360) to set up a high-level Council on Industrial Competitiveness and a Bank for Industrial Competitiveness to make loans and loan guarantees for modernizing and revitalizing American industry.

2. The House-passed community service jobs bill (H.R. 1036 & S. 1812) to provide public service jobs for workers who cannot find work in the private sector.

3. The public works bill (H.R. 2544), to help reconstruct the nation's basic infrastructure, including water and sewer facilities, highways and port facilities, and other public works which stimulate private, job-creating investment and economic activity.

4. The plant closing bill (H.R. 2847)to provide some protection for workers and local communities when industries shut down or move.

5. The House-passed domestic auto content bill (H.R. 1234 & S. 707) to assure a strong U.S. auto industry, plus additional trade legislation to provide relief for other impacted industries.

In addition to this legislation, the AFL-CIO will continue to support a job-creation program which includes:

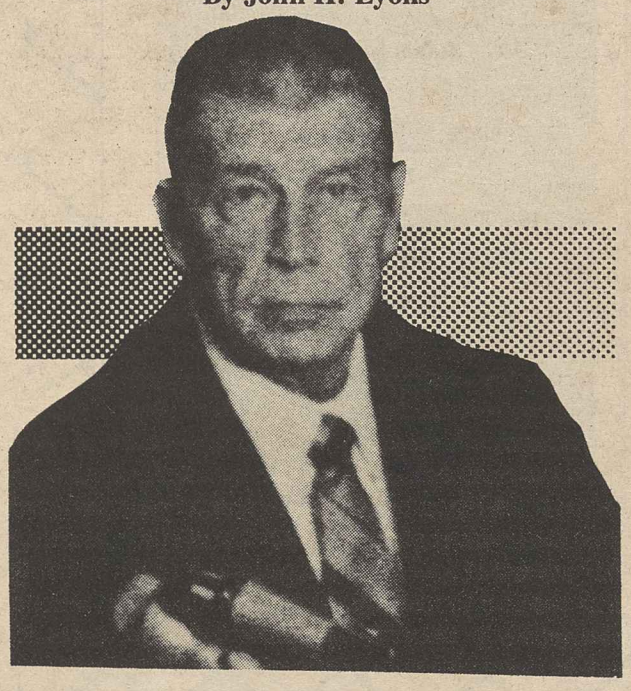
- More assistance for displaced workers;
- Broader youth training and placement;
- Continuation of extended unemployment insurance;
- Mortgage relief and health care for the unemployed;
- Reduction in interest rates with the aid of selective credit controls;
- Expanded low and moderate-cost housing;
- Meeting public investment needs through a fairer and more productive tax structure;
- Measures to restrict harmful, job-destroying imports, to require domestic content, and to address the full range of job-related and national security issues essential to resolving the nation's trade and investment problems.

The AFL-CIO will continue to work for programs and policies that will provide jobs for all Americans who want to work, assure a rising standard of living for all Americans, protect national security, and maintain the health and diversity of a full-employment U.S. economy.

For Jobs, Justice and Dignity

This article contains the AFL-CIO presentation at the initial hearings of the Democratic Party Platform Committee in Washington. Federation Vice President Lyons, who gave the testimony, is president of the Iron Workers.

By John H. Lyons



The Democratic Party has been most successful when it has been most inclusive, when it has stood most firmly for the equality of all citizens and worked hardest to guarantee equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity.

For three years, we have watched the systematic reversal of the principle of equality in America. We have seen the Reagan Administration shut out vast numbers of Americans as unworthy of the concern of their government. We have seen public resources turned to private ends on behalf of the narrowest and wealthiest segment of the population.

We have seen the regulatory powers of government placed in the service of those whose greed and contempt for the lives and health of their fellow citizens necessitated such regulation in the first place. We have seen agencies designed to guarantee human and statutory rights used to undermine and destroy those rights.

After three years of Republican favoritism of the few at the expense of the many, American workers are looking to the Democratic Party for the redress of grievances. In the coming weeks, the AFL-CIO will present to this platform committee a set of detailed proposals for setting this country back on the right track.

Our federation, with 14 million members in 96 national organizations and 50,000 local unions, is the most inclusive cross-section of the American population that exists. Its members live in every community and work at every trade and occupation.

Today, I want to outline the issues of greatest concern to all the men and women of this country who work for a living.

For all but a handful of Americans, life revolves around work. Work is much more than a source of paychecks. It is the activity through which people develop and define themselves as human beings and as members of the human community.

And in the same way that a good job is the foundation of a good life, full employment is the foundation of a good society. It is the one indispensable key to stable family life, to safe and healthy neighborhoods and to a proud, self-supporting and self-reliant citizenry.

So if there is a single goal, a single issue that ought to stand at the head of the Democratic agenda, it is the issue of jobs, not as a plank, but as the foundation of our platform.

It is to that world of work that Ronald Reagan's Administration has done its worst damage since it took charge. A minimum of 30 million American families have been injured by unemployment that could have been prevented and should have been combatted and alleviated by a responsible administration. Twenty-three million men and women were without jobs at some time during 1981; twenty-seven million in 1982 and that many again in 1983. The average duration of unemployment in those three years was 14 weeks, 16 weeks and 20 weeks.

Lost wages over those three years added up to $336 billion. Lost production amounted to $950 billion. The loss to the federal Treasury was $285 billion, enough to reduce the Reagan deficits quite substantially.

But there were other costs, as well. Nearly 11 million families lost their health insurance coverage; 494,000 families lost their homes through mortgage foreclosure; 72,934 small businesses were forced into bankruptcy.

Tens of thousands of farm families have been driven from the land they have tilled for generations. The beneficiaries have been rich corporations, foreign and domestic, that are rapidly consolidating control of the nation's food supply, exactly as they are dominating energy supplies.

Despite more than a year of recovery in the business world, recovery is not even in sight for the 8.8 million who are still unemployed. The unemployment rate today is 7.8 percent, compared with 5.8 percent five years ago. For those still holding a job, average real wages are 3½ percent lower than they were four years ago.

The future for most of our children is grim. To reach full employment by 1990, defined as 3 percent joblessness, this country will have to generate 20 million more jobs. If jobs are created at a rate no greater than that of the last seven years, the shortfall will be 7½ million jobs.

As for youngsters who have been forced to abandon the dream of higher education, the Administration proposes to throw them on that depressed job market at less than the minimum wage.

The minimum wage already falls far short of a living wage. The $3.35 figure set in 1978 has shrunk to $2.08 in purchasing power. To match its 1978 value, the minimum wage today would have to be at least $4.29, and that is an issue that this party must address.

The platform must be concerned with the plight of the poor, working and non-working, whom the Republican Administration has written off and deprived of the help and encouragement of their government.

With 5 million newly impoverished persons, the poverty rate has soared to 15 percent of the American people — the highest in 17 years.

One-and-a-half million children in 725,000 families have been injured by cuts in the AFDC program. Child nutrition programs have been cut 28 percent. Higher education loan programs have been cut by 27 percent.

Job training programs for citizens needing new job skills have been cut by 35 percent.

A million needy persons have been stripped of every penny in food-stamp assistance. Four million more have had their benefits slashed.

Overall, $26 billion has been cut from retirement programs; $27 billion from income security programs; $18.5 billion from health programs; $13.7 billion from education and social services; $25 billion from employment training programs.

While Congress acquiesced to many of President Reagan's budget-cutting proposals, if Ronald Reagan had had his way, $40 billion more would have been taken away from those who need it most.

Mr. Reagan has not finished. He is still demanding further cuts in social security, education, health care and housing programs.

He is still striving to diminish government itself, as an institution, and to harass and humiliate government employees by withholding just wage increases and chiseling on pensions and other benefits in the name of "fiscal responsibility."

One of the toughest and most urgent jobs of a new Democratic administration will be to restore morale among federal workers and bring back to the civil service the thousands of skilled and dedicated workers who have been driven away.

Meanwhile, the Administration continues to whittle away the institutions designed to protect the American people from the assaults of concentrated economic power.

By packing the National Labor Relations Board with lifelong advocates of management, President Reagan has robbed American workers of the rights guaranteed by the Wagner Act. By wholesale firings of OSHA inspectors, arbitrary exemptions of vast segments of industry, and downgrading of health and safety standards, he has once again exposed huge numbers of workers to physical and chemical hazards in the workplace.

By packing the Civil Rights Commission and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission with people who see no virtue in affirmative action and no harm in inequality, he has reopened the door to institutionalized inequality. We must do more than restore the status quo. We must pass the Equal Rights Amendment and establish comparable pay for jobs of comparable worth.

For all the talk about free trade, free markets and meeting foreign competition, the Reagan Administration has moved America backward in industrial power.

The $750 billion Reagan tax giveaways were supposed to bring new business investment, more oil exploration and upgrading of industrial plants and equipment. They did just the opposite.

In many industries, especially energy and manufacturing, those tax windfalls have been used to finance corporate cannibalism, mergers and consolidations that have concentrated more and more resources in fewer and fewer hands.

Instead of investing in new plants and new tools, American companies have formed alliances with foreign firms and flooded the country with imports disguised by U.S. brand names.

Nothing has been done to counter the nearly universal practice by which foreign governments unfairly subsidize their exports and set up barriers against imports.

Nothing has been done to reverse the preposterous overvaluation of the American dollar, which in just 3½ years has soared 57 percent against the currencies of our major foreign trading partners.

Nothing has been done to reduce real interest rates, which amount to a crushing tax that Americans pay to bankers instead of to their government.

For all these reasons, American exports have been made so expensive in other nations and foreign imports so cheap in the American marketplace that U.S. goods could scarcely compete even if every American worked for virtually nothing.

These results have been brought about deliberately by an administration that aims at widening inequality, an administration that has sent the national debt to levels never before dreamed of in order to reward its friends and to make it more difficult for future administrations to undo the damage, to return the country to its proper direction and the government to its proper role.

It is the task of the Democratic Party not only to restore and rebuild but to strengthen and enhance this economy and this society in ways that enlarge, rather than diminish, the lives of the American people — all the people.

We need a reasoned industrial policy based on the kind of economy we need and deserve, rather than what is left after a handful of corporate directors have satisfied their greed for immediate advantage and short-term profit.

We need a trading policy in which all countries play by the same rules and that recognizes the need for a strong, diversified American economy.

We must restore human rights as the guiding principle of our relations with other countries. National defense must be aimed at avoiding confrontations, rather than seeking them out. The burden of defense must be shared with our allies, and its costs must be shared by the rich, as well as by those who are least able to pay.

Disarmament negotiations must be revived and actively pursued, rather than ignored in a frantic race for overwhelming power.

Poorer countries must be encouraged to develop for the benefit of their people, rather than for the benefit of bankers.

All of these, from concern for the weak and disadvantaged, to full employment, to international cooperation, are historic goals of the Democratic Party. They are the overriding concerns of working people and of all Americans. They should be declared, strongly and unequivocally, in this party's 1984 platform.

New Books

The Deindustrialization of America

By Barry Bluestone & Bennett Harrison, Basic Books, Inc., 10 East 53rd St., New York, N.Y. 10022. 323 pages. $19.95

The need to reindustrialize America is apparent, particularly at a time of high unemployment. The AFL-CIO has repeatedly urged that a reindustrialization program be made part of national policy.

As this recent book points out, however, even as a consensus on the need to rebuild the nation's economic base emerges, corporations have been pulling capital out of basic industries at an unprecedented rate. In effect, they are de-industrializing America.

Both college professors, Bluestone at Boston College and Harrison at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the authors draw on material never before published to show how—faced with heightened international competition—managements have protected eroding profit margins by unusually rapid redeployment of investment capital.

During the past decade, they point out, more than 30 million jobs have been lost as a direct result of plant closings. Communities have been disrupted, workers' security undermined, and productivity reduced.

Bluestone and Harrison call for a new strategy of "reindustrialization with a human face" that not only sets limits on the unrestricted movement of capital, but also increases public investment and involves workers in the running of their enterprises.

Outside the labor movement itself, the public at large needs to become actively engaged in the great reindustrialization debate, the authors observe.

"At this point, all opinions are needed. New ideas should be encouraged, and an opportunity for them to be heard should be assured," they conclude.

"Unions, community organizations, schools, the media, legislative hearings, international conferences—all are valid settings for the kind of continual public forum we envision. It does not cost anything to read, to meet together, and to talk."

Selected Cases in Labor Relations: An Experiental Approach

By Howard V. Finston & James L. Porter. Reston Publishing Co., Inc., Reston, Va. 22090. 1983. 360 pages. $18.95.

Conflict resolution is often at the heart of labor relations. The authors of this book contend that, while necessary to effective interpersonal relations, theoretical understanding of behavior is not enough in resolving labor-management conflict.

Using exercises and simulations, Finston and Porter offer an experiental approach to labor arbitration and labor law to assist in narrowing the gap between theory and practice.

Intended primarily to be used as the major text in a labor relations course at the upper division and graduate college level, the book examines a cross-section of arbitration and labor law issues in both the private and public sectors. The book provides all the important facts and circumstances surrounding each dispute, as well as a complete record of the arbitrator's judgment, conclusions, and supporting background research.

The principals involved in these disputes represent a cross-section of American companies, governmental agencies, unions, and industries.

Practitioners within the labor arbitration field, as well as union stewards and officers, will find the casebook useful as a reference in dealing with selected grievance topics, arbitration opinions, and decisions of the National Labor Relations Board. The book is also intended to assist the instructor or trainer in designing a course in labor-management relations.

Economics: A Worker's Education Manual

By the International Labor Organization. 1983. 160 pages. $10. Available through the International Labor Office, Washington Branch, 1750 New York Ave., N.W., Wash., D.C. 20006.

This book is intended primarily for trade unionists and is vital reading for anyone who relies on wages as a principal source of income. It begins with a discussion of standards of living—in terms of jobs, pay, prices and social benefits. It moves on to the subject of workers and businesses—types of businesses, prices, markets, production, location of industry, investment, wage determination and workers' access to business information.

This material is then expanded into a discussion of the national and international framework within which workers and employers earn their living.

The text, as far as possible, uses everyday language, and abstract economic terms are clearly explained.

Women in Government

By Suzanne E. & Roger A. Sheldon. National Textbook Co., 8259 Niles Center Rd., Skokie, Ill. 60077. 1983. 150 pages. $7.95. Paperback—$5.95.

Suzanne Sheldon is a former congressional press officer and Roger A. Sheldon is the associate editor of the Carpenters' publication, The Carpenter.

Their book covers the history, status and future prospects for women in government. It includes cases histories on United Nations Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, Rep. Patricia Schroeder, Transportation Sec. Elizabeth Dole and many others at the national, state and local levels.

The authors outline the routes taken by many women toward career positions at all levels of government.

Resolving Grievances: A practical approach

By Donald S. McPherson, with Conrad John Gates and Kevin N. Rogers. Reston Publishing Co., Reston, Va. 22090. 1983. 170 pages. $14.95.

Two of the three writers of this book are practicing arbitrators, who teach labor relations at Indiana University of Pennsylvania. Their book is written for an audience of graduate students in labor relations and aims at aiding skill-building in resolving grievances.

The authors work from the assumption that most supervisors and union stewards have far too little training in the theory of grievance resolution and even less in the practical human relations, communications and labor relations skills. The book attempts "a practical approach to the process of resolving grievances by providing a source of teaching materials that may contribute to raising the level of skills and knowledge of practitioners."

Eighteen grievance case simulations make up the second half of the book and set the stage for role-playing in several formats.

The first half of the book provides information on union, management, and individual rights. It defines grievances and shows how they can be carried through the process to arbitration.

Encyclopedia of Occupational Health and Safety

By the International Labor Organization. 1983. Two volumes, 2,400 pages. $155. Available through the International Labor Office, Washington Branch, 1750 New York Ave., Washington, D.C. 20006.

The third revised edition of this valuable encyclopedia has more than 1,150 articles, 400 photographs, diagrams and drawings, and 6,000 selected bibliographical references.

Pursuant to the ILO's educational goals, the first edition of this encyclopedia was produced in 1930 and the second in 1972. That second edition was so successful it went through five reprints.

More than 500 authors have contributed to this two-volume effort. The newest edition reflects the significant developments that have taken place over the past decade in the practice of occupational medicine. Toxic substances, dusts and mineral fibres, nonionizing radiation, allergy and occupational cancer problems are covered.

Handbook of Wages and Benefits for Construction Unions—1983.

By Construction Data Services, Inc., Suite 400, 1901 L St. N.W., Wash., D.C. 20036. $75.

This handbook contains current listings of available hourly wages and fringe benefits for 35 craft classifications in more than 5,000 construction contracts in some 800 American cities.

The listings are divided into the categories of building, residential, heavy construction and highway. Each classification shows total wage and benefit amounts, wage rates only and a breakdown of employer costs for pensions, vacations, health and welfare insurance, apprenticeship training and other benefits.

The listings are organized by regions, states and cities.

The handbook can be useful to union officials as a reference manual and in coordinating area bargaining, although these types of data are likely to be available through the international union. The publishers indicate the booklet also can be useful to contractors, architects, engineers, public officials and others in developing project cost estimates and in collective bargaining.

The information provided is printed out computer-style using a tabular format.

Runoff election

Football players back union for new league

By Arlee C. Green

The United States Football League Players Association scored a decisive win in the runoff election for representation of the 1,008 USFL players. The vote in the National Labor Relations Board election was 732 for the union, 25 against with 95 ballots challenged.

Player representatives from the league's 18 teams held the USFLPA's founding meeting in Chicago, Apr. 17, and elected an eight-member bargaining committee, adopted a constitution, established a budget and dues structure, and hired Douglas F. Allen as the union's executive director.

Allen took on the new duties following the meeting, and resigned his post as assistant to the executive director of the National Football League Players Association, Gene Upshaw. Allen had been in that post since 1982. He worked six years as the AFL-CIO regional COPE director for New York and New Jersey.

Former player

Allen played linebacker for the Buffalo Bills for two seasons after he graduated from Pennsylvania State University in 1973 with a degree in labor studies.

The board of player reps will serve as the new union's governing body until the top officers are elected.

The USFLPA's parent organization, the Federation of Professional Athletes, started the organizing drive in the newly constituted USFL in February 1983. The team owners refused to recognize the union, even though more than 60 percent of the players had signed authorization cards.

A representation election held in June 1983 resulted in the USFLPA receiving 268 votes to 262 votes for no union, with a separate agent-sponsored organization receiving 25 votes. After an initial postponement, the runoff balloting was held from Apr. 2 to Apr. 5, 1984.

Allen said the owners had hired a union-busting firm prior to the first election which made promises that weren't fulfilled by the owners.

"Once the players realized the owners weren't making good on their promises, they knew they would need a union," he said, citing the heavy support for the USFLPA in the runoff voting.

Allen stressed that the key issues in the organizing drive will become the top items in bargaining. He said the union will seek to begin negotiations with the owners as soon as possible.

Regarding the outlook for negotiations, Allen said the players "are not insensitive to the fact that it's a new league," but they "will need to cover a lot of ground to reach the level where they would consider the working conditions and pay to be fair and equitable."

Among the items to be considered are a health insurance package providing year-round coverage for the players and their families. Allen noted that some players are covered only during the season, some lack family coverage, and some pay a hefty portion of their insurance premiums.

Indiscriminate cuts

He said some clubs cut injured players from their rosters and the current indiscriminate assignment of players to the "inactive developmental squad," often just minutes before game time, can cost players thousands of dollars.

Allen stressed that although the high salaries of a few star players are heavily publicized, the average annual pay is in the $30,000 to $35,000 range. Negotiation of "fair minimum salaries" will likely be a top goal in bargaining, he said.

Other concerns include the lack of a grievance procedure, selection of neutral physicians, establishment of pension and disability plans, and adequate training camp pay.

Allen said one indication of the will of the players "is that all the teams were represented at the founding meeting, even though it is very difficult to schedule meetings during the season.

He said the USFLPA will probably maintain its offices in the Machinists' building where the NFLPA and the FPA are headquartered.

Royalty rule pressed on TV cassette rentals

Performers and producers of films made into video cassettes are being shortchanged by the limitations on copyright protection, the Dept. for Professional Employees testified at House hearings.

DPE Director Jack Golodner said the fast-growing cassette rental business means that copyright owners are losing out on royalties that apply only on the first sale of the cassette.

A reasonable royalty arrangement for cassettes used in commercial rentals would enable the film industry to recoup expenses with a lower price for the purchase of video cassettes he said, and to share the benefits with the creative workers involved in the film production.

Conference for white-collar workers focuses on technological change.

High-tech challenge explored by Professional Employees

St. Louis—New technology may be dramatically changing the American workplace, but through their unions office and professional workers can meet the challenges, participants in an AFL-CIO conference on technological change agreed.

The Dept. for Professional Employees conducted a one-day program of workshops to give the more than 75 participants an opportunity to discuss union responses to changes in the workplace brought on by the increasing use of computers and other high technology equipment and services.

In a keynote speech to the conference, Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp pointed out that the so-called computer age "has failed to deliver the promised benefits that its champions claimed would come with it."

Instead of more jobs, Stepp said, there has been an increase in productivity at the expense of job creation, coupled with more worktime at lower wages and a "de-skilling" of clerical and technical jobs that is also pressing down wages.

He cited studies showing that as the American economy evolves, many jobs—particularly in manufacturing—are being exported or lost. And at the same time, the jobs that are being created pay substantially less than those that are "vanishing from the scene."

Stepp called for "new directions" in public policy to stem the damage to the nation's economy and to its standard of living, but he stressed that workers can also use the collective bargaining process to make sure they play a role in the changing workplace.

Conference participants attended a series of four workshops on preparing for technological change, including contract language, staff and membership education, and political and legislative action programs.

Williams certified as winner of Steelworkers' presidency

Pittsburgh—Lynn R. Williams has been certified as the winner in the election for president of the Steelworkers based on preliminary results released by USWA tellers.

The ballot count from the Mar. 29 membership referendum gives Williams, the union's acting president, 59 percent of the total vote to 41 percent for Treasurer Frank McKee. Williams drew 193,686 votes to McKee's 135,823 in ballots from 4,153 local unions.

A final report on the results will be issued by the tellers after hearings are completed on 22 protests. Details on the protests were not released, but the USWA said 21 were lodged by local unions and one by McKee.

The tellers are expected to complete the hearing process by late June when they will present a final report to the USWA executive board.

If the preliminary results are upheld, Williams will be sworn in at that meeting. The board would also elect a new secretary to replace him. Williams would fill out the remainder of the late Lloyd McBride's term which runs through Mar. 1, 1986.

Williams, 59, is a native of Springfield, Ont., and has been a member of the Steelworkers since 1947.

He had been an organizer for the Canadian Labor Congress before joining the USWA staff in 1956. He was elected secretary in 1977.

McKee, 63, continues as USWA treasurer, a post he has held since 1977.

Engineers draft long-range goals

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the Operating Engineers convention set legislative and political goals to advance labor's programs and called for a major new effort to organize workers and combat union-busters.

They re-elected President J. C. Turner, Sec.-Treas. Frank Hanley and other incumbent officers to new four-year terms, all unanimously. And they approved a step-up in monthly per capita payments.

On the political front, the convention formally voted to endorse Walter Mondale's presidential candidacy—by a demonstrative, standing vote of acclamation by the 700 delegates.

Turner told the convention that the union's 400,000 members and their families could make the difference in the November presidential election. That translates into more than a million votes, Turner pointed out.

"Our job is to make sure that our members and their families are registered, and make certain that they vote," he stressed.

In a broad-ranging resolution on international affairs, the delegates conferred an honorary IUOE membership upon Polish crane operator Anna Walentynowicz. She led the first strike at the Gdansk shipyard that led to the formation of the free trade union, Solidarnosc.

The delegates pledged their continued support of Solidarnosc, which they called "the only authentic voice of Poland's workers."

The convention condemned the violation of human rights everywhere, and reaffirmed the union's position that the United States should withhold military assistance to any country that "denies the right of workers to organize and control their own unions" and any nation "practicing terror against its citizens and depriving them of basic human rights."

Bankruptcy laws

Another resolution assailed the misuse of bankruptcy laws "to undermine workers' rights" and pledged the union's support to "fighting back against the anti-union employers who use this tactic."

On per capita, the convention voted to raise the present payment of $3.50 a month to $4 on Jan. 1, 1985, and to $4.50 a year later. The unions executive board was given discretion to raise the amount further in 1987 and 1988, if necessary.

Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine stressed the importance of pension-fund investments in union-built construction projects and urged participation in joint labor-management efforts to help "good, fair contractors become more competitive with open-shop operators."

COPE Director John Perkins told the delegates that polls show that 38 percent of the voters are committed to voting for Ronald Reagan for President in November, while 35 percent are dead-set against his re-election, leaving 27 percent of th potential voters unaccounted for.

"And this is where we come in, for some of these are our own members, precommitted neither for nor against Reagan," he said. "They are there to be persuaded, and it's our job to persuade them.

"I don't buy the media myth-in-the-making of Ronald Reagan, the invincible," Perkins said. "I consider him Ronald Reagan the vulnerable. You cannot dump on millions of people, as Ronald Reagan has done—on workers, on the needy, on minorities, on women, on the elderly—and strengthen your claim to re-election."

Other speakers addressing the convention included Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel, Metal Trades Dept. President Paul Burnsky, and Executive Director William Hutton of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Exercise in union jobs

The union label is getting a good workout at plants in New York and Pennsylvania under contract with the Ladies' Garment Workers thanks to Jane Fonda.

The Academy Award-winning actress, whose union memberships include the Screen Actors Guild, Actors' Equity and the Television & Radio Artists, is also a successful physical fitness author and instructor. When she decided to expand her fitness business to include a line of exercise and leisure clothing, Fonda insisted that the garments be made in the United States and in union shops.

The line, called Jane Fonda Workouts, is made in shops in the two states by New York-based Capri Beachwear, which has plans to nearly double its workforce to produce the clothing.

ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin, applauding Fonda's loyalty to the union label, said the effort proves "that you don't need a sweatshop to make a sweat suit."

Pilots warns of safety hazards on 'new' Continental Airlines

The Air Line Pilots asked Congress to investigate the "new" Continental Airlines, charging that the air carrier is unsafe to fly.

ALPA also wants the House Subcommittee on Governmental Activities & Transportation to determine whether the Federal Aviation Administration has failed to uphold strict safety standards on the Texas-based airline.

At a Washington press conference, ALPA President Henry A. Duffy warned that Continental's "clearly discernible and growing pattern of flight- and maintenance-related incidents flagrantly compromises the safety of its passengers and of the aircraft that must share the same airspace."

Duffy also charged that the FAA "has been evading its duty to monitor, investigate and correct the root cause of the compromises of safety that are occurring at Continental."

Continental broke its union contracts after filing for bankruptcy last year. It ceased operations briefly, but resumed operations as a cut-rate carrier, employing only a third of its workforce of 12,000 and imposing new work rules and salary cuts.

The Machinists, ALPA and an unaffiliated flight attendants union struck the carrier and fought its bankruptcy action in the courts.

Duffy said ALPA had reported 94 safety incidents to the FAA involving Continental, as of Apr. 2. The FAA has told the union only two of the incidents are under government investigation. "The FAA has been reluctant to step into a labor-management dispute," he charged, adding, "W want Congress to step in. Let them inspect the investigators."

Continental denied its practices are unsafe. But a CBS television news program, 60 Minutes, detailed reports made to the FAA of several near-accidents apparently caused by Continental pilots violating the airspace of other aircraft, and of a "hard" landing which damaged structural supports in a plane's fuselage. That plane flew six more flights before being repaired.

Richard Adams, Continental's senior vice president, was asked by CBS why the company had hired among its strikebreakers, "a pilot with severe psychiatric problems, a pilot who was a heroin smuggler and a pilot who crashed a private twin-engine plane." The company said that it has fired two pilots, suspended two, and put three under review based on the information made public by 60 Minutes.

Tax credit plan pays employers but adds no jobs

Employers have been pocketing $1 billion-a-year "for doing what they would do anyway," the AFL-CIO charged in House testimony opposing renewal of the Targeted Jobs Tax Credit Program.

Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor told a Ways & Means subcommittee that the program hasn't created any new jobs since it was inaugurated in 1978 as an incentive for firms to hire workers from "targeted" groups of hard-to-place job-seekers.

Its main advantage has been to employers, who get a tax saving worth $3,000 in the first year of employment and $1,500 in the second year. Targeted groups include such categories as persons on public assistance, handicapped applicants, Vietnam veterans and ex-offenders.

At most, Cantor noted, the program would give some groups of applicants an advantage over other job-seekers. In practice, he said, there is no evidence that the program has been of particular benefit to anyone but the employers.

Challenge denied

High court sanctions plant raids on aliens

The Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge brought by the Ladies' Garment Workers to factory raid tactics used by the Immigration & Naturalization Service in a search for undocumented aliens subject to deportation.

A federal appellate court had upheld the union's contention that the manner in which armed INS agents interrogated workers at two Los Angeles garment factories and blocked exits violated the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable search and seizure.

But a 7-2 majority of the Supreme Court disagreed. The majority opinion, by Justice William H. Rehnquist, contended that no rights had been violated because the questioning was not a "seizure" and a request for identification does not violate anyone's rights.

ILGWU General Counsel Max Zimny said the majority ruling diminishes the constitutional rights of all persons lawfully in the United States and gives tacit assent to practices more in tune with authoritarian regimes.

The union fought the legal battle in an effort to stop what it views as the harassment and intimidation of workers in relatively low-wage occupations in communities with large immigrant populations.

Its constitutional challenge was brought in the names of four ILGWU members at the raided plants—two of them American citizens and the other two legal residents of the United States.

Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., in a dissent joined by Justice Thurgood Marshall, charged that the court majority's view of the situation ignored realities.

Intimidation charged

While there was no physical restraint on workers, "show of authority" by the INS was "of sufficient size and force to overbear the will of any reasonable person," he said.

Brennan's dissent cited the large number of workers involved, the guarding of the exits, the handcuffing and removal of persons suspected of being illegal aliens.

He said testimony on the nature of the raid "paints a frightening picture of people subjected to wholesale interrogation under conditions designed not to respect personal security and privacy, but rather to elicit prompt answers from completely intimidated workers."

Teachers' Magidson elected by Jewish Labor Committee

New York — Teachers Vice President Herbert Magidson was elected president of the Jewish Labor Committee by the 200 delegates to the JLC's 50th anniversary convention. He succeeds Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Morton Bahr, a Communications Workers vice president, was elected treasurer, and Teachers President Albert Shanker remains secretary. John Fox, a Clothing & Textile Workers vice president, was elected administrative committee chairman.

Jules Kolodny, chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee on Holocaust Education, alerted the delegates to the report of the American Jewish Commission on the Holocaust due to be released late in the week. An appendix to the report notes that warnings in 1942 by the JLC, that some 700,000 Jews had been killed by the Nazis were met in the United States with indifference.

"The Jewish Labor Committee tried to awaken American Jewry to this immense tragedy; instead, it encountered lethargy and lack of real interest," the report said.

The commission report also reveals that "attempts to get the facts of the plight of European Jewry to the world and, especially to governments, were met with hopelessness," Kolodny said.

The JLC, as early as its founding in 1934, "unsuccessfully attempted to prevent the floating of American loans to Germany," the report states. And in 1936 the JLC with New York Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia, Gov. Herbert H. Lehman and AFL President William Green hosted an alternative Olympics on Randall's Island as part of the anti-Nazi boycott.

Common interests

Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, reassured the delegates of the ties between the black and Jewish communities. He stressed that although there are attempts "of some in the black community to drive a wedge between us, there is a commonality between the Jewish and black communities that must be strengthened."

Other speakers included Akiva Lewinsky, treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel; Leo Cherne, chairman of the International Rescue Committee; Al Chernin, executive vice president of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, and Jerry Goodman, executive director of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry.

Health insurance for jobless rejected in Senate

The House last year passed a labor-supported bill to continue health insurance protection for workers who lose their jobs, but it had not been acted on by the Senate. On Apr. 11, Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) proposed a similar measure as an amendment to a pending tax bill, but it was rejected by a 57-39 vote.

The 39 senators who voted for the Heinz amendment were in accord with the AFL-CIO's position.

Staying the Course

IT IS A MEASURE of progress in American society that the principle of enforceable equal rights for women—in and out of the workplace—now commands strong, bipartisan support.

That's not to say that the Neanderthals in Congress and the Reagan White House—or the Phyllis Schlaflys on the outside—have accepted such emerging concepts as pay equity. They clearly haven't. Some, in fact, haven't even digested the breakthroughs of the past that are now taken for granted.

It is worth recalling, if sometimes embarrassing, that it wasn't very long ago when the basic principles that now seem so unchallengeable, were less widely accepted.

A recent newspaper column brought a reminder of the almost accidental way in which the ban on sex discrimination in employment was written into the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964. It wasn't part of the script.

THE ORIGINAL bill that was brought to the House floor with the support of civil rights groups and the trade union movement prohibited job discrimination based on race, color, religion or national origin.

A leading Dixiecrat hoped to kill the civil rights bill, or at least its fair employment section, through an amendment adding sex discrimination to the list. He and his cohorts hoped this would make the legislation even more controversial and bring about its defeat.

The civil rights supporters in Congress actually were divided on the issue. There was concern that it would detract from the effort to overcome the more blatant and overt racial discrimination. The amendment was approved, but the attempt at mischief-making backfired. The end result was a stronger and more complete civil rights law.

LIKE A UNION contract, a law is only as good as its enforcement. And there were gaps in the overall civil rights law that had to be plugged by other measures—most notably the Voting Rights Act that so transformed southern politics.

One of the gaps was filled by a 1972 law which, prior to the Reagan Administration, had been interpreted as denying federal funds to a college or school that discriminated on the basis of sex in any of its activities.

The narrow interpretation which the Administration adopted, and which the Supreme Court this year accepted, was that such an institution could continue to receive federal funds for other programs that were not operated on a discriminatory basis.

Clearly, the effect of such reasoning would be to immunize institutions that discriminate from the remedial measures that put teeth in civil rights enforcement.

Since other civil rights laws had similar language involving the cutoff of federal funds, a major area of enforcement of nondiscrimination standards was endangered by the Supreme Court decision.

THE BROAD co-sponsorship of the legislation to remedy that narrow interpretation is encouraging.

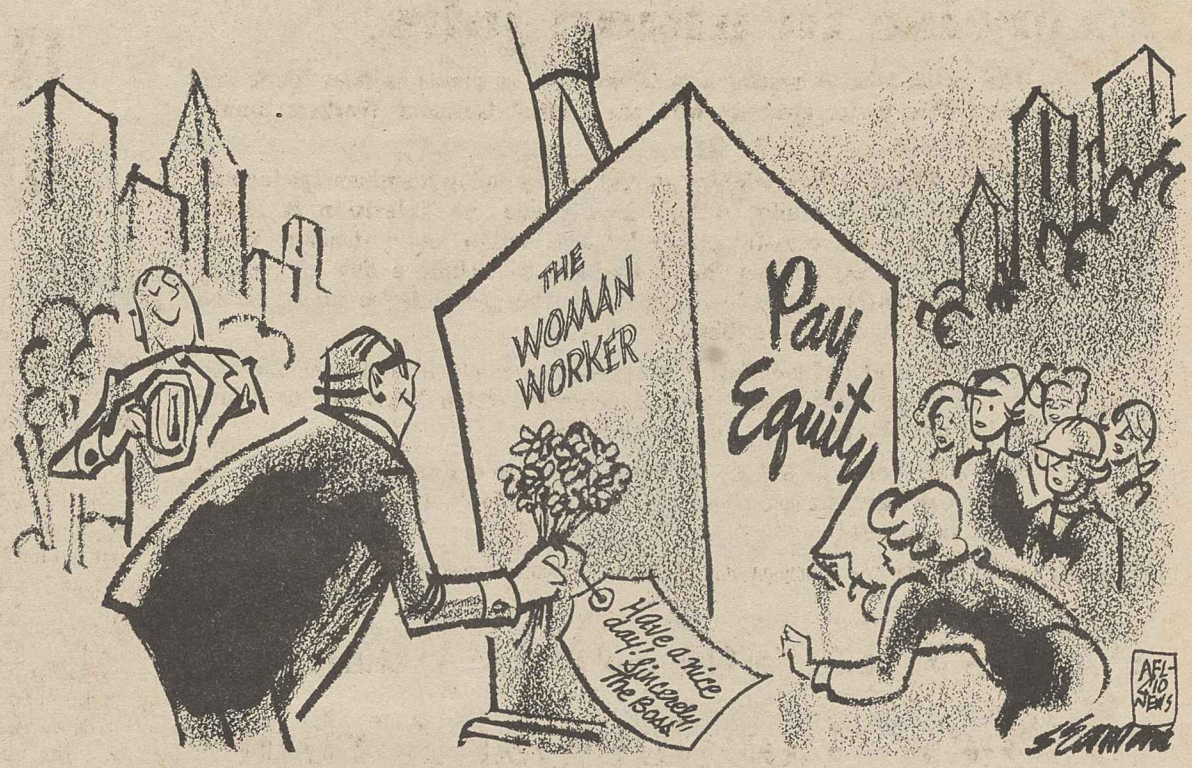
Given time, the bill would certainly pass. But with a short election-year session of Congress, time is scarce. There are ways, both overt and covert, to stall legislation. And there are ways, if joined in by the bipartisan leadership of Congress, to overcome delaying tactics.

It required a bipartisan effort to pass the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Now, 20 years later, it will require a bipartisan effort to prevent the erosion of a generation of progress.

Such an effort must be made.

In women's rights, in civil rights generally, we have all come a long way. But there's still a considerable distance to go to achieve full equality and full equity. Most of us are committed to getting there, and this is no time to be turning back.

Memo to the Boss



Washington Window

Reagan challenges proof his policies cause misery

By Press Associates, Inc.

"There are three kinds of lies: lies, damned lies and statistics."

—Attributed to Benjamin Disraeli, 19th Century British prime minister.

President Reagan just happened to have that quote on hand at a recent news conference to rebut a Congressional Budget Office report which confirmed that his budget and tax cuts have punished the poor and rewarded the rich.

He went on to claim that "there's absolutely no truth in it" and that it is "the most glaring example of political demagoguery."

It serves Reagan well in this election year to claim that statistics lie, but partisan and nonpartisan sources alike have analyzed the impact of three years of Reagan budget and tax policies and painted the same portrait of unfairness.

The nonpartisan CBO looked at the impact of the budget and tax cuts since 1981 on five income groups. It found that families with incomes under $10,000 gained about $20 a year from the Reagan income tax cuts, but lost about $410 from budget cuts in cash and non-cash benefits, for an annual net income loss of $390.

Rewarding the wealthy

Families earning $10,000 to $20,000 averaged an annual net income gain of $30, while those with incomes between $40,000 and $80,000 averaged a $2,900 net gain, and those with incomes over $80,000 pocketed an average net gain of $8,270.

The Coalition on Women & the Budget, made up of 78 civil rights, labor, women's and religious groups, found that women and children have borne a disproportionate share of the burden of Reagan's budget cuts.

Women were hurt most because they make up the majority of adults living below the poverty level. Female-headed households represented nearly 46 percent of families below the poverty income line in 1982. Consequently, women tend to rely on assistance programs more than men. In 1983, the 3.7 million families who received AFDC were mostly single-parent, female-headed households with young children.

Women harmed most

In 1981, the last time gender-based figures were available, about 66 percent of all Supplemental Security Income recipients were women. SSI provides cash benefits to poor, elderly, blind and disabled persons.

More than 60 percent of Medicaid recipients are women, and women and children make up over 85 percent of food stamp recipients.

Despite Reagan's cynicism about statistics, he offered a few of his own at the news conference. Speaking of the people who lost AFDC, food stamps, health care and other benefits due to his cuts, Reagan said that two-thirds of those who did not quit working after they were cut from the programs "sizably increased their actual earnings and became independent of welfare."

It may be true that those people became independent of welfare. But a recent GAO survey of five cities found that most of those cut from benefit rolls did not increase their incomes.

The GAO study explains some of the soaring demand on private feeding programs over the last few years.

It also helps to explain why 2.6 million people fell into poverty in 1982, bringing those living below the official poverty line of $9,862 for a family of four to a record 34.4 million, or 15 percent of the U.S. population.

It is ironic that the President earlier dismissed individual testaments of hunger and hardship related to food stamps, jobless benefits and other benefit cuts as "anecdotal," and not based on statistical facts. Now that those facts are pouring in, Reagan calls them lies.

MEMO FROM COPE

"This administration is committed to a balanced budget, and we will fight to the last blow to achieve it by 1984."

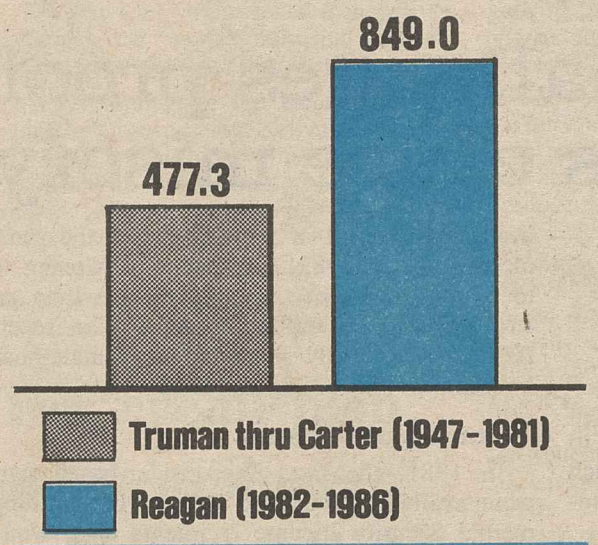
—President Reagan 9/21/81

"I did not come here to balance the budget—not at the expense of my tax-cutting program and my defense program. If we can't do it in 1984, we'll have to do it later."

—President Reagan 11/16/81

Comparison Of Reagan Deficits With Cumulative Post-War Deficits

(IN BILLIONS OF DOLLARS)



He'll have to do it—balance the budget—much later, it seems. For the record, as the graph above shows, the man who built a political career deploring budget deficits will run up 75 percent more red ink in four years than all his post-World War II presidential predecessors did in 34 years.

His total deficit Fiscal 1982-86 will be $849 billion, an average of $212 billion per year.

This will impose theoretical debt of almost $3,700 on every man, woman and child in the land, $14,800 on a typical family of four.

Of course, this won't be directly out of pocket for Americans living today. But indirectly, it could cost as much or more. The deficits stand in the way of healthy, long-term economic growth. Their spin-off effects could be devastating:

Continued high, indeed much higher, interest rates throttling economic activity, a renewed surge in unemployment—in short, a second Reagan Recession.

Is a Puzzlement!

'Teflon Ron'—Stick-Proof President

Voters in a recent poll gave Ronald Reagan negative ratings for his policies in Lebanon and Central America and his overall conduct of foreign policy.

Yet, in the same poll they gave Reagan a 59 percent personal popularity rating.

Except for the brief period before the full weight of his cuts in people-serving programs became evident, voters consistently have disapproved the cuts, while consistently approving the cutter.

By large margins—in many instances higher than 2-1—Americans support aid to education, nutrition and health programs and others at pre-Reagan levels or higher. Simultaneously, they give Reagan good marks as President.

There is, apparently, little linkage in the public mind of the man with his policies.

As the King of Siam said when confronted with the western notions of the English Anna: "Is a puzzlement."

Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.) has labelled Reagan's "the Teflon-coated presidency" because the effects of what he does seem to slide off of him.

Said Rep. Schroeder: "He sees to it that nothing sticks to him. He is responsible for nothing—civil rights, Central America, the Middle East, the economy, the environment. He is just the master of ceremonies at someone else's dinner." (Correction: He bravely took responsibility for the economy when it began to bounce back.)

One of his advisers explains the Teflon phenomenon this way: "After 20 years of running for office, he is still not viewed as a politician."

Pollster Peter Hart thinks Reagan somehow disassociates himself from the very government he heads, ducking responsibility thereby. "When Reagan talks, the government is never 'we,' it's always 'them,' " Hart says. So, "Things never become his problem; they're always government's problem."

All this might be true, but Reagan's going to have to go through a long campaign explaining his relationship to the last four years. Then, on November 6, when responsibility for policy collides with personal popularity, voters will render judgment on which means more to them.

What If . . . a Tale Of One-Vote-Counts

What if Walter Mondale goes to the Democratic national convention in July with 1,966 committed delegates . . . one delegate vote short of the required 1,967 for a first-ballot presidential nomination?

It could be the result of one vote in Kansas—and one card, too.

Mondale lost a delegate to Sen. Gary Hart in Kansas's 2nd Congressional District caucus after the two tied 69-69 on the second ballot to choose five delegates. Each candidate had won two; the fifth was up for grabs.

It was decided to settle the tie by a draw of the cards. Hart's side drew the jack of clubs, Mondale's the three of diamonds.

Wrong Again on Fair-Mindedness

The Big Chief of the Administration With a Heart, Ronald Reagan, messed up his data again. Claiming he runs a very fair-minded administration, he said recently "in the early 1960s we had fewer people living below the poverty line than we had in the later '60s after the great war on poverty got under way."

Census Bureau figures show 39.9 million Americans lived below the poverty level in 1960, 22.2 percent of the population.

In 1965, the figure was 33.2 million, or 17.3 percent. In 1969, the number was down to 24.1 million, 12.1 percent. And by 1980, it was at the 7 percent level.

AWAH has seen to it that the figures climb again. In 1983, 15 percent of Americans lived below the poverty level.

And, the Administration With a Heart shows it has a hearty appetite for more slices out of human welfare programs. Its recent proposal to freeze non-defense appropriations to $150 billion envisions big fund shifts within the limits.

Reagan, it is reported, wants $19 billion more over three years for foreign economic and military aid. That surely would have to be taken from other programs.

Guess where: Health, education, nutrition, welfare.

Finally, lest we forget, this is the administration that, when you talk about raising some taxes, doesn't look to corporations and the wealthy, but to workers. It's AWAH that wants to grab $8 billion from working people by taxing their health care fringe benefits. Reagan's proposal calls for treating as taxable income everything over $70 per month an employer pays for health insurance for an individual worker, everything over $175 for family coverage. Example: If your employer pays $250 a month to insure your family, you'd pay taxes on an additional $900 over a year. AWAH's notion would hit 30 million working Americans with higher taxes, affect almost 35 percent of all health care plans.

Odds 'n Ends

ELECTION COMMISSION predicts campaign expenditures will top $1 billion mark in 1983-84 election cycle, seeks bigger budget for expanded facilities, larger staff. Commission expects to have to process more than 52,000 reports and statements by 2,300 candidates for U.S. House and Senate, 4,000 political action committees, 700 political party committees and 500 other political entities. Its $1 billion-plus estimate applies only to federal elections. Huge funds expended in state legislative and ballot issue campaigns over and above federal contests, most heavily by corporations and business, trade associations. Their outlays will balloon total election costs at all levels beyond $1.3 billion.

REAGAN'S SHORT MEMORY problem shows up again. He lashes at those who criticize his nominee for Attorney General, Ed Meese, because of Meese's interest-free loans and unreported loans. Reagan says critics are politically motivated and they should "quit picking on people who haven't done anything wrong." Reagan, as political columnist in 1978, with an eye to running for President, wrote of one of Jimmy Carter's major embarrassments, Bert Lance. He pontificated: "What seemed to escape the President's notice all the while the Lance affair was simmering . . . was the fact that the average citizen resents what seems to be undue special privilege for a few in high places." Doesn't the average citizen resent it anymore?

ACCENT ON YOUTH within right-wing movement, as key groups reach out to campuses and to post-college ultra-conservatives. If it were a baseball team, it would be called "building for the future." Young America's Foundation, a part of Young Americans for Freedom (which has been around more than 20 years now) is building a nationwide student network, presumably for political, legislative action. It's arranging summer conferences, scholarships, has speakers bureau and publication. Executive Director James Taylor once worked for Right to Work (for less) Legal Foundation.

Rightist College Republican National Committee starts group to beam radio program on 500 college campuses, to provide news service to 300 campuses and plans a magazine of 250,000 circulation. Its chairman comes out of Conservative Caucus.

Heritage Foundation—brewer Joe Coor's baby—holds regular series of issues discussions featuring rightist activists, writers, politicians under 30 years old.

Finally, former special aid to Reagan, Morton Blackwell, is actively recruiting and training young fuddy-duddys for political action, with part of his program a job placement apparatus for the more promising trainees.

THANKS TO COLUMNIST George Will for further examples of historical political invective showing how cordial and tame exchanges between Walter Mondale and Gary Hart have been (Memo, April 7). Will recalls John Randolph said of a rival: "He shines and stinks like rotten mackerel by moonlight." Other notes from the past: Teddy Roosevelt said William McKinley had no more backbone than a chocolate eclair, and said of Oliver Wendell Holmes that he, TR, could carve a judge with more backbone from a banana. FDR's Interior Secretary Harold Ickes said Huey Long suffered from "halitosis of the intellect." When George Romney claimed U.S. officials in Vietnam had "brainwashed" him, Will recalls, then-Sen. Eugene McCarthy said in his opinion a light rinse would have sufficed.

Postal union contract talks cover 600,000

Postal negotiations opened with union and management negotiators far apart on just about everything except the desirability of making the collective bargaining process work.

Postal unions are seeking productivity pay raises and other contract improvements for the 600,000 employees of the U.S. Postal Service affected by the negotiations.

Management argues that unions have been so successful in past contract negotiations that postal wages have outstripped "comparable" private-sector jobs.

Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger said the goal of "good-faith negotiations" should be "closing the gap" so that the postal service can hold its own against competitive forms of communications.

Postal unions challenge management's assumption that wages are too high and reject its conclusion that pay levels should be brought down.

No givebacks

"There will be no givebacks," Presidents Moe Biller of the Postal Workers and Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers affirmed in a joint statement.

The two unions, which represent 500,000 postal employees, are bargaining together, as they did in the last round of contract talks three years ago.

Two smaller unions, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, are negotiating separately. Three years ago, Bolger delayed the start of negotiations a month by insisting on joint negotiations with all four unions. But the National Labor Relations Board slapped him down on that issue and the U.S. Postal Service did not challenge the unions on their bargaining lineup this year.

Biller and Sombrotto, meeting with reporters at the start of the negotiations, said their unions are not coming to the bargaining table with "a carload of proposals."

Productivity up

They cited the U.S. Postal Service's own report that over each of the past three years, productivity has risen, and they contended that postal workers "are as much responsible for the renewed health of the service as management is."

The union proposals seek no more than "equitable compensation, job security and health and safety protections," the two union presidents said.

Management's call for a rollback of wage levels reflected a directive from the U.S. Postal Service Board of Governors, whose members are appointed by the President. In an Apr. 3 statement, the policy-setting group which appoints the postmaster general and deputy directed

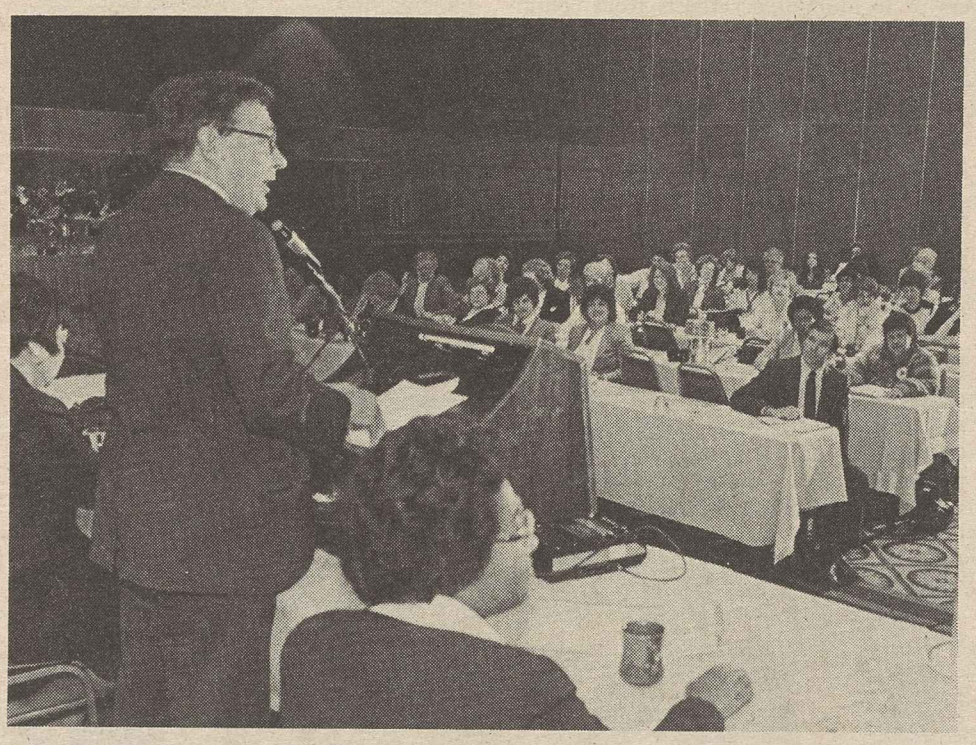
Working women gear up for all-out election effort



Women workers are the chief victims of the Reagan Administration's "cut-throat economics," Lane Kirkland charges in an address to the AFL-CIO Women Working for '84. Also addressing the conference were Federation Vice Presidents Joyce Miller, left, and Barbara Hutchinson.

New group mobilizes to get out vote

The votes of union members can help shape the outcome of the presidential and congressional elections, and a new AFL-CIO committee is working to see that they do.

More than 100 women leaders of 30 AFL-CIO affiliates took part in the national planning session of the recently formed AFL-CIO Women Working for '84.

The group, headed by two AFL-CIO vice presidents, has already begun get-out-the-vote activities to assure participation by union members in the presidential primaries and caucuses.

It will continue the effort for the remaining primaries in cooperation with COPE. Its members will continue to work, through Election Day next November, to assure that every eligible woman union member is registered to vote and to encourage support for the labor-endorsed candidate for President, Walter F. Mondale.

The committee is headed by Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers. The vice chair is Barbara Hutchinson, women's director of the Government Employees. Both are vice presidents of the AFL-CIO. Cynthia McCaughan, who is women's activities coordinator with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, will coordinate the committee's activities with COPE.

Growing force

Women have emerged as "a mighty force within the trade union movement" and their ranks will probably double over the next 10 years, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the committee members at their Washington planning meeting.

At the start of the session, Miller stressed that the "gender gap"—the high level of dissatisfaction among women with President Reagan's policies and performance—can be a critical factor in the election outcome.

"Mobilizing union women to register and vote may be the key to defeating Ronald Reagan," Miller said, and the committee's work will be "leading the way."

Protections threatened

Labor Dept. proposes return of child labor

Laws that have protected children from exploitation by employers for nearly half a century will be gutted if the Reagan Administration succeeds in its latest attempt to weaken child labor regulations, the AFL-CIO warned.

The Labor Dept. has announced that it will again propose changes in regulations under the Fair Labor Standards Act that would allow 14- and 15-year-olds to work longer hours, and would open up to young teenagers hazardous jobs prohibited under current rules.

The department said it also plans to revive its proposal to decrease already minimal reporting and certification requirements for employers who hire students at subminimum wages.

Similar revisions were proposed by the Administration in 1982, but they were withdrawn in the face of a storm of public protest from the AFL-CIO, Congress and other groups concerned with the exploitation of children.

The Labor Dept. announced its latest move on the child labor rules in its semi-annual agenda of proposed and current regulations, published in the Apr. 19 Federal Register. The agency said it expects to issue the new rules by the end of this year.

AFL-CIO Economist John Zalusky said the federation had not been consulted in advance about the Labor Dept.'s move, nor had it received any details on how the new rules will read. But he stressed that the summary of the proposals parallels closely the same rules the AFL-CIO had denounced as "outrageous" two years ago.

If those changes had been successful,

House panel pushes industrial bill

The United States will "slide back into recession" if it doesn't modernize its industrial base and make American-manufactured goods more competitive in world markets, the House Banking Committee warned.

Its report, making the case for the industrial competitiveness bill supported by the committee's Democratic majority, warned that the nation can't prosper solely as a service economy or rely for jobs on so-called high-tech industries.

A service economy can't sustain the growth the nation needs and high-tech expansion depends on basic industry for its markets, the committee report noted. "A stagnant manufacturing sector will almost inevitably lead to a stagnant economy."

The bill supported by the report would establish a Council on Industrial Competitiveness, made up of high-level representatives of business, labor, government, academic and public interest groups to seek a consensus strategy to help make American industry more competitive.

Balancing policies

It would explore the effect of government policies on that goal. As an example, the committee report notes that government policies intended to promote reinvestment in industrial modernization "may be undercut by other policies providing incentives for plant closings" or encouraging "relocation of American plants overseas."

The council would make recommendations to Congress and the President, and set policy guidelines for a Bank for Industrial Competitiveness, which would participate in market-rate loans primarily funded by private investment for industrial revitalization.

Such investments, the committee report suggested, "will often require the negotiation of commitments from all parties—from management, from labor, from banks, from suppliers, and from communities and governments where plants are located."

The AFL-CIO, which has endorsed the goals of the legislation, has already expressed its support for such a concept.

Polish unionists targets of 'official terrorism'

A detailed report on human rights abuses in Poland warns that new methods of repression, including the use of "official terrorism," are being employed by the Polish government against members of the Solidarity trade union movement.

The 94-page report, prepared by the New York-based Committee in Support of Solidarity, documents "the continuation of gross and massive violations of human rights," including a sharp increase in abductions, beatings and killings by Polish security police in 1983 and the first three months of 1984.

The report documents the killings of 24 Solidarity members in 1983 alone. The victims were found dead in ditches, outside workplaces, near railroad tracks, or in wrecked cars, usually with evidence of beatings. Among them were two of the highest ranking Solidarity leaders in Silesia. Both had told their families of being threatened with death by secret police.

The normal practice of the authorities has been to cover up rather than investigate these deaths, which often clearly point toward the security police or complicity by known collaboraters with the police. In February, a Rural Solidarity leader, Piotr Bartoszcze, was found dead in a well with clear evidence of murder, according to his parish priest. The authorities said Bartoszcze fell into the well while drunk, although he was known not to drink.

The most recent cases verified by the independent Helsinki Committee in Poland and by the underground Solidarity press bring to 72 the number of known killings of trade unionists since the imposition of martial law in December 1981. Piotr Naimski, a spokesman for the Committee in Support of Solidarity, pointed out that there could well be many more such murders that have gone unreported.

"We don't know about many small towns, where the secret police could terrorize a whole community with the murder of a Solidarity activist," Naimski said.

Beatings and torture

The report charges that beatings and torture have been used by security forces to obtain desired confessions from prisoners or to intimidate activists from continuing union activities. One case involved the 17-year-old student, Grzegorz Przemyk, who was beaten to death following his arrest on May 13, 1983. Although the murder resulted in a huge public outcry in Warsaw, forcing the authorities to conduct an investigation, no security officers have been arrested and the prosecutors are likely only to charge two ambulance attendants who drove Przemyk to a hospital after the beating.

"There is clear documentation that the Polish government is engaging in terrorist tactics against Polish society," said the executive director of the committee, Eric Chenoweth. "They have failed to crush the Solidarity movement and are resorting to new methods of repression to try to intimidate people from being active in independent underground forms of resistance."

The committee said it has just received information that the Polish secret police in Torun have started a group called "Organization Anti-Solidarity" which issued a leaflet last month threatening to attack Solidarity supporters. This followed numerous cases of kidnappings, disappearances, and beatings of Solidarity members in Torun.

The committee compiled its report from official Polish government and army publications as well as documents supplied by the Helsinki Committee in Poland and independent Solidarity publications printed underground.

"Cruel and inhuman punishment is inflicted against political prisoners, especially when they attempt to gain improvement of harsh prison conditions or to gain redress for inflictions of force against them," the report charges. It says political prisoners are prevented from receiving visitors, parcels, and correspondence, have their exercise periods reduced, and are beaten or removed to single cells or "tiger cells" for initiating any peaceful protest actions.

There were at least 300 political prisoners at the end of 1983. Since then, a massive police sweep throughout Poland has resulted in the arrests of at least 210 more, according to government figures. This does not include thousands of people who have been called in for interrogations or been detained for 48-hour periods.

Although martial law, first imposed in December 1981 to crack down on the Solidarity trade union movement, was lifted in July 1983, and the authorities announced a conditional amnesty, many Solidarity leaders and activists remained in jail and new repressive legislation was passed in place of martial law decrees giving broad powers of arrest, detention, and coercion.

Committee members

The Committee in Support of Solidarity, whose board includes AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Teachers President Albert Shanker, submitted the report to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which met in Geneva last month. The commission had criticized human rights abuses in Poland in 1982 and 1983, but this year voted to "delay" consideration of a critical resolution for one year, following a report by UN Sec.-Gen. Perez de Cuellar which praised "the Polish government's spirit of moderation."

American and Western European delegations criticized the Secretary-General's report. "It is the great disappointment of this session," said the head of the U.S. delegation, Richard Shifter.

The committee also has submitted its report to the International Labor Organization's Commission of Inquiry on Poland, which is scheduled to report to the coming ILO conference.

Illinois high court upholds state law on prevailing pay

Springfield, Ill.—The constitutionality of the Illinois prevailing wage law and its formula for computation have been upheld in a pair of state Supreme Court rulings.

The court reversed a circuit court ruling that found the law unconstitutional in the case of Bernardi v. Roofings Systems, Inc. In a separate ruling, the state Supreme Court upheld an appellate court decision that both the prevailing wage law and the method of calculating the prevailing wage rate are constitutional.

The Illinois law excludes private sector wages from its calculations of the prevailing wage rate.

Illinois AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson welcomed the two high court decisions stressing that they "guarantee that workers on public construction projects will be paid at decent wage levels and the public will be assured good, solid construction work on public buildings throughout the state."

Gibson said the law is intended to insure that outside contractors cannot come into a locality and undercut wage rates negotiated by workers with local contractors.

"We are convinced that today's court decisions will insure continuation of top-notch public construction work, done by good contractors using decently paid Illinois workers," he said.

The law, enacted 45 years ago, requires that workers on public building projects which are funded by public tax dollars must be paid at wage levels that are in line with those generally prevailing in the locality.

Battling 'right-to-work'

Minnesota AFL-CIO President David K. Roe, center, joined by some 200 union members at a state legislature hearing room, testifies against a "right-to-work" bill that would ban the union shop in private employment and repeal basic collective bargaining rights in public employment.

Labor calls for stronger law on 'country of origin' labeling

Unions and employers in the nation's apparel industry are asking Congress to strengthen requirements for "country of origin" labeling so that buyers are immediately aware if a product is made in the United States.

President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers and Executive Vice President Wilbur Daniels of the Ladies' Garment Workers urged a Senate Commerce subcommittee to approve legislation that would require a more conspicuous labeling of country of origin and its inclusion in advertising. It would also mandate "made in U.S.A." identification for garments manufactured in this country.

Officials of a number of employer trade associations also testified for the legislation.

Daniels noted that the measure would aid a crackdown on misleading labeling of foreign-made goods. He cited examples that carry brand names using U.S. or California in a clearly deceptive title. One foreign-made garment, he testified, is branded "U.S.A. Punkware."

Equally confusing to buyers, Daniels said, is the fact that some foreign-made products carry widely known brand names that in the past were associated with American-made goods.

Finley told the subcommittee of the efforts his union and employers in the industry are undertaking to make American goods more competitive despite the difficulty of competing with foreign workers whose pay might be only one-tenth of the U.S. minimum wage.

Neither the union nor the employers are seeking a halt to imports, he said. But such measures as stronger labeling requirements provide an inexpensive means of increasing consumer awareness and encourage purchases of American-made goods, Finley testified.

Trade Commission hits TV dumping

Unions in the television manufacturing industry hailed an International Trade Commission finding that imports dumped in the U.S. market by South Korea and Taiwan have injured American companies and workers.

The 4-0 ITC vote followed a final dumping determination against the two countries by the Commerce Dept. The United States had imposed import limits on color TVs from 1979 to June 30, 1982, but after the agreements expired, imports from South Korea and Taiwan surged.

The federal government can now impose duties retroactive to last October.

A petition asking for the ITC review was filed last year by the Electrical Workers, Electronic Workers, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and the unaffiliated Radionic Workers.

IUE President William Bywater said "production jobs in the American color TV industry have dropped 41 percent in seven years, with additional jobs lost in supplying and supporting industries.

IBEW President Charles Pillard said the acceleration of dumped imports from South Korea and Taiwan has posed the "major threat to employment among our color television workers." He said Commerce Dept. reports show the combined imports from South Korea and Taiwan have soared from 596,000 color TV sets in 1980 to over 2.6 million in 1983.

Food secretariat unions establish regional group

Five AFL-CIO affiliates have formed the North American Regional Organization of the International Union of Food & Allied Workers' Association (IUF) and elected Rene Rondou president. Rondou, secretary-treasurer of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers who serves on the IUF executive committee, helped spearhead the creation of the regional organization.

Delegates to the founding conference in Washington adopted bylaws and elected President Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, as vice president and Sally Cornwell, formerly with the staff of the International Labor Organization in Geneva, as secretary. Cornwell will handle the regional operations of the organization from an office in the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

The unions comprising the regional IUF in addition to the BC&T and RWDSU, are the Machinists, Food & Commercial Workers, and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

IUF Sec. Gen. Daniel Gallin congratulated the delegates for "taking this step which will build the strength of the IUF" in North America, as well as worldwide. He stressed the need to combat the trend toward union-busting on a global scale. The IUF has 186 affiliates in 63 countries, representing two million workers.

Multinational firms

Rondou told delegates that powerful multinationals are a source of serious concern for IUF affiliates.

"They are becoming more and more anonymous, causing the center of decision-making and production to move from one area of the world to another," he observed. "We have to change and adjust . . . We have to be involved in all the problems facing workers in all countries."

A panel discussion focused on the impact of transnational companies on labor-management relations. BC&T's Vaughn Ball, director of research and education, reported on the impact on tobacco and bakery products, while UFCW Vice President Samuel Delfino explained the effect on the food processing industry. FAST President Robert Harbrant detailed the impact of transnational hotel firms.

Cornwell presented a survey of the international corporations in the food and allied trades, and cited trends of foreign investment in the United States and American corporate investment abroad.

Las Vegas impasse

House panel probes assaults on strikers

Las Vegas, Nev.—Congressional investigators are looking into the bitter hotel-casino strike here as nationwide labor support mounted for 17,000 members of local culinary, bartender, musician and stagehand unions in their struggle for a contract renewal.

The House Labor-Management subcommittee at the request of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland began an investigation into the abuse of civil rights and police authority that triggered a wave of violent confrontations and more than 400 arrests of strikers in the nearly four-week walkout.

After Subcommittee Staff Director Fred Feinstein was snubbed by management in his attempt to gather facts, Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), chairman of the panel, suggested a full-blown hearing into the dispute might be in order.

Limited progress

Union negotiators made some progress in talks during the past week with Caesars World and Hilton Hotel Corp. on non-economic issues. Negotiators were expected to address wage and benefit provisions in subsequent sessions.

But unions face a long and tough conflict with Summa Corp., the legacy of the late multi-billionaire Howard Hughes which included five big properties: the Desert Inn, Sands, Frontier, Silver Slipper and Castaways. All are part of the 20-member Nevada Resort Association which has refused to accept contract terms and conditions that the four local unions negotiated with the resort city's 24 independent hotels.

As picket-line solidarity continued strong, the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees announced an internal fund-raising campaign with an immediate objective of $2 million.

HERE has distributed $700,000 per week in strike benefits to members of its Culinary Workers Local 226 and Bartenders Local 165.

HERE Local 5 in Honolulu contributed $100,000 to the strike relief fund the first day of the drive. Other early pledges included $10,000 per month each from New York's Local 6 and the city's Hotel Trades Council, and $5,000 per month from Seattle's Local 8, HERE Sec.-Treas. Herman T. Leavitt reported.

Assistance fund

Meanwhile, contributions to the AFL-CIO strike assistance fund have started to pick up, and the secretary-treasurer's office said it expects a strong response from affiliates and individual members. The national fund was launched with a $20,000 contribution from the Executive Council.

Members of Musicians Local 369, Stagehands Local 720 and HERE Culinary Local 226 whose employers have signed contracts are contributing $5 each per work shift to the local strike fund.

Union demonstrations on Apr. 19 in Boston, New York, Washington, Denver, Los Angeles and San Francisco carried the protest against the Hilton Corp.'s anti-worker actions in Las Vegas to banks and large holders of Hilton securities. The cross-country protest was part of a corporate campaign initiated by the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

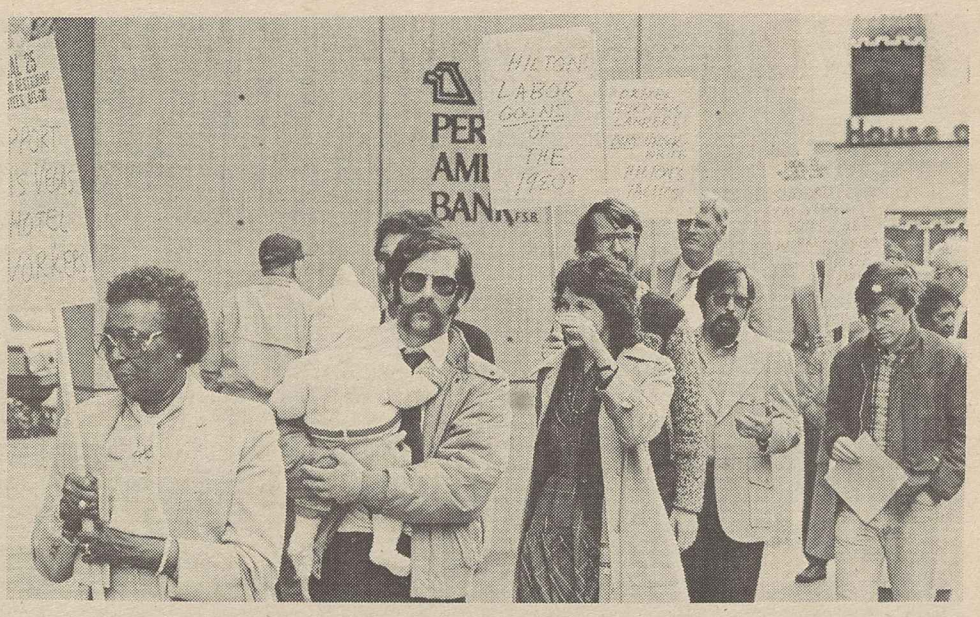
Inside reports

Reports from inside many of the larger struck hotels, including the MGM Grand, the two Hiltons and Caesars World, continued to paint a picture of slumping casino traffic, sputtering restaurant service and declining room occupancy.

The striking unions said thousands of potential visitors to Las Vegas were apparently shocked by the conduct of police and were staying away from the city.

Stagehands, led by local president Dennis Kist—himself arrested several times during picket line confrontations—were scheduled to demonstrate again despite certain police retaliation.

Kist said IATSE members would protest the attempt to reopen the Flamingo Hilton showroom with scab stagehands and taped music. A similar demonstration at the MGM Grand resulted in nearly 100 arrests, including Robert F. Harbrant, president of FAST.



Union members march in Washington in support of striking Las Vegas hotel workers. Similar demonstrations were held in Boston, New York, Denver, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Labor Dept. revives scheme to weaken child labor laws

Zalusky said, they would have undermined a century of struggle by organized labor to assure that children are protected from exploitation.

The Labor Dept.'s latest announcement suggests that the Administration still seeks to satisfy the desires of some employers for a cheap, exploitable child workforce, Zalusky said.

According to its regulatory agenda, the Labor Dept. will try again to change the rule limiting the number of hours 14- and 15-year-olds can work and expand the number of jobs they can be hired for to include a number that have previously been considered too dangerous for them.

Another proposal would make it legal for employers to hire 16- and 17-year-olds for jobs involving power-driven bakery machinery, for jobs involving slaughtering, meat packing and processing, rendering and other work involving driving motor vehicles and doing other work outside vehicles. Current regulations put those jobs off-limits as too hazardous.

The Labor Dept. said it would again try to revise the rule that currently requires annual recertification of employers authorized to hire full-time students at subminimum wages. The department said the change would "free" wage and hour staff for "more important work" and "reduce a paperwork burden upon employers."

Zalusky pointed out that the annual certification requirement is "the only effective means we have to make sure that employers are not using the 'student wage' scheme to displace older workers and hire youngsters, and to assure that these young people are not being subjected to even greater exploitation than that of a sub-standard wage in the first place."

He questioned the Administration's contention that the simple certification form is a "burden," and he pointed out that employers already reap tremendous benefits from the student wage and other hiring incentives.

The combined use of the existing youth subminimum wage and tax incentives to hire disadvantaged youth already enables employers to hire young people for about 70 cents an hour, Zalusky said.

Changing the rules

In a separate proposal affecting wage and hour standards, the Labor Dept. would also renew efforts to press through its broader interpretation of rules exempting "executive," "administrative," "professional," and "outside sales employees" from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the FLSA.

The Administration tried a similar rule change in 1981, proposing to raise the salary test for exempt employees by only small steps.

The AFL-CIO called the change—which was later pulled back—inadequate, charging that the Administration wanted to keep the salary thresholds so low that millions of workers, particularly in "white-collar" occupations would be exempt from crucial wage and hour protections.

Two craft unions sign jurisdictional accord

The Roofers and the Sheet Metal Workers hammered out an agreement aimed at resolving jurisdictional conflicts.

The accord, signed by Roofers President Roy E. Johnson and Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough, notes that the unions have "historically and traditionally worked side by side." It resolved that "each craft shall continue to apply the work which traditionally has come under the jurisdiction of that trade, regardless of the type of material used or of the product applied."

Supreme Court rejects move to gut dues formula

The Supreme Court rejected a "right-to-work" group's attempt to render ineffective union shop agreements authorized by the Railway Labor Act and ruled that even workers who claim an exemption from full union dues because of political or ideological differences with the union must pay their share of most union expenses.

At issue was how narrowly the court would apply its earlier decisions dealing with the dues obligations of workers covered by union shop agreements in the railway and airline industries.

A suit financed by the legal arm of the National Right to Work Committee had challenged the dues formula worked out by the Railway & Airline Clerks (BRAC) for a group of employees at Western Airlines who at the time of the suit were covered by a union shop contract.

BRAC had already provided a rebate system covering areas that previous court decisions had established as beyond the union's bargaining-related role, with a public review board to resolve differences. But the suit brought on behalf of the anti-union dissidents sought to limit the required payment to the direct cost of negotiations and contract administration within the bargaining unit.

The anti-union group won a partial victory in federal district court. But the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals sided with the union on virtually all aspects of the case.

The appellate court found that all of the challenged activities "strengthened the union as a whole," making it a more effective collective bargaining agent.

The Supreme Court backed the union position on the principal issues in dispute, but BRAC expressed disappointment with some of the court's interpretations.

The setbacks included a Supreme Court conclusion that the union's organizing expenses had only "an attenuated connection" with collective bargaining and therefore the dissidents didn't have to share in the organizing costs.

Organizing link

It's obvious, BRAC commented, that the degree of organization in a trade or industry has a direct bearing on the ability of organized workers to negotiate improved wages and working conditions.

The union also questioned limitations on litigation expenses in calculating required dues payments. In another controversial aspect, the court said the union's rebate procedure should either be modified by being handled through an interest-bearing escrow account or replaced by a system of reduced dues for the dissidents.

But the Supreme Court rejected entirely the attempt by the anti-union group to exclude a broad range of other union activities.

One target of the suit was the use of dues money for union convention expenses. But conventions are a necessary element of a union's activities, the Supreme Court affirmed, "and seem to us to be essential to the union's discharge of its duties as bargaining agent."

The Supreme Court noted that BRAC already exempted a portion of union publication expenses dealing with political issues from the obligatory dues formula. That adequately met the court test, the Supreme Court said. It noted the variety of articles in BRAC's monthly magazine dealing with negotiations, contracts and other matters of concern to members.

The Supreme Court's conclusion was that "the magazine is important to the union in carrying out its representational obligations and a reasonable way of reporting to its constituents."

The anti-union group had even challenged modest union expenditures for social activities such as refreshments at union meetings. The Supreme Court dismissed such nit-picking, declaring that such modest expenditures, while "not central to collective bargaining," were "sufficiently related to it to be charged to all employees." Besides, it creates "a more pleasant environment for union meetings," the decision noted.

The court didn't deal directly with the small sum involved in the $300 death benefit BRAC provides, but suggested that the dissidents didn't have much of a claim for a refund since they had received a form of insurance protection for the period covered by their dues.

Free riders

The Supreme Court reiterated that the "essential justification" for the decision of Congress to allow the union shop in industries covered by the Railway Labor Act—even in states with "right-to-work" laws—"was the desire to eliminate free riders—employees in the bargaining unit on whose behalf the union was obligated to perform its statutory functions, but who refused to contribute to the cost thereof."

Therefore, the Supreme Court concluded, "objecting employees may be compelled to pay their fair share of not only the direct costs of negotiating and administering a collective bargaining contract and of settling grievances and disputes, but also the expenses of activities normally or reasonably employed" to implement a union's role as exclusive bargaining representative.

Public TV bookings grow for America Works series

The Labor Institute of Public Affairs reached an accord with a public television syndication service that will bring the "America Works" program series to at least 80 cities by the end of this year.

Under the agreement, the Inter-Regional Program Service will begin broadcasting the America Works series by satellite to PBS stations participating in the service. IPS consists of several hundred public television affiliates which formed the system as a way to obtain syndicated programming from sources other than the PBS network.

To date, about 60 stations have indicated that they will pick up the first 12 weekly America Works segments beginning in mid-June. Those programs, produced by LIPA, were previously broadcast during 1983 on 36 commercial stations across the country.

Nearly 80 PBS affiliates have said they will include six new episodes of the half-hour public affairs program in their weekly schedules. Those segments will be available for broadcast the first week in September.

LIPA, the AFL-CIO's television production and planning arm, said a full list of stations, dates and times for America Works programs will be available in May.

Nick DeMartino, LIPA's director of marketing and distribution, said that in many cities, local labor support was a key factor in persuading the area's public broadcasting channel to schedule America Works.

DeMartino pointed out that through the agreement with IPS, America Works will become the most widely broadcast public affairs program on public television outside of those distributed directly by PBS.

He said that the enthusiastic response of public stations is "a tremendous vote of confidence in the program, but even more important, it is a recognition of the fact that labor has long been under-served by American television."

Newsletter planned

DeMartino also said that LIPA is planning a newsletter, Relay, which will provide information on the institute's programs and services for labor organizations. It will include a section reporting on how unions and other labor groups are making effective use of electronic communications.

Those techniques also include programming produced by AFL-CIO affiliates and made available to public television. Among them are the "Inside Your Schools" series produced by the Teachers which focuses on major issues in American education, and public affairs specials such as "Facing the Future: Working Women in Tomorrow's World," produced by the State, County & Municipal Employees for use by public and commercial television.

LIPA has also established an office in Los Angeles to begin developing labor-oriented entertainment programming. LIPA's representative in that office will be Harvey Kahn, who was formerly director of publicity and public relations for the Disney Channel, a pay television service.

Maritime Union reaches accord on dry cargo pact

The National Maritime Union has reached agreement with the operators of deep sea dry cargo ships on a new three-year contract that continues existing pay and benefits. It includes a one-time opportunity to reopen the agreement if industry conditions improve during the contract period.

NMU President Shannon J. Wall said the same terms would be "left on the table" for tanker companies, which have been insisting on a 7.5 percent pay cut and a reduction in vacation time and payments.

Contracts expire

The dry cargo pact, subject to ratification by NMU members, was the result of early negotiations with the Maritime Service Committee of ship owners. The existing contracts for both dry cargo vessels and tankers expire on June 15.

Wall said the union was pleased that the contract assures continued funding of the NMU's Upgrading & Training School, despite the industry's depressed state. It also meets the NMU's demand that operators furnish sea survival suits for all NMU crews by the end of this year.

The contract allows one reopener on wages and benefits during the last two years of the contract.

Wall noted that at various times in the past, the union has "reacted to a sick industry" by not insisting on wage increases.

This year's agreement, he said, is in line with a bargaining strategy "to provide maximum protection for the gains we have achieved over the past decade."

For presidential campaign

Platform proposals stress fairness theme

Birmingham, Ala.—America's workers and their unions called on the Democratic Party to restore fairness in government and mend the economic and social wounds inflicted by the Reagan Administration.

AFL-CIO Vice President Glenn E. Watts told a regional hearing of the Democratic Platform Committee that Reagan Republicans "have substituted special privilege for the general welfare."

Under Reagan, he charged, "poverty in America increased by 40 percent" and "30 million families have been injured by unemployment that was deliberately induced in the name of 'fighting inflation.' "

Watts, who is president of the Communications Workers, testified for the AFL-CIO at the Birmingham platform hearings.

Others who testified included Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees, local, state and regional officers of a number of unions including the Teachers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Government Employees, Rubber Workers, the unaffiliated Mine Workers—and an out-of-work miner whose unemployment compensation benefits and medical insurance protection have been exhausted.

Watts told the committee that slashes in the "safety-net"—programs that were supposed to insulate the most needy from the hardships of Reagan cutbacks—caused the eviction of 450,000 families from their homes because they couldn't keep up mortgage payments.

He cited the rollback in protection under the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the death toll from asbestos and the "25 million workers exposed every day to toxic substances that can kill much more quickly."

The United States was once "a world leader in the fight for safe and clean workplaces," Watts said. Now, "the lives and health of workers are sacrificed to the greater glory of the corporate balance sheet."

Funding need

Watts stressed the need for restoring funding for health services, enacting cost-containment legislation and assuring access to health care for America's unemployed.

"Our aim now should be to begin where the New Deal left off," he urged, calling on the Democratic Party to "place human needs, human hopes and the general welfare at the head of its agenda."

Other witnesses dealt with some of the specific areas of need. Lucy, testifying for AFSCME, pressed for voter registration laws that will make it easier for Americans to go to the polls. He urged renewed consideration to such proposals as postcard registration and registration up to the day of voting.

Lack of general counsel puts NLRB enforcement on hold

The National Labor Relations Board, already under strength because of President Reagan's failure to fill a vacancy that has existed since last August, is now without a general counsel to prosecute violations of federal labor law.

Regional directors can continue to receive and investigate charges of unfair labor practices brought by unions or employers. But the enforcement machinery stops at that point. Only the general counsel can issue a complaint that leads to hearings before an administrative law judge or dismiss a charge as unwarranted.

Term ends

The NLRB has been without a general counsel since the four-year term of William A. Lubbers expired at midnight Apr. 23. The surprise White House choice to replace him was Rosemary M. Collyer.

Collyer, a relatively inexperienced attorney who was named to head the Federal Mine Safety & Review Commission when the Reagan Administration took office, faces confirmation hearings by the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee before the nomination can be sent to the Senate floor.

Her appointment is as controversial as the others the Reagan Administration has made to put its pro-management stamp on the NLRB, and the AFL-CIO expressed serious concerns when her nomination was announced.

Collyer was only four years out of law school when she was given a Reagan Administration political appointment. She is inexperienced in labor law except for her affiliation with a law firm representing management.

By contrast, Lubbers was a career attorney with the NLRB when he was named to the independent post of general counsel in the Carter Administration.

There was no immediate indication whether the White House would name an acting general counsel, pending a Senate decision on the Collyer nomination.

management to "seek correction" of the wage structure.

The current contract expires on July 20, and the law provides for a fact-finding procedure in the event of an impasse, with binding arbitration if an impasse persists 180 days after the start of bargaining.

Strikes by postal workers are illegal under federal law. Nevertheless, they are a possibility if no agreement is reached and the membership so decides, the two union presidents said.

They expressed "guarded optimism" that an agreement can be reached on a new three-year contract "through the process of good-faith bargaining on both sides."

After a wildcat 1970 strike by postal employees in a number of cities, Congress made the U.S. Postal Service a semi-autonomous agency and provided a collective bargaining mechanism for setting pay and most conditions of employment.

Postal workers remain under the federal government retirement program.

The USPS bargaining, covering 600,000 employees represented by the four unions, is the largest contract negotiations with a single employer in 1984.

County sued on sex bias in pay policy

Westbury, N.Y.—The State, County & Municipal Employees are suing Nassau County, N.Y., charging the county government with sex discrimination in its wage policies.

In a suit filed in federal district court, the union charged the suburban New York county with violating the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that outlaw wage discrimination.

The action is similar to AFSCME's landmark pay equity victory last year in Washington State when a federal judge found the state guilty of sex-based wage discrimination.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee announced at a news conference here that the union had filed the charges "on behalf of 5,500 people who work in predominantly female jobs in the county government."

Overall, AFSCME represents 14,000 Nassau County employees, about half of whom are women.

The union is asking for both pay upgrades and back pay in the suit. No dollar amount has been set.

McEntee said the union tried for over a year "to work responsibly through collective bargaining to remedy pay disparities that exist between male-dominated jobs and jobs of comparable value and worth which are filled mainly by women."

"Unfortunately," he said, "management hasn't been willing to listen.

Local action

Rita Wallace, president of AFSCME Local 830 in the county, told reporters the local union had filed similar wage and sex discriminiation charges against the county with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in November 1983, but the EEOC refused to act.

Wallace said AFSCME had asked the county to undertake a job evaluation study in order to change pay scales, but when the county did nothing, the union conducted its own evaluation using county pay records. The results "confirmed our worst fears," she said.

Although half the county employees are women, "women make up 90 percent of the employees in the lowest pay grades," Wallace pointed out.

She said the survey also found that women are paid less "even though the skill, effort and responsibility required by a female's job is the same or greater than the skill, effort and responsibility required by a male's job."

Moving ahead at 50

Fiftieth anniversary celebration of the founding of the Transport Workers includes a month-long exhibition, titled "Moving Ahead—the TWU at 50." The display at Automation House in New York City features union documents, artifacts and photographs, such as the one above taken in 1951, showing 5,000 TWU members demonstrating for the 40-hour work week. On the platform are former TWU Presidents Michael Quill and Matthew Guinan. New York Gov. Mario M. Cuomo declared Apr. 25, when the show opened, Transport Workers Union Day.

House approves reforms in dock injury benefits

The House approved a labor-endorsed package of amendments to the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, clearing the way for a conference with the Senate, which passed its own version of the bill last year.

At issue is the shaping of a measure that would meet the problem of unexpectedly high costs and unclear definitions under 1972 amendments to the law without taking away basic protections for dock workers injured on the job.

The House bill, which was adopted by voice vote under a no-amendment rule, is preferable to the Senate version, the AFL-CIO said. Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote House members before the vote that it represents "a commendable effort to correct problems and bring proper reform to the inefficiencies" or compensation law and "most importantly safeguard the rights of injured workers in maritime and related industries."

The legislation clarifies coverage, sets a 5 percent cap on the annual increase in benefits and increases penalties for fraud.

Real wages continue slide, consumer prices level off

Workers' real weekly earnings dipped in March for the second month in a row, slipping three-tenths of 1 percent after adjustment for inflation and seasonal factors while consumer prices leveled off.

The decline follows a four-tenths of 1 percent drop in February after the wage index had edged up in December 1983 and this January, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Over the year, real earnings were up 1.6 percent, but still are below their 1979 level. Expressed in constant, uninflated 1977 dollars, real weekly earnings for nonsupervisory workers on private non-farm payrolls averaged $172.59. In March 1979, such earnings averaged $186.39.

BLS linked the drop in earnings in both March and February to a decline in hours of the workweek. Average hours dipped six-tenths of 1 percent in March after dropping three-tenths of 1 percent in February.

The bureau's consumer price index for urban wage earners and clerical workers (CPI-W) was unchanged in March after a one-tenth of 1 percent increase in February. Over the year, the CPI-W rose 3.5 percent.

By another index—the CPI for all urban consumers (CPI-U) — the March cost of living rose by two-tenths of 1 percent. CPI-W is the index used for indexing social security and some other federal payments and is commonly used as an escalator in collective bargaining agreements. The indexes differ primarily because different factors are used in each to calculate homeownership costs.

Food costs

In the CPI-W index, food prices were unchanged after two months of upward movement. The index for meats, poultry and fish dropped 1.2 percent in March, although the prices for sugar and sweets posted a 1 percent increase. Compared to last year, food prices were up 3.9 percent.

Homeownership costs dropped seven-tenths of 1 percent in March and were down nine-tenths of 1 percent from 1983.

A 4.4 percent drop in heating oil prices contributed to an overall one-tenth of 1 percent decline in energy prices. The cost of gas and electricity fell three-tenths of 1 percent, but gasoline jumped 1 percent. Compared to last year, energy prices averaged 4.6 percent higher.

Utilities other than fuels edged down three-tenths of 1 percent in March, following two months of increases due laregly to boosts in local telephone service charges.

Medical care costs rose four-tenths of 1 percent last month and were up 6.5 percent over the year.

There was a significant increase—1.4 percent in the index for personal and education expenses, including costs such as the cost of tuition and school fees. That index is up 10.3 percent from a year ago.

OSHA trails environmental agency

The Environmental Protection Agency imposed mandatory limits on ethylene dibromide residues in raw grain and grain products and moved to place new restrictions on ethylene oxide, a cancer-causing sterilizer used in hospitals.

But the Occupational Safety & Health Administration continues to proceed slowly on regulation of EDB and is under a court order to produce a final standard on EtO by June 15.

The environmental agency made mandatory the voluntary guidelines it issued in February limiting EDB residues. It also acted to remove the exemption the cancer-causing chemical has had for nearly three decades, thereby permitting the Food & Drug Administration to actively enforce the new regulations.

EDB residues will be limited to 900 parts per billion in raw grains, such as wheat, oats, corn and rice; 150 ppb in cake mixes, pancake mixes and other grain-based foods that must be cooked before serving, and 30 ppb in ready-to-eat products, such as breads, cereals and cookies.

Several states, including Maine, New York, Florida, Massachusetts and California, proposed or enacted more stringent regulations that will not be pre-empted by the EPA rule as some industry groups had sought. The new regulations will provide enforcement policy.

The AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., said the environmental agency forged its action on EDB in a few months, while OSHA has stalled for more than three years in developing a regulation to sufficiently protect workers.

"The EPA's current limit of 30 ppb for consumers makes a mockery out of the OSHA exposure limit of 20,000 ppb for workers," FAST job safety specialist Deborah Berkowitz charged.

Regulatory reluctance

"OSHA's conciliatory approach to industry and its reluctance to regulate are responsible for its inaction. It will be late this year before OSHA makes a move to protect those remaining workers who are exposed to EDB."

OSHA proposed reducing the EDB exposure limit to 100 ppb. It held hearings in February and expects to issue a new standard late this year.

On the sterilizer EtO, the EPA announced regulations providing for labeling changes by manufacturers of the chemical and modifications to the workplace, such as manually operated valves on gas lines, "capture boxes" to enclose floor drains in rooms that have sterilizing equipment, and improved ventilation systems.

OSHA agreed to publish a final EtO standard by June 15 to meet a deadline set recently by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. That court in a March 1983 ruling held OSHA had "unreasonably delayed" action on EtO.

The State, County & Municipal Employees, the Service Employees, Clothing & Textile Workers, and District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union had joined the Public Health Research Group in suing for a standard.

Attorney David C. Vladeck, who represented the health group and the unions in the case, negotiated with OSHA to get the commitment for a final standard by June 15. Vladeck said that if the agency doesn't meet the deadline it could be ruled in contempt of court.

OSHA had proposed lowering EtO exposure levels for workers to 1 part per million, down from 50 ppm. The unions had petitioned for an emergency standard in August 1981, and want the exposure level to be set at 0.5 ppm. OSHA reportedly hasn't cleared the proposed standard through the White House Office of Management & Budget, and some union health and safety specialists have expressed concern that OSHA will weaken the standard's provision on respirators to accommodate OMB's cost-consciousness at the expense of workers.

Anderson, Ellenberger assigned to new posts

Mark A. Anderson has joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research as an economist specializing in international trade and investment, and James Ellenberger has joined the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security as a specialist in unemployment insurance, workers' compensation and OSHA.

Both were formerly with the Dept. of International Affairs.

Earlier, Anderson had been a program officer at the Asian-American Free Labor Institute. He joined the AFL-CIO staff in 1976.

Ellenberger had been an Asian affairs specialist since he joined the federation in 1975 after two years with AAFLI.

Union women mobilize for election drive

Hutchinson explained the committee's role as an arm of COPE and stressed that its activities would be aimed at reaching women members of AFL-CIO unions and their families.

Kirkland said the Reagan Administration has made women the nation's fastest-growing poverty group—the chief victims of "cutthroat economics."

He assailed the Administration's backsliding on efforts "to promote equality and justice in the workplace" and termed women the "chief victims" of Reagan's reversal of the thrust toawrd equality in American life.

But thanks to "the example and the missionary activity of women trade unionists," Kirkland said, "women workers from coast to coast are asserting that a worker is a worker, a person is a person, and a 40 percent wage gap is 100 percent wrong."

Gender gap

He called the "gender gap" the measure of women's greater dissatisfaction with President Reagan—"not a biological phenomenon, but a moral one."

Kirkland said that women trade unionists—as well as the rest of the labor movement—have the job of putting a stop to "Mr. Reagan's efforts to divide the American people into a privileged upper class and permanent under class of under-paid, under-employed and under-respected people, male and female."

By contrast, Kirkland said, the AFL-CIO has determined to give its "trust and support to a candidate whose record of fairness and respect for the rights of every citizen has fully earned that support: Walter Mondale."

Goals for future activities adopted by the committee include programs to educate union women about campaign issues which are important to their interests. At the same time, the group will work to make sure that candidates on the state, local and national level are fully aware of the concerns of working women.

Political education

The committee said it will stress education programs for union women that document how Reagan policies have directly and adversely effected them.

Much of the committee's activities in cooperation with COPE will be aimed at generating support for Mondale among union women and their families.

The group also set up an organizing subcommittee composed of women COPE directors of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Earlier this year, the committee worked with COPE in preparation of a flyer outlining Mondale's extensive record of support for issues of critical importance to women workers, and the participants discussed plans to publish other materials on women's issues for use by national and local unions and their publications.

The national committee will also work with individual AFL-CIO unions that want to establish similar committees within their own organizations, and the group will work with state and local central labor bodies on political education activities aimed at women union members.

Its next meeting will be June 26 in Washington, D.C.

Never forget

Memorial wreath for victims of the Mar. 25, 1911, Triangle Shirtwaist Co. fire is laid by Ladies' Garment Workers officers at the site of the sweatshop blaze that took the lives of 146 garment workers. The tragedy inspired public support of the union fight against sweatshops. At the memorial site in New York are, from left, Deputy Fire Commissioner James Harding, Rosa Mejias of the ILGWU Education Dept., ILGWU Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur and Executive Vice President Wilbur Daniels and Fire Chief Herbert Gormley.

State legislative drives seek to regulate video terminals

A grass-roots lobbying campaign by AFL-CIO affiliates succeeded in introducing bills in 10 state legislatures for safety regulations on video display terminals.

The lack of a federal regulation on VDTs prompted the unions to press for state-level action, in much the same way labor campaigned for right-to-know laws on toxic substances in workplaces.

With the number of VDT users expected to increase from the current seven million to 20 million by the end of the decade, unions have called for immediate action to protect and aid the terminal operators.

Spearheading the state-by-state push for legislation are the Service Employees, Newspaper Guild, Communications Workers and the State, County & Municipal Employees. Although the Guild has drawn up a model law on VDT regulation covering rest breaks, eye examinations, VDT design variables and protection for pregnant workers, many of the state bills authorize only study committees to explore the need for regulation.

Maine was the first state to address such legislation and was followed by New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Illinois, Ohio, Rhode Island, California, Oregon, and most recently, Hawaii.

In Maine, the legislature authorized the state Bureau of Labor Standards to issue any regulations deemed necessary by a study committee it set up, AFSCME Economist Kevin Murphy reported.

Speedy action vital

Key to labor's push for legislative action is the need to get laws in place "before technology is locked in," Murphy said. Technology will soon reach a point where "we will have a larger battle in getting machines retrofitted," he added.

Guild Research Director David Eisen said there is a high degree of cooperation among unions in the state-level effort to gain VDT legislation. He noted that the unions have been aided by the AFL-CIO state and local central bodies.

Eisen noted that a proliferation of state laws probably would be countered by pressure from VDT manufacturers for a federal law to provide national uniformity.

But a primary concern of labor safety experts is that a weak federal standard could be imposed to preempt stronger state protections. Unions encountered this predicament last year with the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's so-called hazard communication standard dealing with toxic substances.

Additional effort

On another front, unions have been pressing Congress to shape an effective federal measure on VDT safeguards.

David E. LeGrande, CWA's health and safety specialist, testified at House safety and health hearings that VDT operator complaints are centered in the areas of visual, musculoskeletal, job stress and reproductive disorder.

SEIU District 925 Director Jackie Ruff testified on the "truly frightening" increase in health problems of VDT users, especially those related to pregnancy.

House panel calls industry programs vital

The bill, whose principal sponsor is Rep. John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.), also would establish a Federal Industrial Mortgage Association to provide a secondary market for long-term industrial loans made to small-to-medium-sized businesses—comparable to the secondary loan market for home mortgages.

While the report makes clear the Banking Committee's opposition to government action "shoring up inefficient and non-competitive firms," it stressed the need for a diverse economy—with a mix of smokestack and growth industries that can provide "good jobs" for America's workers.

Toll of recessions

After each recession, the report noted, unemployment has been left at a higher plateau than in the previous cycle. The three severe recessions since 1973 have taken a special toll in manufacturing jobs.

A trend to a large number of low-paid service jobs and a smaller number of skilled jobs in high-tech enterprises could polarize the distribution of earnings and push down the nation's standard of living, the committee warned.

The committee majority scoffed at the "magic of the marketplace" justification for the Administration's do-nothing policy and pointed to the many ways in which other countries have used industrial policy to become dominant in some important area.

If once-dominant U.S. industries are picked off one by one, the report cautioned, the United States could be left "as the world's leading producers of intercontinental ballistic missiles and soybeans, while others lead in everything else."

The House Banking Committee earlier approved the industrial strategy bill by a 25-16 vote, with all committee Republicans voting against it.

The division was even closer on the provision for an industrial bank, which the AFL-CIO considers an integral part of the legislation. An attempt to delete the bank was rejected on a 22-20 vote.

Tax relief bill on legal plans backed

Union witnesses urged Congress to continue and preferably make permanent the tax-exempt status of group legal service plans that are increasingly being negotiated as a fringe benefit for workers.

The existing exclusion from taxable income expires at the end of this year. Legislation to make the provision permanent is being considered by the Senate Finance Committee. The House Ways & Means Committee has a bill that would extend the tax-exempt status another five years.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan said group legal plans—a rarity before the 1970s—have filled a need, helped to keep legal costs down and have generally functioned without abuse.

Also speaking for the legislation were Richard Scupi, director of the legal services plan negotiated by the Auto Workers, and Alan Reuther, the UAW's assistant general counsel.

The effect of forcing workers to pay taxes on the value of the benefits would discourage establishment of group plans and bring in little added tax revenue, Koplan testified.

"Although legal service plans fill a real and important need, their cost is modest," Koplan pointed out.

labor studies

The George Meany Center will offer eight labor studies institutes and workshops during May and June. The schedule:

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, May 6-11—An institute for presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. The exercises are videotaped for self-criticism.

Advanced Education Techniques, May 6-11—An institute cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education for labor educators and administrators who coordinate and direct programs.

Computers for Local Unions, May 13-17 and June 24-28—A survey course for unions thinking of buying computers or upgrading present systems.

The Moral Gap

WOMEN HAVE always worked, and they have always worked for less.

In the earliest days of the republic, women worked alongside men as spinners, weavers, shoemakers and hotel and restaurant employees. They were paid about one-third less than unskilled white males, and one-fifth less than hired-out slaves.

Women began entering government service as clerks during the War Between the States, at half the salaries of men. Nursing became a woman's profession during those same years, not really because women were held to have some divine calling or special gift for healing, but because of what businessmen call their "cost-effectiveness."

For the same reason office work became a female domain over the 30-year period from 1870, when women made up 3.3 percent of the office workforce, to 1900, when they were 75 percent.

In manufacturing, women were the workers most eagerly sought by the New England textile magnates as early as 1800. You may have heard that those employers idealized women. So they did, to the extent that the ideal worker is obedient, submissive and inexpensive.

Women did not always accept this treatment meekly. Women millhands in Lowell, Mass., organized in 1843 to protest wage cuts and speedups. It was 40 years later that the young American Federation of Labor went on record urging "all working girls and women to array themselves under the banner of organized labor" and adopted the principle that "equal amounts of work should bring the same price, whether performed by a man or a woman."

OVER THE CENTURY since then and especially in the last decade, women have grown into a mighty force within the trade union movement.

Women workers from coast to coast are asserting that a worker is a worker, a person is a person, and a 40 percent wage gap is 100 percent wrong.

That assertion must get louder and stronger between now and Election Day. The struggle for equal rights must now move with full force into the political arena. Jan. 20, 1985, must be Ronald Reagan's last day in office.

Thanks to him, women have become the fastest-growing poverty group in America.

For three years, women have been the chief victim of Mr. Reagan's deliberate reversal of the thrust toward equality in American life.

It isn't any wonder that polls indicate that growing numbers of women perceive that fact and resent it.

The so-called gender gap is not a biological phenomenon, it is a moral one.

—From an address by President Lane Kirkland to the AFL-CIO Women Working for '84, Apr. 26, 1984.

Playing Post Office

IT'S NOT UNKNOWN for an employer to start the bargaining process with an outrageous demand—a psychological ploy to make a company's bottom line proposal appear more reasonable. And it would be telling no secrets to acknowledge that sometimes even union negotiators indulge in a touch of gamesmanship.

So let's hope that the U.S. Postal Service is not serious in its insistence that postal employees are overpaid and that the purpose of this year's negotiations should be to explore how best to reduce wages scales.

This after all is the same management that bargained the wage package in the existing contract and has been bragging about the productivity increases in the post offices, where fewer workers are processing larger amounts of mail.

The quasi-government postal service is the nation's largest single employer. Fun is fun, but it's time to get down to serious bargaining. Too much is at stake.

Reagan budget worsens Pentagon's waste, abuse

By Press Associates, Inc.

Cutting the fat off federal government programs to save tax dollars has been a favorite theme in presidential and congressional campaigns for many years.

As a candidate in 1980 and as President, Ronald Reagan vowed to ferret out alleged "waste and abuse" in federal programs. But instead of using a scalpel, Reagan attacked social programs with a meat ax, causing pain and hardship for millions of Americans.

Military spending, however, has been a different story. Instead of curbing the Pentagon waste and abuse, the Reagan Administration has made the situation much worse.

Most Americans accept the need for a strong defense force in a dangerous world. But the trend under Reagan is alarming in terms of the taxpayer, the budget deficit, social programs, the arms race, genuine national defense, and what President Eisenhower called the "influence of the military-industrial complex."

Regarding abuse, the case of the 12-cent Allen wrench, which the General Dynamics Corp. sold to the Air Force for $9,600 each, received national notoriety. Unfortunately, this case of overcharge abuse is by no means unique.

Profiteering

Other cases of profiteering on military contracts, uncovered during congressional hearings, include a 2.4-cent, 3-inch steel pin sold to the government for $7,417; a 13-cent nut sold for $2,043; a 17-cent plastic stool cap sold for $1,118; a 67-cent transistor sold for $814; a $10, 12-foot tape measure sold for $434; and, a $10 pair of needle-nose pliers sold for $221.

In the waste category, expenditures include $1.7 million for five Pentagon executive dining rooms, $6 million for personal servants for the top brass, $3.2 million for veterinary care for the pets of military personnel, $80 million for new furniture (four times the amount spent for the rest of the government), and, $750 million for subsidized military welfare and recreation programs like golf courses and tennis courts.

President Reagan and his budget-cutters are strangely silent about these kinds of waste and abuse. They have ignored the many "sweetheart" deals between the "old boy" network of defense contractors and the Pentagon, and the fact that only 6 percent of Pentagon contracts are awarded through competitive bidding. They've shown scant interest in the huge cost overruns in which 75 weapons systems went over budget—some more than three times over.

Costs doubled

Since Reagan took office in 1981, he has nearly doubled the defense budget. For the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1, Reagan wants to spend $305 billion on defense, an 18 percent hike over this year and nearly one-third of the entire federal budget.

Over the next five years, Reagan proposes to lavish another $1.9 trillion on the military, at a cost to every American family of more than $30,000.

A typical family will work one whole year out of the next five to support uncontrolled military spending.

The large defense budget, compounded by the huge Reagan tax cuts favoring the wealthy, has caused record deficits which have kept interest rates high and endangered economic recovery.

Congress seems to be moving toward the realization that the nation can have a strong military posture without bankrupting the Treasury or mortgaging the future.

Money saved by curbing waste and abuse in the defense budget could be used in part to restore social programs, rebuild the nation's economic infrastructure, strengthen education and put the unemployed back to work.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Write Your Senators To Protect Your Wages, Benefits against Bankruptcy Abuse

Editorials

BUSINESSWEEK/APRIL 2, 1984

PUT SOME PAIN BACK INTO BANKRUPTCY

There was a time when bankruptcy had something to do with ability to pay one's debts. There was a stigma of failure attached to going bankrupt, together with worry about credit ratings. No more. Congress began to erode such old-fashioned standards with the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978. Rushing into bankruptcy is now often the smart thing to do, a legally sanctioned way of walking away from debts, labor contracts, and even lawsuits. What should be a reasonable balance among conflicting interests—the debtor's, his creditors, suppliers, employees—has been turned into wiping the slate clean for a lot of lucky individuals and companies.

The Senate and House are heading toward a conference committee to hammer out the final form of a new bankruptcy statute. Many complicated issues must be resolved, but the conference committee has a chance to move bankruptcy back into more reasonable balance.

The bill the House will take to the committee tackles the special status of labor agreements. The National Labor Relations Act defines the public interest in labor relations as preservation of "industrial peace" through collective bargaining. Accordingly, some courts have ruled that labor contracts were entitled to special status. To break a union pact, those decisions held, a company in reorganization had to show that unless its labor agreements were altered it was likely to fail. A Supreme Court decision in February weakened that test. Now the company has only to show that its labor contract makes successful reorganization more difficult. In addition, the Court held that companies could abrogate labor agreements unilaterally once they had filed for bankruptcy.

The House bill restores the earlier, more stringent test for altering labor contracts. It also requires a company to obtain permission from a bankruptcy court before it can cancel its labor agreement and requires the court to grant a hearing on the matter within two weeks of the bankruptcy filing. These provisions make financial solvency more important to bankruptcy, and they promote the goal of industrial peace. They should be part of the final bill.

Before the 1978 changes, the bankruptcy law included disincentives to such uses of bankruptcy. There was a close link to real insolvency, and managements ran a substantial risk of losing control to court-appointed trustees. Congress should give serious thought to reinstating such penalties. Management's temptation to seek bankruptcy for reasons only remotely connected with financial solvency should be balanced by the knowledge that it may have to pay a stiff price for the protection it wants.

Because Congress' deadline for passage of bankruptcy legislation was extended to May 25, union members still have time to write, send telegrams or phone their Senators urging support for legislation along the lines of the House bill on this issue.

The House bill would prevent companies from breaking union contracts upon filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization, and would restore a fair standard for a judge to use in deciding whether a company's financial condition is so poor that contracts must be broken.

Bankruptcy Reform Would Protect Workers --And Responsible Employers, Too

Union employees are not the only ones who would benefit by stopping misuse of corporate bankruptcy to break collective bargaining agreements. As the Business Week editorial, left, explains, responsible employers have an interest in maintaining stable labor relations. When one company breaks its labor contracts and slashes wages and benefits, it gains an unfair advantage over its competitors. Business Week, like the AFL-CIO, urges the Senate to approve the House-passed legislation on corporate bankruptcy.

Members of Congress have told the AFL-CIO that union correspondence is making a good impression, because it shows that union members are aware of and concerned about this issue.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to support legislation along the lines of the House-passed bill on corporate bankruptcy reform (mail sample message below to U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510).

Let your Senator know you want your union contract protected in bankruptcy law! Print your name, address, and union at the bottom, attach 13¢ postage, and mail

Dear Senator:

MY JOB, HEALTH CARE, PENSION AND SENIORITY ARE THREATENED.

Please put an end to the corporate abuse of bankruptcy to break labor agreements.

I urge you to support and defend collective bargaining language along the lines of legislation recently passed by the House so that no employer will be able to break a labor contract without first getting the permission of a bankruptcy court. And the court can only grant permission if all other efforts to save the company and workers' jobs have failed.

Please let me know how you feel about this vital issue.

Yours sincerely,

RIGHT TO WORK (FOR LESS) COMMITTEE WANTS FEDERAL POLICE ON PICKET LINES; AFL-CIO TO TESTIFY ON HOBBS ACT

Sen. Charles Grassley (R-IA) and the employer-front National Right to Work outfit are planning hearings on legislation to amend the Hobbs anti-extortion act in order to bring the federal government into the business of policing strikes. Under Grassley's bill, union members involved in picket-line confrontations would be subject to tough federal penalties, instead of facing state and local laws as is now provided.

It is ironic that unions have to defend themselves in Congress while violence against hotel-casino strikers in Las Vegas has been so brutal, Federal District Judge Robert Foley said in court, "I thought the Hilton Hotel security guards acted like labor goons in the 1920s; it was gruesome to see."

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose S. 462, the unfair Hobbs Act amendments.

MORE OUTRAGES AND SCANDALS FROM REAGAN OSHA

Reagan OSHA Chief Thorne Auchter dismissed $12,680 in penalties against a Kansas construction company, then resigned at OSHA to become president of that firm's parent company.

Auchter reportedly demoted Denver OSHA Chief Curtis Foster because Foster subjected the Adolph Coors Co. to health inspections. Joseph Coors is a close friend and supporter of President Reagan. Auchter angrily told Foster, "The Coors Company are influential people," according to Foster.

Steelworker Raymond Dean of Winslow, Maine was killed after falling from the frame of a boiler under construction. The Reagan OSHA cited the company for failing to provide adequate safety nets and proposed a fine--of $300. A fine that small is a cruel joke; it means nothing on a $98 million job.

And finally, the Reagan Dept. of Labor will propose new rules to expand the hours that 14- and 15-year-olds may work. The Administration tried this once before and was forced to withdraw the proposal after a storm of criticism.

SENATE PANEL TO CONSIDER DOMESTIC CONTENT BILL

Senate hearings on S. 707, the domestic content bill, will begin May 16. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and United Auto Workers President Owen Bieber will testify in strong support of this legislation. The House passed the content bill last November.

The content bill would require foreign auto and truck manufacturers with large sales volume in the United States to produce increasing portions of their vehicles in this country. For example, Toyotas sold here currently have a U.S. content of about five percent. If the content bill were law, Toyota would be required to boost that to 67 percent by 1987. Honda and VW/Audi/Porsche, with lower U.S. sales volume, would have to reach about 36 percent U.S. content.

The United States is the only nation that has allowed devastation of its basic industries; Japan and West European nations impose stiff taxes, quotas and regulatory barriers on auto imports.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to support S. 707, the domestic content bill. Particularly important are members of the Senate Commerce Committee, listed below.

Rolling steel petition

Thousands of names are signed on this 38-foot section of pipe which made a 5,500-mile, 17-state journey to petition Congress to pass the Fair Trade in Steel Act, setting import quotas on steel. The Steelworkers and the American Iron & Steel Institute sponsored this "rolling steel" petition which left Houston Mar. 8. Imports have cost more than 200,000 jobs in the steel industry and forced the closing of numerous plants.

Las Vegas strikers win breakthrough with Hilton accord

Las Vegas, Nev.—Striking hotel workers have reached agreements with Hilton hotels here, cracking a stonewall attempt by an employer association to force them to swallow stiff concessions.

The four unions that began the strike against 32 Las Vegas hotel-casinos a month ago announced tentative settlement of new four-year pacts with Hilton, the leading employer in the dispute.

Negotiators for the unions—Bartenders Local 165 and Culinary Local 226, of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Musicians Local 369 and Stage Employees Local 720—were still at the bargaining table working out specific contract language as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The hotel chain, which operates the Flamingo and Las Vegas Hilton, broke ranks with other employers in the Nevada Resort Association earlier. Hilton dropped demands for wage and benefit cuts and for damaging changes in work week guarantees and work rules and began to bargain separately with the unions.

Meanwhile, picketing continued as the locals pressed the strike against hotels employing the rest of the 17,000 strikers.

Union strategy

Separating the bargaining with Hilton and other major hotels from the resort association was a key element of the unions' strategy. The association had openly boasted that it planned to use a perceived "anti-union climate in the nation" to press its takeaway demands.

The settlement with Hilton could spur progress in talks with other major resorts, such as Caesars Palace, the unions said. Hilton is the largest employer in the dispute and its two hotels account for 10 percent of the hotel rooms in the city.

Earlier, the unions signed contracts with 24 other major hotels in the city which have remained open.

But the unions are concerned that the strike could drag on against other hotels in the resort association, led by the Summa Corp. which owns five of the struck hotels.

Striking workers continue peaceful picketing at the struck hotels, but an Apr. 28 march through downtown Las Vegas by 2,000 strikers, their families and supporters was marred when police arrested 111 demonstrators.

The number of arrests in the month-long walkout now tops 600. The unions have filed suits in federal and state courts charging that local authorities have violated strikers' civil and constitutional rights and challenging court orders that have restricted peaceful picketing.

The four unions are seeking $80 million in damages against Clark County and the hotels because of violent incidents against workers involving police and private security guards. The unions are also charging that strikers and other demonstrators were mistreated after being arrested when they were put into a roofless "bullpen." They are also questioning the conduct of a state judge who set bail as high as $20,000 for some union members arrested during a peaceful demonstration.

As the strike enters its second month, contributions to the strike assistance fund have helped the unions set up a "Victory Food Bank" that has distributed more than 100,000 pounds of supplies.

In a separate action, the Las Vegas unions set up a trust fund to aid Jim Turner,

Curbs on shoe imports pushed to save industry

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joined unions and employers in the import-battered shoe industry in seeking emergency government action to prevent further loss of jobs and stop a wave of plant closings.

Kirkland told the government's International Trade Commission that the United States can't afford to lose another manufacturing industry and the damage already done represents an "American tragedy."

He appeared with President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers in support of a joint union-industry petition for import relief.

The ITC's decision on the petition "could mean life or death to an entire industry," Kirkland stressed.

The two unions, representing about half the workers in the nation's nonrubber footwear industry, are seeking temporary import quotas "to salvage what is left" of what was once a major and stable source of employment for Americans.

As Wynn told the ITC wryly, "We used to represent a lot more workers."

Back in 1960, the industry employed 100,000 more workers than it does now. In 1968, when imports were only marginally expanding their market share, U.S. factories turned out twice as many pairs of shoes.

Reagan action

In 1977, when imports had risen to 47 percent, the government negotiated some relief through four-year marketing agreements that in effect set quotas on imports from Korea and Taiwan. But three years ago, President Reagan rejected a unanimous recommendation from the Trade Commission for a continuation of import curbs. Since then, another 20,000 jobs have been wiped out. Imports last

U.S. trade deficit widens to worst first-quarter rate

The nation's merchandise trade deficit continued to widen in March, climbing to $10.26 billion over the month and posing a serious threat to the economy.

The huge rise in the deficit was the third consecutive monthly record, and capped the worst quarterly trade performance on record. The trade gap between the United States and its trading partners in the first three months of 1984 totaled $119.3 billion at an annual rate, compared with an $89.1-billion pace in the fourth quarter of last year.

The February deficit was $10.09 billion. In March 1983, it was $3.7 billion. Imports in March surged to a record $27.99 billion, up 2.5 percent from February's level of $27.3 billion and 37 percent higher than the $20.39-billion level of March 1983.

Jobs affected

The government estimates that each $1 billion in sales lost to foreign traders deprives the United States of about 25,000 jobs that would otherwise exist.

One reason for the trade problem is the large federal budget deficit drafted by the Reagan Administration. The government's huge credit needs help keep interest rates high and this in turn attracts foreign funds to the United States, which bid up the value of the dollar, making imports cheaper and exports more expensive.

Court blocks vote on ITU merger

San Francisco—A federal district judge has ordered an indefinite delay in the membership referendum that was scheduled for May 16 by the International Typographical Union on a proposal to merge into the unaffiliated Teamsters.

In issuing the temporary injunction, U.S. District Judge Thelton E. Henderson indicated that it would remain in effect at least until resolution of challenges to the conduct of last fall's ITU officers' elections.

Robert S. McMichen was the winner of the contest for president in the ITU voting, defeating the incumbent, Joe Bingel, by nearly 5,000 votes. But the union's canvassing board set aside the election and seated Bingel pending the outcome of challenges by both sides. Bingel favors merger with the Teamsters while McMichen supports continued efforts by the ITU to reach a merger agreement with another AFL-CIO union.

Election challenges

Similar election challenges were made concerning the contests for two of the vice presidencies, yet the canvassing board in those instances seated the winners. The net effect was to leave the five-member executive council unanimously in favor of merger with the Teamsters.

For the presidential contest, a rerun election was ordered to be held "sometime after Mar. 31, 1984." However, the contested ITU executive council announced on Mar. 21 that it had approved a merger document with the Teamsters and scheduled a membership referendum on that issue for May 16.

In blocking the merger referendum, Judge Henderson said that if it were held and the merger approved, the rights of six ITU members who sued for the injunction could be irreparably damaged by changes that would occur immediately in the ITU's nature and structure.

SAG's golden anniversary

"I'm proud to be an actor. Here's my union card," some 250 members of the Screen Actors Guild sing out in the finale to SAG's "50th Anniversary Special" scheduled for broadcast on CBS television May 28, beginning at 9 p.m. EDT. The two-hour variety show features original songs, skits, dances and production numbers that celebrate the life of an actor and trace the history of the union. Among the performers are hosts Ed Asner, who is SAG president, and Elliott Gould, Richard Dreyfuss, Martin Sheen, Cicely Tyson, Chevy Chase and Henry Winkler. The show, taped before an audience of more than 2,500 other performers and their guests, was produced as part of the union's golden anniversary observance. SAG was founded on June 30, 1933, in Hollywood, Calif. SAG's 50-year Life Members were special guests at the performance.

Kirkland cites votes of unionists as significant factor in campaign

Houston — Heavy turnouts by union members in primaries and caucuses—and their backing of Walter Mondale—are making a significant difference in his campaign to win the Democratic presidential nomination, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared at a rally wrapping up the federation's 1984 regional conferences.

In a speech to more than 1,000 unionists at the rally here, Kirkland stressed that when the AFL-CIO endorsed Mondale at its 1983 convention "we never said or pretended that we could 'deliver' our membership to any political candidate."

Diverse membership

Union members, Kirkland asserted, "are not cattle to be herded from one political corral to another. They are thinking, feeling and complex individuals—free men and women—who are as diverse as the vast population of Americans who work for a living."

The AFL-CIO did say that it would inform union members of the issues, their stake in them and where the candidates stand on them, and that it would urge members "to participate fully in the political process at every level," Kirkland noted.

He said the record clearly shows that "where our members were fully informed and turned out in substantial numbers, they chose Walter Mondale, and they made a difference."

The rally on behalf of Mondale's candidacy topped-off the two-day conference that drew union leaders from Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah, and Texas. It was the last of a series held country-wide this spring with local union members and officers, including state and local central labor body officials.

The first day of the meeting consisted of workshops focusing on legislative and political action skills, COPE programs, and AFL-CIO headquarters activities.

While attendance at the workshops was by invitation to local leaders, the rally for Mondale was open to union members and their families throughout the area.

In his speech at the rally, Kirkland took aim at Sen. Gary Hart's campaign rhetoric that has painted Mondale as being "in debt" to organized labor.

Kirkland was sharply critical of the Colorado senator's characterization of labor as a "special interest group," and he called Hart's remarks "the very same knee-jerk buzzwords . . . heard so often from Republican, right-wing candidates."

What is needed, Kirkland said, is a candidate like Mondale who understands the plight of workers and their families, and "not one who sneers at them as a 'special interest.' "

All that labor has asked of a Mondale Administration, Kirkland stressed, is that he uphold and defend the Constitution and the nation and "faithfully discharge the duties of the office of President of the United States—with particular reference to that section of the Constitution that requires our government to provide for the common defense and for the general welfare, including that of working people."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue called the enthusiastic turnout at the rally "a testimony" to the determination of union members "to do everything that is necessary to insure that workers' voices are heard—once and for all—in this election year, and to insure that our members and all Americans focus on the real issues in this campaign—including the principal issue of who can run this country best."

Endorsements

Participants also heard strong endorsements of Mondale's candidacy from Rep. Mickey Leland, a Democrat whose district includes Houston, and from New Mexico Gov. Toney Anaya and Texas State Sen. Lloyd Doggett. Doggett has been endorsed by the State AFL-CIO for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Republican John Tower.

AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson urged union members to back Mondale's candidacy and stressed the importance of support from minority union members. Hutchinson, director of women's activities for the Government Employees, is co-chair of AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84 and vice chair of AFL-CIO Women Working for '84.

Prior to the rally, black and Hispanic union leaders held a news conference to outline registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns aimed at minority union members. Taking part were State, County & Municipal Employees Sec.-Treas. William Lucy, a co-chair of AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84; Railway & Airline Clerks Vice President Jack F. Otero, executive vice president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement; and Joan Suarez, president of the San Antonio AFL-CIO Council, who is also a member of the AFL-CIO Women Working for '84 committee.

Song swap slated

The 1984 "Great Labor Song Exchange" is slated for June 3-5 at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md.

The workshop, open to all union members, is designed to teach labor history through music and as an exchange of old and new labor songs.

Participants will learn labor songs for use in organizing, picketing, at union meetings, demonstrations and rallies. The emphasis this year will be on the issues in the 1984 elections.

The song exchange program was launched in 1979 by singer Joe Glazer and folk historian Archie Green. The 1984 program is sponsored by the Labor Heritage Foundation, which is chaired by Glazer.

Registration for the program is $25, and participants may apply for room and board at the Meany Center. The rates, which include three meals daily, are $50 a day for double or $65 a day for single accommodations.

Information on the program and registration forms are available from the Labor Heritage Foundation, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Room 301, Washington, D.C. 20006, or by calling 301-652-0393.

Reagan names Labor Board acting counsel

Appointment of Wilford W. Johansen as acting general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board ended an extraordinary situation in which the agency was unable to prosecute violators of fedaral labor law for a while.

The NLRB lost that authority at midnight Apr. 23, when the four-year term of general counsel William A. Lubbers expired, and President Reagan failed to name an interim appointee. The authority was restored Apr. 27 with the White House announcement of the appointment of Johansen, director of one of the NLRB's two regional offices in Los Angeles. He will fill the post until Senate confirmation of a permanent nominee.

Reagan has nominated Rosemary Collyer, a relatively inexperienced attorney, as his choice for the $69,000-a-year job. The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee is scheduled to consider the appointment May 9, but the entire confirmation process may take much longer.

Enforcement lacking

Until Johansen's designation as acting general counsel, NLRB regional directors could receive and investigate charges of unfair labor practices brought by unions or employers. But the enforcement power was lacking.

Only the general counsel can issue a complaint that leads to hearings before an administrative law judge or dismiss a charge as unwarranted.

Johansen, 56, joined the NLRB in 1958, and was named director of NLRB's Region 21 in Los Angeles in 1971. Before that, he had served as deputy assistant general counsel in Washington. A native of Salt Lake City, he is a graduate of Idaho State College in Pocatello. He received a law degree from George Washington University Law School in 1957.

By law, an acting general counsel must be appointed by the President and be an NLRB employee.

Collyer's appointment is as controversial as others the Reagan Administration has made in what the AFL-CIO charges is an effort to transform the NLRB into a pro-management tool. She is inexperienced in labor law except for her affiliation with a law firm representing management.

By contrast, Lubbers was a career attorney with the agency when he was named to the independent post of general counsel in the Carter Administration.

Hilton reaches Las Vegas pacts with four unions

a 23-year-old waiter who was struck and severely injured when a security guard's car crashed through the picket line at Caesars Palace on Apr. 4.

Although Turner was hospitalized with internal injuries, a broken collar bone and broken pelvis, the driver of th car was not cited.

The AFL-CIO assistance fund was launched soon after the strike began to channel contributions from other affiliates to the Las Vegas unions. The struck hotels remain on the federation's unfair list.

The striking unions cited demonstrations in several major cities outside banks and other firms connected financially with Hilton as helping to pressure the chain to negotiate. The demonstrations were coordinated by the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

Similar efforts against other owners were stepped up, including a demonstration by 200 strikers who traveled from Las Vegas to Phoenix to march outside the offices of Del Webb, Inc., and Ramada Inns, operators of other major hotels involved in the dispute.

At Tokyo meetings

UAW presses case for import restraint

Tokyo—Continued voluntary restraints on Japanese automobile exports to the United States are "absolutely necessary" to prevent further erosion of U.S. auto employment and to reverse the growing trade imbalance between the two countries, Auto Workers President Owen Bieber told the International Metalworkers' Federation (IMF).

Speaking to the 180 union leaders attending the IMF World Auto Councils meeting, Bieber said the trade friction between the two countries over the $22 billion trade imbalance "cannot be resolved unless the auto problem is resolved." He noted that $15 billion of that deficit relates directly to Japan's export of automotive products to the U.S.

The auto councils' delegates to the Tokyo meeting represent workers employed worldwide by Nissan, Toyota, Honda, Mazda and Mitsubishi.

Bieber also addressed the Foreign Correspondents' Club and met with Japanese Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone to express the concern of U.S. workers over the trade deficit.

In the session with the foreign correspondents, Bieber countered the impression that the U.S. auto industry "is back on its feet and ambling merrily along toward ever greater heights of employment and production." He stressed that employment by the major U.S. auto firms is still 200,000 jobs less than in 1979, and he termed the recent huge bonuses and salaries being paid to U.S. auto executives as "indicative of nothing more than greed and short-sightedness" because it conveys a false notion of the industry's condition.

Bieber said the big profits of the U.S. firms "are largely a result of a model mix heavy on big cars," a sales boom that "cannot be sustained indefinitely."

He accused the U.S. firms of not preparing to supply the small car market with domestically produced vehicles and called the growing reliance on foreign parts and finished vehicles by the American firms "nothing short of disastrous for the U.S. economy and U.S. workers."

Content legislation

Pointing to the plan of General Motors to import a half-million small cars from abroad—more than it currently sells—Bieber stressed the critical need for passage of domestic auto content legislation which is now pending in the Senate.

He told both the auto councils and the foreign correspondents that the UAW is willing to work out constructive arrangements with Japanese auto manufacturers that invest in U.S. production plants. However, he scored Nissan and Honda for attempting to bypass the UAW in its U.S. operations.

He said these two firms "would never dream of trying to operate" non-union plants in Japan, yet by refusing to cooperate with the UAW in America, they are "sowing the seeds of a long-term adversarial relationship. . . ."

Bieber described his meeting with the Japanese prime minister as "cordial, constructive and direct." He explained the urgency of expanding Japanese auto investment in the U.S. and told the prime minister that despite some movement toward increased American production, more than 90 percent of the value of Japanese cars sold in the United States continues to be produced in Japan—a situation Bieber termed "unacceptable" in regard to the trade deficit and U.S. joblessness.

International solution

Bieber, who is president of the IMF World Auto Council, told delegates to the Tokyo meeting that the growing "internationalization and intensification of global competition" promotes tension among workers and unions. "There is only one answer to the international power of corporations, and that is the international power of trade unions," he declared.

He stressed the need to reduce the work week as a pre-eminent goal of bargaining for autoworkers worldwide. The introduction of new technology and the "realities of the international economic crisis will mean massive economic dislocation, unless working time is reduced," Bieber warned.

A trade lemon

President Reagan's trade negotiator is sacrificing the jobs of American auto workers by announcing that the United States won't seek renewal of Japan's "voluntary restraint" on auto exports, UAW President Owen Bieber said.

Trade Rep. William E. Brock used big bonuses of auto executives to justify the action, but Bieber said the effect would be to "punish workers for the sins of their bosses." And for General Motors, which was the biggest offender, lifting of restraints will pave the way for its plans to import small cars from Japan, he noted.

More than two-thirds of the nation's trade deficit with Japan stems from auto sales. The Administration should be pressing Japan to build more cars in this country instead of opening the door to unrestricted imports, Bieber said.

For outstanding service

The 1984 United Way Joseph A. Beirne Award for outstanding service is presented to Philadelphia AFL-CIO Council President Edward F. Toohey by AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter Davis. The honor, named for the late president of the Communications Workers, is presented annually by the agency to a union officer or member who has exhibited outstanding and dedicated service to the community and United Way. The presentation was made during the agency's Volunteer Leaders Conference in New York.

Hobbs Act changes fought as bid to undermine unions

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate Judiciary Committee to reject a new attempt to amend the Hobbs Act so that a federal anti-racketeering law could be turned into a weapon against unions and union members.

With support from the anti-union National Right to Work Committee, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Ia.) has introduced legislation to nullify a 1973 Supreme Court decision that the Hobbs Act wasn't intended to apply to misconduct incidental to a legal strike.

The Supreme Court was right, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold told the Judiciary Committee. The Hobbs Act was passed to deal with the use of force or threats for criminal extortion. As the court noted in its decision, applying its heavy penalties to a strike for better wages and working conditions could mean 20 years imprisonment for "the worker who threw a punch on the picket line, or the striker who deflated the tires on his employer's truck."

Gold told the Judiciary Committee, at a hearing at which Grassley presided, "that neither the AFL-CIO nor any of its affiliates condones picket line misconduct." Any assault or willful destruction of property should be punished if proven, "during a labor dispute or at any other time," Gold said.

But such wrongdoing, where it occurs, is "almost without exception effectively dealt with by the state and local authorities," he stressed.

He termed the Grassley bill's extension of the Hobbs Act to legal labor disputes "unnecessary and unwise." Further, Gold contended, arming the federal government to intervene in a dispute "on the employer's side alone" is unfair to workers.

Proposals to amend the Hobbs Act have been a perennial issue in Congress, and Gold took note of the manner in which the anti-union groups have pushed for legislation through "a public relations campaign to malign the millions of American workers who are union members and the labor movement."

Clear objective

Their clear objective, he said, is "to undermine unions and collective bargaining and to raise money for their union-busting efforts."

Gold told the panel that the advocates of the Hobbs Act amendment bear the burden of demonstrating that the legislation addresses "a serious national problem" that states and localities haven't been able to handle.

But the fact is, he stressed, that the states and localities are meeting their law-enforcement responsibilities. And despite an attempt in the language of the Grassley bill to appear even-handed, there is no practical way in which the proposed expansion of the law could be used against employers who engage in violence against strikers or pickets.

Gold reminded the committee also that such serious crimes as arson and bombing are already under federal jurisdiction and can be prosecuted under federal law whether committed by union members, employers or third parties.

First-quarter wage pacts average 3%

Major collective bargaining agreements negotiated during the first quarter of 1984 will yield average wage increases of 3 percent in their first year and 3.4 percent annually over the life of the settlements, the government reported.

The 3-percent average first-year increase compares with a 4-percent rise negotiated in the final quarter of last year and a 2.8-percent increase for all 1983 settlements. Cost-of-living adjustments are not included in the figures.

Concessions cited

In reporting on the first-quarter wage settlements, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted that about 20 percent of the workers involved were subject to concession agreements for the first year. Wages were unchanged for half this number and cut for the other half.

The remaining 80 percent of workers in this group had wage increases averaging 5.1 percent in the first contract year.

The first-quarter bargaining covered 322,000 unionized workers in units of 1,000 or more. The three-month period, Jan. 1 to Mar. 31, is typically a period of relatively light bargaining.

Workers subject to pay decreases were equally divided among three industries—construction, food stores, and airlines. Increases in later years will more than fully restore the cuts for airline employees and three-fifths of the food store workers, BLS observed.

In all of last year's contract settlements, wage concessions affected 37 percent of the workers covered—22 percent continuing at their old rates and 15 percent receiving wage cuts. Most of the 1983 concessions came during the early part of the year.

The results of the first-quarter 1984 negotiations reflect the severe impact of the long Reagan Recession. The last time the same parties bargained—two or three years ago in most cases—wages were increased an average 9 percent in the first year of the pacts and 8.1 percent yearly over the contract term.

The BLS report also covers total employer compensation—wages and fringe benefits—to be paid under contracts covering 5,000 or more workers. During the first three months of this year, workers under these key pacts negotiated average wage-benefit increases of 5.3 percent for the first year and 5 percent annually when measured over the life of the contracts. This compares with average boosts of 5.6 and 3.9 percent, respectively, for all of last year.

Effective wage adjustments put into effect during the first quarter of 1984 averaged a 2.4-percent increase for some 2.9-million workers, BLS said.

COL adjustments

About 1.9-million workers received cost-of-living adjustments during the period. Of this number, 1.6 million received increases, but the 1.7-percent average adjustment reflected only about 70 percent of the rise in consumer prices over the COL review period.

Contract negotiations will move to a faster track in the second and third quarters of 1984, traditionally periods of heavy bargaining. The BLS said 333 major agreements covering a total of 1.3-million workers are due to expire or may be reopened for wage negotiations during the current quarter. Also in the second quarter about 1,240,000 workers are slated to receive deferred wage increases averaging 4.4 percent.

Black labor leaders map fall campaign course

Black trade union leaders, who played an important part in helping to get Walter Mondale's presidential campaign back on a winning track, see their special role continued beyond the remaining primaries and caucuses.

Both the Democratic convention in July and the presidential and congressional elections in November were high on the agenda at a meeting of the leaders of the AFL-CIO United Black Labor for '84 at federation headquarters.

A key goal is the reunification of all segments of the civil rights coalition for an election that will shape the course of government after four years of the Reagan presidency and a divided Congress.

The agenda included also an appraisal of the group's effectiveness since its formation three months ago by nearly 200 participants from 35 AFL-CIO affiliates.

A progress report by Velma Hill, coordinator for the program and a staff official of the Service Employees, cited the trade union role in the "super-Tuesday" elections in March. The primaries that day broke a string of victories for Sen. Gary Hart that at the time threatened to knock Mondale out of contention.

Especially in Alabama and Georgia, where black union leaders and a significant portion of black public officials actively worked to get out the vote for Mondale, the labor effort was seen as turning the tide.

Union effort

The union effort was reflected, too, in the ability of Mondale to run a respectable second to Jesse Jackson in localities where Jackson's support was greatest.

AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, one of five co-chairs of United Black Labor for '84, presided at the session. Both AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and COPE Director John Perkins took part in the meeting.

Kirkland stressed the AFL-CIO's desire to keep labor's traditionally strong bridge to the black community intact despite the temporary political divisions in the Democratic primary. And he foresaw a "very positive role" for black union members who will be delegates to the Democratic national convention.

After the meeting, some of the participants went on to Texas, where black and Hispanic labor leaders have been working to get a maximum turnout of union voters for the May 5 Texas caucus.

During the AFL-CIO regional conference in Houston, William Lucy, a co-chair of the United Black Labor group and secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees, held a joint news conference with Jack Otero, executive vice president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement and a vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks. Their message: increased political participation by black and Hispanic Texans can tilt the state against Reagan in November.

The communality of interests was stressed also in meetings Kirkland had with a delegation from the Congressional Black Caucus and with presidential candidate Jackson.

Rep. Julian Dixon (D-Calif.), who is chairman of the caucus and will chair the Rules Committee at the Democratic convention, headed the delegation. It included Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich.) and Rep. Charles A. Hayes (D-Ill.), a former vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers. The agenda included get-out-the-vote efforts in the congressional campaigns of caucus members.

Meeting with Jackson

Jackson had proposed the meeting with Kirkland, and at his request the participants included District of Columbia Mayor Marion Barry, D.C. Delegate Walter E. Fauntroy, former Assistant Sec. of Labor Ernest G. Green and Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Foundation.

Kirkland termed the session "good and useful." Topics covered included implementation and enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, organizing in the South, foreign trade and jobs programs, especially for youth. Plans were made for future meetings.

Curbs on imports pressed to save U.S. shoe jobs year rose to nearly two-thirds of all shoe sales.

Sheinkman suggested that Reagan "decided to throw the shoe industry to the wolves" because he didn't want to appear "protectionist." But "it is the workers who bear the brunt and full sacrifice of our unilateral disarmament in trade policy," he stressed.

As of February, Sheinkman said, the industry was down to 131,000 workers with another 37,000 unemployed.

The jobless include workers with 25 years of service, Wynn testified.

"When I visit UFCW members in this industry, I'm often asked what their government is doing about the flood of imports that has washed away their jobs," Wynn told the ITC.

The only possible explanation, Wynn said, is that "this Administration has written the shoe industry off," along with those who work in it.

"It's not a high-wage industry," he noted. "But even at its current wage scales, it cannot compete with imports from countries that both subsidize exports and depress the wages their workers earn."

'Ghost towns'

The shoe industry is the largest manufacturing employer in many of the communities where its plants are located, and Kirkland reminded the Trade Commission of the "ghost towns" that are left when a plant shuts down because of foreign competition.

"This American tragedy has been repeated too often in cities that depend on America's shoe industry," Kirkland said.

He challenged the contention that consumers are hurt by limits on imports, and asked:

"What is the consumer interest in adding thousands more workers to the unemployment rolls?" or "adding to the burden of unemployment insurance, food stamps and government relief for the victims."

Nor is there any benefit to the consumer "when small cities are devastated by shutdowns" or "in higher school taxes to replace the lost taxes of plants or workers," Kirkland observed.

The products of the workplace "add value" to the nation, he stressed. "The United States must maintain a diversified industrial base—in shoes, steel, electronics, textiles, autos and a host of others—if it is to be strong and continue on the path of economic growth and social justice."

Sheinkman noted that in contrast to this country's open door to shoe imports, "Canada and Australia have global quotas on shoe imports . . . Japan restricts imports of leather shoes . . . Brazil has a 170 percent tariff . . . the United Kingdom and France have arrangements with Taiwan and Korea to limit exports."

At trade hearings, Lane Kirkland speaks for shoe workers; UFCW's William H. Wynn and ACTWU's Jacob Sheinkman await their turn.

May Day message reaffirms support for Polish unionists

American labor's support of Poland's banned free trade union movement remains "unflagging and uncompromising," the AFL-CIO declared as riot police cracked down on Solidarnosc supporters in six Polish cities.

"We know that Poland is not the only country under communist rule where workers aspire to free trade unions," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in his annual May Day message.

"On this historic workers' day, we pause to remember their sacrifice and struggle in our common cause. We look forward to the day when all workers will be free to determine their own destinies and to extend their hands across the boundaries of nations."

Rulers defied

The clash between police and Solidarnosc supporters occurred as antigovernment protesters demonstrated in behalf of several hundred Poles imprisoned for their involvement in the independent labor movement. The protests were counteractions to official May Day celebrations sponsored by the Jaruzelski regime.

In Gdansk, where Solidarnosc was born nearly four years ago, Lech Walesa — chairman of the outlawed union organization — slipped past police and into an official march long enough to flash a V-for-victory sign, stunning the communist authorities on the reviewing stand.

Other demonstrations took place in Warsaw, Czestochowa, Sczecin, Wroclaw, and Nowa Huta. In some instances, police and security forces wielded truncheons and used water cannon and tear gas to disperse protesters.

In another development relating to Polish workers, Solidarnosc's office in Brussels appealed to free trade unions and western governments to use "all possible means" to stop the torture of imprisoned trade unionists in Poland.

In an Apr. 26 cable to Kirkland, Solidarnosc's Coordinating Office Abroad included a letter from an imprisoned trade unionist that was smuggled out of Barczewo prison. The letter accused communist jailers of inhuman treatment of political prisoners and described the methods of torture in detail.

"Try to spread this news as far and as wide as you can," the letter concluded.

"Wherever workers seek to exercise their rights—in Chile, El Salvador, South Africa, or Poland — American workers stand with them, even as we struggle against those in our own country who are hostile to free trade unionism," Kirkland said.

"We hold that all workers everywhere, under any and all social systems, have the inalienable right to organize and control their own unions, free of government interference. We accept no rationale for the infringement of that right—not from capitalists, not from communists. Whoever owns the means of production, the workers must own themselves and their unions."

Mondale captures Tennessee race, shoots for Texas

Walter F. Mondale moved closer to the Democratic Party's presidential nomination with a decisive victory in the Tennessee primary, stretching his already big delegate lead over Sen. Gary Hart.

Coming up are a series of primaries and caucuses that Hart would have to come close to sweeping to keep his candidacy alive until the final round of primaries in June.

The first big test is the May 5 round of caucuses in Texas, where 169 delegates will be cosen. A Louisiana primary the same day will pick 57 pledged delegates.

Hart's home state of Colorado will begin its delegate-selection caucuses May 7, and it would be a stunning upset if he were to lose there.

The week's biggest test will be the May 8 primary in Ohio to pick 154 delegates. On that same day, 77 delegates will be chosen in an Indiana primary, 75 in North Carolina and 62 in Maryland.

That will be the biggest single day of delegate selection until the primary season ends on June 5, with voting in California, New Jersey, New Mexico, South Dakota and West Virginia.

Tennessee was a state that the Hart campaign had targeted for a political comeback, but it didn't work that way.

Vote tally

On nearly complete returns, Mondale scored 130,000 votes and won a projected 30 delegates against 92,000 votes and 21 delegates for Hart. Jesse Jackson was third with 73,000 votes and 14 delegates.

In the District of Columbia, where the city's elected leaders were strongly in his column, Jackson won his first primary and picked up eight delegates. The other three went to Mondale while Hart was frozen out.

In primaries to date, Mondale has more than half of all of the delegates chosen—either by the "hard count" of pledged delegates selected in primaries and caucuses or the larger count, which includes the indicated preferences of party officials and office-holders who also will be voting delegates at the convention.

Hoehler to retire from Meany Center

Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director of the AFL-CIO's George Meany Center for Labor Studies, has informed the Center's trustees that he intends to retire early in 1985.

Hoehler has been director of the federation's leadership development center since its inception in 1969. He has seen it grow from a downtown basement headquarters to a 47-acre residential campus on the outskirts of Washington, D.C. The center now has more than 36,000 alumni throughout the world.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has appointed a search committee to find a successor for Hoehler. The committee includes John Sweeney, president of the Service Employees; Joyce Miller, vice president of the Clothing Workers; Prof. John Dunlop of Harvard University Graduate School; Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, and Hoehler.

When selected, the new executive director will be expected to spend several months working with Hoehler before he retires.

Frontier Air offer rejected by Attendants

Denver — Flight Attendants' members employed by Frontier Airlines soundly rejected a company contract offer that would have cut their wages 11 percent and sharply restricted pay for newly hired attendants.

The AFA members voted 415 to 182 to turn down the company's demand, which had been submitted to the membership with no recommendation by union negotiators. Its provisions would have made Frontier attendants the lowest-paid on any major air carrier except Continental.

The proposed agreement would have run from Apr. 27, the date of the vote, to January 1986, and the 11 percent pay slash would have taken effect immediately.

The pay proposal for new hires, which the AFA said was a key factor in the rejection, would have given new employees the same pay as more senior attendants for their first three years. But after that, the attendants would have been forced to choose between a permanent pay freeze, or wages permanently set at 65 percent lower than pay for more senior employees.

Company ploy

The union, which represents about 850 Frontier employees, charged that Frontier sought the regressive pay scale as a ploy to force a high turnover rate among flight attendants. The company had also offered an early retirement incentive for attendants with 13 or more years of service.

Another provision that prompted AFA members to reject the offer was a company demand for more use of part-time employees.

Frontier turned down a proposal by a federal mediator to submit the dispute to arbitration. Under federal law governing labor relations in the transportation industry, the refusal kicks in an automatic 30-day "cooling off" period during which neither side can take unilateral action.

The AFA is mailing Frontier attendants strike ballots to be counted by May 25. They would be free to strike June 3.

Labor hits OSHA for distorting its inspection activity

The AFL-CIO charged the Occupational Safety & Health Administration is misrepresenting its enforcement activity by lumping reviews of employer records with regular inspections of workplaces.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said the inclusion of "paper" inspections is contrary to the agency's policy of reporting these inspections as a separate item. In the past, inspection figures were based on only actual workplace inspections.

In a letter to Patrick Tyson, deputy assistant secretary for OSHA, Seminario said there is "no basis for treating these 'non-inspections' the same as actual workplace inspections in computing inspection activity." She said the comparison of inspection reports that include employer record reviews and those that don't "is like comparing apples and oranges and is invalid."

Seminario called on Tyson to "immediately suspend the practice of computing overall inspection activity based on record review inspections and return to the practice of utilizing only establishment inspections in the computation of official enforcement reports."

The letter noted that in 1982, the federation "experienced serious problems with OSHA's inspection reporting and in gaining access to inspection data."

Following months of meetings, OSHA agreed to release data to the public three months after collection. The agency then agreed these reports would be OSHA's official releases. These reports did not include the "paper" inspections as part of the data computations, Seminario noted.

Dominican labor protest backed, dialogue urged

The AFL-CIO called on President Jorge Blanco of the Dominican Republic to enter into a dialogue with the country's free trade unions to seek a peaceful and equitable solution to its current crisis.

Sixty-five people have been killed, more than 600 wounded and 4,000 detained in riots over government-ordered price increases on all imported goods and many basic foodstuffs. The increases were part of an agreement with the International Monetary Fund for a $599-million loan to the Dominican government.

Unfair standards

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in a message to Blanco, joined the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD) in protesting the rigid standards applied by the IMF for the loan. The standards require "unfair and unjust financial burdens on an already impoverished working population," Kirkland said.

"We firmly believe that the free world's credit institutions and the United States' government should provide increased assistance to the fragile democracy in your country," he observed.

Gen.-Sec. Luis Anderson of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) has protested the Dominican government's role in the riots to the International Labor Organization in Geneva, asking for a full investigation.

The AFL-CIO and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels have regularly criticized the IMF for its imposition of unjust and unfair economic sacrifices on working people to meet foreign loan obligations.

Coalition sees interest rates threatening new recession

A coalition of organizations seeking to bring down interest rates—and members of Congress sharing their concern—sounded a warning of a new recession in the making.

"High interest rates are robbing American workers of job opportunities and weakening the buying power of their paychecks," Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner warned.

Turner is chairman of the National Council for Low Interest Rates, a broad-based alliance. Its steering committee includes leaders of farm, consumer, housing, civil rights and local government groups in addition to unions.

The council's legislative conference opened with a Capitol Hill news conference whose participants included Representatives John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.), author of the industrial strategy bill awaiting House action, and Geraldine A. Ferraro (D-N.Y.), who heads the Platform Committee for the Democratic national convention in addition to serving on the House Budget Committee. Also taking part were Henry Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, and Stephen Brobeck of the Consumer Federation of America.

The two industries that have led economic recovery—housing and automobile manufacturing—"are now threatened with yet another precipitous fall as interest rates resume their upward path," Turner warned.

By keeping the value of the dollar artificially high, interest rates have encouraged imports and worked against U.S. exports, Turner noted—"at the cost of jobs" for American workers.

High interest rates have curtailed public investment in rebuilding the nation's rapidly decaying infrastructure, Turner said. They have led to forced sales of farms and near-record business bankruptcies, he added.

Turner and Schechter both strongly urged the value of selective credit controls, with standby authority for the President and the Federal Reserve Board to control interest rates to steer available resources to economic recovery.

Downturn seen

LaFalce and Ferraro warned of the strong likelihood of a downturn in the entire economy if the economic policies the Reagan Administration put into effect are allowed to continue.

Recent homebuyers, increasingly with risky variable mortgage rates, are already periled by the renewed rise in interest rates, Schechter noted.

At the council's legislative conference later in the day, Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell stressed the ripple effect of high mortgage rates on a broad area of the economy.

When people can afford to buy homes, he said, "new housing starts spur demand for a whole range of basic building materials including lumber, brick, cement, electrical wiring and equipment." It also stimulates durable production such as refrigerators, ranges, carpeting and furniture.

But when people can't afford housing because interest rates are too high, the recession quickly strikes the auxiliary industries as well, Campbell noted.

Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) were other speakeres at the legislative conference. Cranston addressed the concluding luncheon.

Slowing of economy sends danger signal

A slowing of the nation's economy, reflected in several government reports, left open the threat of higher unemployment in the months just ahead.

The Commerce Dept.'s index of leading indicators, a barometer of future economic activity, fell 1.1 percent in March, the first reverse in 19 months. The decline followed a revised 1.3-percent rise in February and an increase of seventh-tenths of 1 percent in January.

In a separate report, the department said sales of new houses dropped 4.9 percent in March. Sales of new single-family homes fell to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 666,000 units from February's revised 700,000-unit pace. Analysts attributed the March decline to a combination of poor weather, which slowed construction, and to recent rises in interest rates on home loans.

Meanwhile, it was learned that the Federal Reserve Board had tightened credit in late March, a move that could drive interest rates higher and cut into jobs. President Frank Morris of the Fed's Boston bank said the decision came at a meeting of the board's Federal Open Market Committee. Most private forecasts are that interest rates will continue to rise in coming weeks.

In its report on the leading indicators, the Commerce Dept. said six of the indicators worsened. They were building permits, the length of the average workweek, new orders for consumer goods, net new business formation, sensitive-materials prices, and claims for unemployment insurance benefits.

4 indicators up

Four indicators showed some improvement. Stock prices, the money supply, and contracts and orders for plant and equipment rose slightly, while the number of companies reporting slower deliveries from vendors increased.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige linked the drop in building permits, which made a large contribution to the decline of the overall index, to unseasonably harsh weather in March.

The last time the leading indicators' index suffered a drop was in August 1982, when it declined one-tenth of 1 percent.

While new home sales in March were down from February, they were still 9 percent above March 1983 levels. The March decline was led by a 21-percent drop in the South and a 13-percent decline in the north-central states. In contrast, sales rose a brisk 61 percent in the Northeast and a more modest 7.3 percent in the West.

The most worrisome aspect of the latest report on home sales was the rise in the backlog of unsold houses on the market. During March, the number of unsold units climbed to 321,000, up 5.2 percent from the previous month and representing a 5.9-month supply of homes.

The rising backlog of unsold homes, together with higher mortgage interest rates, could set the stage for a building slump which in turn would affect the entire economy.

In other economic news, new factory orders rose 2.2 percent in March, the Commerce Dept. reported, but the rise was entirely attributable to a surge in defense goods orders.

Contract still grounded

Flight Attendants employed by Piedmont Airlines walk an informational picket line at National Airport in Washington to protest management's foot-dragging in talks for a new contract to replace the old agreement that was up last Sept. 30. Other pickets walked lines at Piedmont terminals in seven cities.

Louisiana-Pacific strikers carry case to stockholders

Members of the Carpenters and Woodworkers on strike against the Louisiana-Pacific Corp. will carry their battle to the firm's annual meeting on May 14, in Rocky Mount, N.C.

The Louisiana-Pacific Workers for Justice Committee mailed a proxy solicitation to holders of the company's 25 million shares of stock in preparation for a fight with L-P officials on several resolutions.

Some 1,500 workers have been on strike at 17 L-P mills since June 24, 1983, when the contract expired. The company withdrew from the "Big 7" industry bargaining association which included Georgia-Pacific, Boise-Cascade, Weyerhaeuser, International Paper, Crown Zellerbach and Willamette, and refused to accept the industry-wide package which included a one-year wage freeze.

The proxy statement noted that the industry agreement was achieved without a strike and took into account the economic difficulties faced by many employers.

Pay slash

L-P insisted on a substantial cut in the wage rate for new hires and later added demands for mandatory overtime and changes in holidays and union security provisions.

Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell called the company's action "the corporate blunder of the year." He said L-P had "pushed the two largest wood products unions in the country—the Carpenters and the Woodworkers—into calling a nationwide boycott at a time when L-P's competitors are working at a nearly full-capacity rate."

The boycott, endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last December, is "unprecedented" in the Carpenters' history, Campbell said, and reflects the union's concern over L-P's "total disdain for their employees' economic welfare."

Accounting asked

The union committee is seeking passage at the L-P annual meeting of resolutions calling on the company to render an accounting of the financial impact of the strike, to require more independent members on the company's board of directors, and to reconstitute the firm's compensation board.

In the proxy materials, the committee said "there are serious questions concerning the independence of the board of directors as a group from L-P's management team." It noted the board now has a majority made up of past and present management officials and directors who currently have or recently had a business relationship with L-P.

The company's compensation board has a similar make-up. Its chairman, Harry Merlo, also heads the board of directors and serves as company president and chief executive officer. Thus he chairs the board which recommends the salary packages for himself and the other top company officials.

The union committee noted Merlo's total remuneration in 1983 was $2,413,572. This includes $1.7 million in stock options.

Topped list

Since 1979, Merlo's compensation has averaged more than $1 million a year and in 1978, Forbes magazine listed him as the nation's highest paid executive at $3.4 million.

Campbell said "there is absolutely no economic justification for L-P's refusal to pay decent wages to its employees." Through the use of the proxy solicitation and the participation in the annual meeting, Campbell said, "we intend to keep the affairs of this company highly visible to investors, the media and to consumers."

He charged that L-P, the nation's second largest lumber producer, scheduled its annual meeting in a high school auditorium in Rocky Mount "to get just as far away from the public, the media and the shareholders as possible."

The workers' committee is composed of striking L-P workers who also own stock in the company.

ILCA elects Cesnik Secretary-Treasurer

Onaway, Mich.—The executive council of the International Labor Communications Association at its spring meeting here elected James M. Cesnik as its secretary-treasurer to fill the unexpired term of Gregory Croy.

Cesnik is editor of the Newspaper Guild's publication, the Guild Reporter. He had served as president of the International Labor Press Association, now ILCA, from 1979 to 1981. Previously, he served three two-year terms as an ILPA vice president.

Croy, the former editor of the Food & Commercial Workers' magazine, UFCW Action, resigned from the ILCA post on April 27. He had served as secretary-treasurer since Jan. 1 following his election at the October 1983 ILPA convention. At the same convention the association changed its name to reflect the expanding use of both print and electronic media by labor groups.

ILCA's council meeting was held in conjunction with the Auto Workers' Local Union Press Conference at the UAW's Walter and May Reuther Family Education Center here.

Reagan majority acts

Shifts in NLRB policy follow employer line

The Reagan majority on the National Labor Relations Board continued to undermine the basic protections of workers under federal labor law as it reversed long-standing board policy in two more cases.

One of the rulings, involving an organizing effort of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, gives management wider latitude to question workers about organizing activities. The other thwarted an attempt by the Auto Workers to organize some 800 clerical and technical employees at Harvard University's medical area schools apart from the university's 3,000 other clerical workers.

In the HERE case, the board reversed a 1980 decision that questioning of workers about their union sympathies is inherently coercive.

In a 3-to-1 ruling with Member Don A. Zimmerman dissenting, the board's majority of three Reagan appointees held that the 1980 decision "improperly established a per se rule that completely disregarded the circumstances surrounding an alleged interrogation."

The decision, which overturned a March 1983 finding by an administrative law judge, involved a complaint by HERE against Rossmore House, a private retirement home in Los Angeles. In that case, an employee who was an active union supporter was questioned by management about a Mailgram dealing with the organizing campaign.

The manager of the retirement home, who was the recipient of the Mailgram, asked the employee questions about an organizing committee, predicted that the owner would resist unionization, and said that he also would be obligated to fight the union. The law judge ruled that this conversation and a subsequent one with the owner were unlawful.

NLRB Chairman Donald Dotson and Members Robert Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis voted to overturn the ruling and change the policy.

Zimmerman noted in his dissent that the new ruling "ignores the reality that employers sometimes use subtle coercion during an organizing campaign and fails to recognize that even open union adherents may be intimidated by such coercion."

In the UAW case, the NLRB reversed a long-standing board decision on appropriate units at Harvard's medical schools. The decision puts a new roadblock in the union's 10-year drive to represent clerical workers there.

Denying the union's petition to represent the medical school workers, the same 3-to-1 majority reversed a 1977 ruling that employees of the schools had the right to petition for an election as a separate unit from the university's other clerical workers.

The Reagan appointees agreed with Harvard's position that only a university-wide unit would be appropriate and that the employees of the medical area facilities do not have a sufficient "community of interest" to warrant a separate bargaining unit from employees on a university-wide basis.

Separate office

Many of the medical area schools are located miles from the university's main Cambridge, Mass., campus, and—until the university began to claim that the separate unit was inappropriate—the medical area had been served by a separate personnel office with its own personnel practices.

In his dissent, Zimmerman charged that the board's reversal favoring the "largest appropriate unit" has no basis in the law that governs the NLRB. Zimmerman said that under the law the board's job is not to determine whether a petitioned-for unit is the "most appropriate," but only if it is appropriate.

The case dates back to 1975 when the union petitioned for an election to represent the medical area employees. Harvard's challenges then led to the full board's 1977 ruling that the medical area unit was appropriate.

Court blocks referendum on ITU-Teamsters merger

The judge pointed to sections of the tentative merger agreement that would make each ITU local subject to the Teamsters' constitution, would transfer to the Teamsters all ITU property and funds, and would disenfranchise all ITU retirees.

In his order issued on May 1, Henderson also forbade any further steps toward the merger, including the mailing out of ballots, and he banned the expenditure of any ITU funds "to merge or affiliate the ITU with any other organization."

He dismissed arguments by ITU lawyers that any delay in the referendum could endanger the merger's conclusion.

Damages to ITU members' rights could be far more serious if the merger were prematurely approved, the judge held.

The judge also pointed to "extensive evidence" that if McMichen had been seated as ITU president pending final resolution of challenges to the conduct of the contest between him and Bingel in last November's ITU elections, McMichen "would have had the power and the inclination to prevent" the merger agreement being concluded.

Critical issues

In addition, Henderson wrote, the six ITU members who sued Apr. 11 to block the referendum "have demonstrated that McMichen's opposition to merger with the IBT, and Bingel's support for it, were critical issues in the election campaigns."

The six also showed that McMichen's margin of 4,920 votes was a strong indication that he "would have moved quickly to negotiate a posible merger agreement with an AFL-CIO union," such as the Graphic Communications Union, Henderson said.

"Taken together, the evidence indicates that the ITU presidential election and the choice of possible merger partners were closely linked," Henderson asserted.

The judge ordered the referendum stopped "pending a final decision by this court on the merits" of the suit by the six—five active members of the Bay Area Typographical Union and one retired member of San Francisco-Oakland Mailers Union 18. He gave no indication of when that might be, but did indicate that his order was drafted quickly because of impending distribution of ballots.

Defendants to the six members' suit are the ITU itself, Bingel, and all four others on the ITU Executive Council: Sec.-Treas. Thomas W. Kopeck and Vice Presidents Allan J. Heritage, Robert L. Wartinger and Ray Brown.

Support for the suit was expressed by the Merger Committee for One Big Printing Union, composed of leaders of some 22 ITU locals in the United States and Canada, including those in New York City, Washington and Toronto.

McMichen is chairman of the committee and also is serving as a temporary AFL-CIO representative to graphic communications industry unions.

The committee has mailed two additional updates on the merger issues, along with one directed at the union's retirees who had been scheduled to begin voting this week. The updates detailed the impact of merger on the retirees, ITU property, dues, mortuary fund, and organizing.

Auto Arrogance

GENERAL MOTORS executives must be crying all the way to the bank over the sharp criticism they received for pocketing $181.7 million in bonuses on top of already high salaries and generous stock options.

Just two years ago, GM and the other auto giants were demanding and receiving sacrifices from their workers, concessions from their suppliers. Now, with profits up and an opportunity to build a reservoir of good will through even a modest rollback in prices, the industry's top executives chose to line their own pockets.

This "greed," as Auto Workers President Owen Bieber properly described it, allowed the Reagan Administration to mask the implications of its open-door trade policy in an expression of indignation that most Americans can share.

U.S. Trade Rep. William E. Brock was able to point to the GM and Ford bonuses and ask why such a prosperous industry "needs protection" in the form of continued "voluntary" limits on Japanese auto exports to the United States.

"Do the American people really want to subsidize $5 million or more in bonuses for one manager?" he asked.

Therefore, Mr. Brock said, the United States will not seek to renew the auto export limitation agreement with Japan when it expires next March.

As the UAW's Bieber points out, that is punishing workers for the sins of their bosses. As for GM management, it couldn't be more pleased.

THE TONGUE-LASHING aside, lifting of Japan's export quotas will allow GM to go ahead with its plans to import and sell some 300,000 Japanese cars—instead of making them in this country.

While the auto industry may have regained its profitability, its production workforce is down by more than 25 percent from 1978, and the many supplier industries so important to the economy have been comparably affected.

Aided by an artificial imbalance between the dollar and the yen, and the tax rebates the Japanese government provides for exports, the U.S. share of its own home market for automobiles is likely to shrink further.

If this is the case, it will be the entire American economy that will be battered. General Motors executives may continue to draw million-dollar paychecks by selling vehicles made abroad. But there will be fewer paychecks in steel, glass and tire plants or on auto assembly lines.

Ironically, the greed of industry executives makes a stronger case for the domestic content legislation that the trade union movement has strongly supported.

A DOMESTIC content law would not protect inefficient or profit-greedy U.S. automakers from competition. Quite the opposite. It would assure fair competition.

Does anyone think that the Japanese auto manufacturers would give up the huge U.S. market if a domestic content law were enacted?

Nonsense. They would, of course, set up production facilities in this country and use American-made parts to the extent required by law.

Consumers, including those who choose to buy U.S. products out of awareness of the employment impact, would have a wide and unrestricted choice.

Even the modest export restraints that have been in effect have encouraged the start of Japanese auto production in this country. But lifting the restraints, without a domestic content requirement in place, sends the signal that further action isn't necessary.

It's the wrong signal.

Our trade negotiator could have used the issue of continuing the limitation on auto imports as a bargaining chip for some trade concessions on the part of Japan. But as the UAW noted, he didn't even try.

That's negotiating?

Corporations challenged to help curb health costs

By Press Associates, Inc.

When powerful corporations publicly call for labor's cooperation on major problems, unions have reason to view it as an invitation to dance with a 500-pound bear. What the executives usually want is to squeeze more concessions out of working people.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber recently used an important corporate forum—The Economic Club of Detroit—to challenge auto industry leaders. Instead of pinning the rap for health care cost inflation on workers and shifting the cost to them, why not cooperate on constructive, broader solutions? Bieber's remarks apply also to other businesses and the Reagan Administration.

Unions and workers are fast becoming the scapegoats for the rise in industry's health insurance costs. In the early 1960s, unions saw health care costs eating into their members' wages and traded off some wage increases for better health insurance plans.

But unions didn't rest with contract gains, as Bieber noted. They lobbied in legislatures and other assemblies for changes in the nation's health care system to get costs under control.

Industry inaction

What were corporations doing while unions, such as the UAW, launched health cost control initiatives? Bieber, citing examples from the auto industry, said:

"With the notable one-time exception of the Budd Company, the corporations never spoke out at Blue Cross-Blue Shield rate hearings in this state—not once. But we were there.

"The companies resisted our efforts to encourage health maintenance organizations (HMOs) for years. Now they can't get enough of HMOs.

"The fact is, the UAW had to drag the companies kicking and screaming to major actions to curb health care costs. And, now these Johnny-come-latelys want to take credit and give workers the blame."

Bieber pointed out that putting the blame for skyrocketing health care costs on workers lays the groundwork for shifting the burden of health care inflation to workers. That is apparently the strategy of the Reagan Administration and big business as they decry the surge in health care cost.

The Administration wants to tax employer-financed health insurance premiums exceeding $2,100 a year. This supposedly would lower health care costs by increasing "competition" in the health care market as consumers "shop around" for lower cost insurance.

Shifting costs

Businesses want higher co-payments and deductibles to make workers assume more of employers' current health insurance costs.

Bieber noted that health care professionals, not patients, determine hospital admission, length of stay, the number and nature of tests and other cost-determining decisions.

"That is why the whole notion of reducing consumption of health care by imposing greater costs on the consumer is so patently unfair and irresponsible," he said.

The UAW and the auto companies already have achieved cost savings and promoted quality care by working together to promote HMO participation and second opinions for elective surgery.

Bieber called on the companies to join labor in working for national cost containment legislation, such as the Kennedy-Gephardt and CHEC bills. He noted the bills have not been endorsed by any of the major auto firms.

Such joint efforts could produce major short-term savings. But for the long-term, Bieber reiterated labor's position that the only solution to health care costs is comprehensive, universal national health insurance.

MEMO FROM COPE

SHOO-IN?

No! Elements Present For Defeat of Reagan

In exactly six months, we elect a President.

Does Ronald Reagan have a lock on it, as some commentators confidently state? Is he a shoo-in?

The answer is "no."

The elements are present for a Democratic presidential victory in November. This hardly guarantees there'll be one, but it's comforting to contemplate the possibility.

What are these elements? They are blocs with strong interest in one or more issues who feel the Reagan Administration has bombed out on their concerns: workers, blacks, Hispanics, women, the elderly, environmentalists, the needy and, yes, farmers.

There is no assurance that all these will be galvanized in numbers sufficient to move Reagan out of the White House. Certainly, there are plenty of activists and leaders among them who'll be trying.

In addition, there is a large segment of voters—not affiliated with any particular political or issues movement—dissatisfied with Reagan's leadership on various grounds. There is unease about the economy, notwithstanding Reagan's constant boast that his "program" is working. There is anger among many non-poor about the vengeful actions of this Administration against the poor.

Many non-workers—untouched by the high unemployment of the first two Reagan years—correctly pin the blame for it on the Administration's deliberate recessionary policies (wring out inflation by boosting joblessness) and deplore the consequences.

Then, too, there is widespread concern about the federal deficit. It's not the sexiest of issues, and Americans are accustomed to red ink—but not in the quantities Reagan has splashed across the pages of the federal budget.

While he persists, inaccurately, in trying to pin this on Congress, more and more citizens are making the connection between his policies and the $200 billion shortfalls anticipated for years ahead—and are worrying about the inevitable upward push they'll have on interest rates.

Citizens cannot read and hear increasingly frequent predictions from economists of all stripes that the Reagan policies are heading us toward another, perhaps deeper, recession, and still feel buoyed by Reagan's own rosy forecasts and those of his cheerleader-in-chief, Treasury Secretary Donald Regan.

What most props up Reagan as a candidate is his continued personal, as distinct from programmatic, popularity. Lots of folks out there who disagree with his policies seem willing to forgive him almost anything on niceness grounds.

Few things are as common these days as nationwide polls that simultaneously show big margins against Reagan's actions and their consequences and similar margins for the presidential persona.

But inevitably—as the campaign progresses, as a nominee against Reagan is selected—the focus will sharpen on the shortcomings of his leadership and he'll be unable to slough them off with a smile, an anecdote or homely reassurances. He will have to defend and sell his policies.

And a lot of the electorate isn't buying.

Recently, a Harris Poll showed some 38 percent of all voters irrevocably anti-Reagan and about 35 percent steadfastly for him. The 13 percent additional needed by the "antis" ought to be attainable from among those groups most disenchanted with his leadership.

WORKERS

Most folks who work for a living have small reason to want to award Reagan a second term. More than 30 million individual workers went through one or more episodes of unemployment in 1981-83, many of them for lengthy periods.

Large numbers suffered mortgage foreclosure or were on the brink of it. Millions lost their health coverage. Scores of thousands know they will never return to the jobs from which they were separated.

Few workers at modest income levels see tangible gains from Reagan tax cuts, but are aware they were enormous for wealthy individuals and corporations. And most view—along with the majority of the general public, according to polls—the Reagan Administration as dedicated to the encouragement and preservation of the rich.

MINORITIES

Reagan's long-standing opposition—then, under pressure, his reluctant support of extension—of the Voting Rights Act does not sit well with minorities who see the act as one of the key steps forward in civil rights. Nor does his politicizing of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, from which he fired staunchly pro-civil rights commissioners and replaced them with more cautious, less committed successors.

To the slight degree that he has appointed blacks and Hispanics to positions within the administration, he has tapped less known, more conservative representatives who have little standing or reputation among the broad base of minorities, and will do almost nothing in the way of garnering Reagan votes.

More damaging to Reagan, though, than any other factor, is the high unemployment that persists among black and Hispanic workers. In the case of both minority groups, dramatically increased registration is not good news for Reagan.

WOMEN

The gender gap is real. Polls show more than 50 percent of voting-age women oppose the President on a wide range of concerns, from specifically women's issues to broader matters like education, health, nutrition, defense.

Reagan's rigid opposition to ERA and to equal pay for comparable work, and his oft-times patronizing attitude toward the concern women express over sex discrimination might delight right-winger Phyllis Schlafly, but it angers millions of others.

Ominous for Reagan in view of this is the steady increase in recent years in women's voting participation—not to mention the fact that women outnumber males.

If the gender gap can be translated successfully into turn-out at the polls in November, it could be immensely damaging to Reagan's chances for re-election.

THE NEEDY

No group has suffered more deeply from Reagan policies than the poor who are dependent, in part at least, on federal programs for basic needs. More than a million needy lost all food stamp aid. More than four million working poor lost some. Nearly a quarter-million children of needy families lost Medicaid coverage, and more than a million children were cut off from free or reduced-price school lunches. Overall cuts in nutrition programs for the poor are at 28 percent. Health programs, Aid to Dependent Children, job training—all have taken deep slashes.

In all, more than $110 billion has been gouged from those programs designed to help needy Americans, and Reagan seeks still more.

THE ELDERLY

Millions of elderly Americans resent Reagan's efforts to deny them cost-of-living adjustments in social security, and many know of his years-long inclination to tamper with the foundations of the old-age pension system. They know, too, of cuts in, and further ones proposed for, Medicare and Medicaid.

No group of Americans votes in higher percentages than the elderly, and they've been given ample reason to oppose Reagan's re-election.

ENVIRONMENTALISTS

Environmentalists haven't yet recovered from James Watt and aren't likely to be bought off with anything Watt's successor as Interior Secretary might come up with. Watt's giveaway of public lands, his low-yield sell-away of coal deposits, his determination to make our coastlines an uninterrupted string of oil rigs—these and earlier problems with the Environmental Protection Agency; Ann Burford and all that—leave most environmentalists shaken and disinclined to support the President under whose leadership, and presumably with whose backing, these events occurred.

FARMERS

One of the most frequently heard noises in the Farm Belt the last few years has been the auctioneer's hammer. Thousands of small farmers have been thrown off their land and from their homes. Despite the fact that the cost of federal farm programs has sky-rocketed under Reagan, the farm economy is in rotten shape.

Small farmers are hurting. Continued high interest rates make farm equipment too costly for many to buy. Many can't meet payments. Too, interest rates and the strong U.S. dollar shave farm exports.

More and more agriculture economists charge Reagan has mismanaged farm programs. While farmers need consistency in federal agriculture policy and programs, they charge, the administration has hopscotched from one notion to another, leaving farmers in confusion . . . and in debt. A recent survey in Iowa predicted one in 10 farmers could go belly-up before 1986.

Circumstances in rural America suggest it could provide far fewer votes for Reagan in 1984 than in 1980.

There is no assurance that the component parts of victory can be put together to achieve one. At the same time, there is no question that the components that can defeat Reagan are on hand. Again, it could resolve into a question of how voters will base their ballot when time comes to use it. If the widespread dissatisfaction with Reagan policy prevails, he'll head back for the ranch house. If the widespread approval of his personality dominates, he'll have a better chance of hanging in there at the White House.

Not This Year

Supreme Court defers a decision on independent expenditures campaigns until next year, clearing the way for huge spending for Reagan by non-party, non-candidate committees like National Conservative PAC. NCPAC alone plans $10 million for TV/radio plugs for Reagan re-election. Another $10-$15 million easily will be poured in by other PACs. The High Court declined early ruling on the case brought by the Democratic Party and Federal Election Commission.

Headlines tell story of just two of Reagan's potential trouble spots, women voters and farmers. He also has severe problems among large numbers of workers, needy, elderly, environmentalists, minorities—sufficient to call into question assumptions of some commentators that Reagan re-election campaign is sure-fire winner. The components of his defeat are there—if they can be connected.

DES MOINES — A new survey says 10 percent of the state's farmers could go broke within two years because of the sour economy, state officials said Wednesday.

Losing farmers at that rate would be a "staggering blow," Iowa Agriculture Secretary Robert Lounsberry said.

"The future looks very good for a majority of our farmers, but the future also looks very bad for a certain segment of our farmers," he said.

Reagan 'recovery' denounced for shifting burden to workers

Council points to lag in jobs, real earnings

By John M. Barry

Piney Point, Md.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council renewed its attack on President Reagan's economic policies with the charge that "the Reagan 'recovery' is spawning benefits for the rich, the powerful and the privileged" at the expense of workers.

Corporate profits are setting records and executive salaries and bonuses have reached "scandalous levels," the council observed. Yet more than 10 million workers remain unemployed and the real wages of those who do hold jobs are worth on the average 5 percent less than in 1979.

"America's working people want opportunities for progress for themselves and their children," the council declared in a statement. "They want jobs and a healthy economy as well as fairness in the distribution of income and social benefits.

"They want jobs that ensure decent family living standards in an expanding economy. They want to reconstruct the nation's public infrastructure to stimulate private, job-creating investment and economic activity. They want a national industrial policy aimed at modernizing and revitalizing American industry.

"To achieve these goals, America's working people are prepared to do their part and pay their fair share. However, these goals cannot be achieved until the grip of Reaganomics is broken."

Seafarers host

The statement on the national economy was one of a series adopted by the council at its spring meeting here. The sessions were held at the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship on the invitation of SIU President Frank Drozak, a member of the Executive Council. The school provides basic training, skill upgrading courses and overall educational opportunities for SIU members.

Among major council actions was the approval of a charter of affiliation for the National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, which has been part of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. (Story, Page 2.)

Also approved was the recent merger of the Boilermakers and the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, effective last Apr. 1.

The council elected Bricklayers President John T. Joyce as an AFL-CIO vice president to fill a vacancy created by the retirement of Painters President S. Frank Raftery because of health problems. (Story, Page 2.)

Much of the three-day meeting was devoted to discussion of various aspects of the federation's role in the current pre-convention campaign supporting Walter Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination.

At a news conference on the opening day of the meeting, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that the federa-

NLRB appointments hit for pro-employer bias

Piney Point, Md. — The AFL-CIO charged that President Reagan's appointees have tilted the National Labor Relations Board heavily against unions and urged the Senate to refuse to confirm "yet another employer lawyer" to a key NLRB post.

An Executive Council statement branded Rosemary Collyer unqualified to serve as NLRB general counsel, where she would direct the investigation and prosecution of unfair labor practice charges and supervise the labor board's field staff.

Lack of experience

In terms of pro-employer bias, Collyer is in the same mold as the three Reagan appointees who make up the new NLRB majority, the council said. The only distinction is that she is "far less experienced."

The council documented the transformation of the NLRB after the appointments of Chairman Donald Dotson, Robert Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis created a Reagan-selected majority.

It cited "a sharp decline" in the number of NLRB decisions finding that employers had committed unfair labor practices and a corresponding rise in decisions that have gone against the union position.

The council also spotlighted policy switches in which the labor board reversed its own precedents. The effect was to make it harder for workers to organize, but easier for employers to move work from organized plants to non-union plants with lower wages and to refuse reinstatement to strikers, among others.

At a news conference during the council meeting, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged that the Reagan Administration "has gone beyond the bounds of decency" in making appointments that pervert the concept of the NLRB as an agency set up to assure the right of work-

In high-stake primaries

Mondale stretches delegate lead

All three candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination found some good news in a week of high-stakes primaries and caucuses. But when the dust had cleared, Walter F. Mondale was a giant step closer to a delegate majority.

Mondale took the first big test, winning nearly two-thirds of the 169 delegates at stake in Texas caucuses on May 5.

He won decisively also in May 8 primaries in Maryland and North Carolina, but narrowly lost to Sen. Gary Hart in the Ohio and Indiana contests. Hart's victories there, as well as his anticipated pickup of his home state of Colorado, kept his campaign alive. But just barely.

For Jesse Jackson, the week brought a victory in the Louisiana primary which that state's governor had urged voters to ignore after a court order compelled the dropping of plans for a caucus selection of delegates. Jackson captured second place in the Maryland primary.

Network and newspaper exit polls showed that Mondale was by a big margin the first choice of voters who described themselves as stong Democrats, including union families.

Brightened hopes

Jackson continued to draw large numbers of black voters to the polls, clearly cutting into Mondale's strength among traditionally Democratic groups, but at the same time brightening Democratic hopes for the November elections.

And in Texas, a New York Times/CBS sampling of participants in the caucuses found Mondale the choice of 79 percent of Mexican-American voters.

Hart had mounted a strong organization in Indiana, a traditionally conservative state, and his victory there was not unexpected.

But the slimness of Hart's popular vote margin—42 percent to 41 percent for Mondale—was reflected in a comparably close division of delegates. The delegate tally was 38 for Hart, 36 for Mondale and 3 for Jackson.

In Ohio, Hart's margin of 42 to 40 percent gave him an edge of 79 delegates to 67 for Mondale and 8 for Jackson.

The delegate gap was more than made up in Maryland, where Mondale won 41 delegates to 17 for Jackson and only 3 for Hart. In North Carolina, the count was 44 delegates for Mondale, 18 for Hart and 13 for Jackson.

Joyce elected to council as Raftery leaves

Piney Point, Md.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has elected Bricklayers President John T. Joyce to fill a vacancy left by the retirement of S. Frank Raftery.

Raftery, who earlier had announced that he will step down as president of the Painters on June 4 for health reasons, was praised by his Executive Council colleagues as a staunch trade unionist whose "sense of solidarity" helped the entire labor movement.

The resolution cited his 14 years as an AFL-CIO vice president and extended the council's "thanks and good wishes."

Joyce, 48, has been president of his international union since 1979 and previously served as treasurer and secretary.

He is a native of Chicago and worked at his trade as a member of Bricklayers Local 21. After attending the University of Notre Dame and completing military service, Joyce joined the local's staff in 1960 and rose to become administrator of its collectively bargained trust funds and its apprenticeship and training program. He became an international union officer in 1966.

Committee work

Joyce is a vice president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and is a member of five AFL-CIO standing committees—political works, civil rights, housing, organizing and higher education.

His many roles have included serving on the U.S. worker delegation to the International Labor Organization conference and other international assignments, including membership on the auditing committee of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

He is a co-chairman of the Labor Advisory Council to the Democratic National Committee and serves on boards of a number of organizations, including the Human Resources Development Institute.

Joyce holds a number of posts involving building trades activities and is president of the Masonry Research Foundation.

Raftery, 65, came from a union family and joined Sign Painters Local 774 in his home city of St. Louis at the age of 16. He served as a chief boatswain mate in the Navy during World War II, attended St. Louis University, became business agent for Local 513 and in 1953 joined the international union staff as an organizer and later a general representative.

He was unanimously elected president at the union's 1964 convention to succeed his father, Lawrence M. Raftery, and took office in 1965. He was elected an AFL-CIO vice president in 1970.

Easing sanctions on Poland called threat to Solidarnosc

Piney Point, Md.—The Reagan Administration, by easing trade sanctions and going along with a rescheduling of repayment of the huge Polish debt, is encouraging the Jaruzelski regime and the Soviets to assume that the West will gradually lose interest in the Solidarity union movement, the AFL-CIO charged.

The communists are convinced that over time Western outrage over the crushing of Solidarnosc will subside and business as usual will resume, the council said in a statement.

"By gradually abandoning the conditions he set for the easing of sanctions, the President has encouraged this grim assessment," it said.

Default urged

The council reiterated its longstanding demand that the Polish debt be declared in default, noting that the alternative is to continue rolling over the debt and thus underwriting the brutal suppression of the first free trade union movement in the communist camp.

"That alternative, in light of the unquenchable courage of (Solidarnosc Chairman) Lech Walesa and his colleagues, would bring lasting shame to our nation," the council declared.

Protests earlier this month by Solidarnosc supporters in six Polish cities were put down by riot police using water cannons, clubs and tear gas. More than 600 people were arrested. The government's sharp response proved wrong the Administration's belief that relaxation of the sanctions would induce more humane behavior from the Jaruzelski regime, the council said.

Just the opposite has been true, it said. Following the partial lifting of sanctions earlier this year, the number of political prisoners has grown, Polish authorities have intensified their crackdown on Solidarnosc and, according to reliable reports, the government has hired thugs to intimidate, beat, and murder union activists. The sanctions were imposed in 1981 after the regime attempted to crush the independent trade union movement.

In the midst of this deteriorating situation, some 500 Western banks—including 70 in the United States—have agreed to a delay in the repayment of Poland's $1.7-billion debt, some due this year.

"This action amounts to an extension of credit to a tyrannical government that has snubbed Western demands for the release of political prisoners and the restoration of Solidarnosc," the council pointed out.

"No sooner were the debt negotiations concluded than Jaruzelski, as if to underscore his contempt, flew to Moscow, where (Soviet Premier Konstantin) Chernenko awarded him the Order of Lenin and a 15-year economic pact.

"For all its anti-communist rhetoric, the Reagan Administration continues to put the short-term needs of banking and commercial interests above the defense of human rights in American foreign policy," the council added.

"Those who are motivated mainly by corporate greed and the pursuit of profit—and they are legion in the President's party—cannot be entrusted with the defense of democracy."

Health care union voted charter

Piney Point, Md.—The National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, now a division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, will become an independent AFL-CIO affiliate on July 1.

Issuance of the charter was urged by RWDSU President Alvin E. Heaps and was unanimously approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The RWDSU division has some 140,000 members, but its largest segment will not be a part of the newly chartered union. District 1199, New York, will remain as a local of the RWDSU.

Realignment of the RWDSU's health care affiliates is in accord with an agreement that amicably resolved internal differences and led to the dropping of court suits and counter-suits.

The new AFL-CIO union will begin operations with locals or districts in 19 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, a spokesman said.

Heaps, who is an AFL-CIO vice president, predicted that issuance of the charter "would be an organizational asset to the AFL-CIO." The new union will start with some 60,000 members, he said.

A number of AFL-CIO affiliates represent large numbers of hospital and nursing home workers—among the fastest-growing segments of organized labor.

The RWDSU's expansion into this field began when its Local 1199 used its base among New York City pharmacists and drug store employees to launch an organizing campaign among low-paid workers in the city's non-profit "voluntary" hospitals.

That breakthrough came just 25 years ago, in a long and successful strike for bargaining rights and better conditions.

Heaps noted the establishment of an RWDSU Hospital Workers Organizing Committee in 1968 and the national union as an RWDSU division in 1971.

Divisive issues

The hospital division paid a reduced per capita tax to the international union, using the retained revenue for organizing and other union functions. Strains in the relationship developed over a number of issues, with the national hospital division leadership challenging RWDSU's moves to integrate the division more closely into the international union's structure and the New York local at odds with the national division on this and other issues.

The hospital division had sought an AFL-CIO charter at the February meeting of the Executive Council but its request was denied at the time under the council's established policy of non-intervention in the internal divisions of an affiliate.

In a recently concluded election, the New York membership backed the position taken by its President, Doris Turner, who was re-elected by a big margin with her entire slate. An opposing slate had sided with the national division, which is headed by Henry Nicholas.

The national union has been headquartered in New York, and its press representative told the AFL-CIO News that there are no immediate plans to shift location. An immediate task, he said, will be to work out a division of the welfare and pension fund assets between the national organization and the New York 1199 local that is staying with the RWDSU.

Officers of the national organization, who will retain their posts in the transition to a separately chartered union, include Sec.-Treas. Jerome P. Brown, Vice President and Organizing Director Robert Muehlenkamp and Executive Sec. Donna Ford, in addition to Nicholas.

The 1199 New York officers, in addition to Turner, include Executive Sec. Edward Wecker and Treasurer Telbert King. The four executive vice presidents are Ramon Malave, David White, Phillip Kamenkowitz and Jo Ann Marshall.

Israel pressed to intervene in El Al dispute

Piney Point, Md. — The Executive Council called on the Israeli government to instruct the state-run El Al airline to bargain in good faith with the Machinists, who struck the carrier in March, and to end its attacks on the union.

The walkout began Mar. 16 after all attempts to resolve the dispute under federal regulations governing labor relations in the airline industry had failed. The strike involves some 230 members of IAM District 100 in New York and Miami.

El Al has demanded more than a dozen concessions, including a three-year wage freeze, the right to contract out work now performed by IAM members, across-the-board cuts in vacations and elimination of vital work rules that protect job security.

Despite constructive union counterproposals, management has refused to bargain realistically, the council noted. El Al representatives have repeatedly walked out of meetings, expressing a take-it-or-leave-it attitude. The airline also has flown in strikebreakers from Israel and hired special security guards to intimidate the strikers, resulting in violence on the picket line.

Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, has condemned El Al's handling of the dispute, demanded the immediate removal of the strikebreakers, expressed "full solidarity with striking El Al employees," and called for "speedy resolution of the conflict in accordance with free democratic trade union principles."

The council expressed its support of the striking workers, and its thanks for Histadrut's efforts on their behalf.

El Al has a long history of labor disputes in Israel and, in 1982-83, was shut down for four months.

CENEX products added to AFL-CIO unfair list

Piney Point, Md.—CENEX gasoline and petroleum products have been added to the AFL-CIO Unfair List by the federation's Executive Council at the request of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

The council condemned the company's attempt to bust the union at its Laurel, Mont., refinery and voiced strong support for the 175 OCAW members who have been on strike at the refinery since Jan. 15.

Workers were forced to walk off the job after CENEX—ignoring a 30-year "stable and constructive bargaining relationship"—began a union-busting campaign, the council said.

To try to break the OCAW, the company is attempting to operate the refinery using supervisors and "imported scabs," the council said. It noted that CENEX has brought in "a Pinkerton guard force which outnumbers the strikebreakers."

CENEX is the brand name for gasoline and petroleum products manufactured by the Farmers Union Central Exchange, Inc. of Inver Heights, Minn.

Full media access urged for summer Olympics

Piney Point, Md. — The AFL-CIO called on sponsors of the 1984 summer Olympic Games to resist efforts of the Soviet Union and its allies to prevent Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty from covering the Los Angeles competition.

The USSR succeeded, through a subterfuge, in preventing RFE and RL journalists from covering the winter Olympics in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, an Executive Council statement noted. The action violated the spirit and meaning of Olympic rules as well as the Helsinki agreement provision for reducing international tensions through the free flow of information across national borders, it said.

The RFE and RL journalists should have the same access to gather and disseminate information about the Olympic events as all other professional journalists, the council said.

Council program seeks real recovery

Squeeze on workers seen source of surge in profits

tion's efforts have been "primarily directed toward making certain that our members are acquainted with the issues and the records of the candidates and making certain they are qualified to participate and turn out in the maximum possible numbers. We regard that as an important contribution to the democratic process."

Kirkland said organized labor was "clearly an important factor" in the primaries won by Mondale, but the primary credit "goes to the candidate." He said Mondale "has done a highly effective job" of making his case, and his candidacy has been strengthened in the process.

"He has demonstrated our prudence and good judgment in expecting and anticipating that he would be the candidate who could most effectively attract a favorable response from our members," Kirkland observed.

Political activities

In the course of their meeting, council members heard reports from COPE Director John Perkins on recent party primaries and caucuses, including the May 8 primaries midway during the council sessions. Other political activity reports were presented by Vice Presidents Frederick O'Neal and Barbara Hutchinson for United Black Labor for '84; Vice Presidents Joyce Miller and Hutchinson on AFL-CIO Women Working for '84; Vice President William W. Winpisinger on union retirees, and Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald on presentations to the Democratic Platform Committee.

Kirkland underscored Reagan's economic policies as a central issue in the election campaign. Responding to reporters' questions, he rejected the suggestion that workers are better off now than they were three years ago. Workers don't recover from unemployment suddenly when they get another job, Kirkland pointed out. The effects linger for many years, he noted, and the millions of workers who suffered unemployment during the past three years still bear the scars.

Severe losses

"Many of them have lost their homes," Kirkland observed. "Many of them have had their health impaired because they lost their health insurance coverage. They suffered all the other social and economic consequences of unemployment. That isn't written off by suddenly finding another job after a long period of deprivation. . . .

"I believe that as the debate goes on, the evidence can be brought forth very forcefully that all those people that we care most about have been sorely afflicted as a result of the policies of this Administration. And enough has been proven to convince people that another four years is a risk that ought not to be lightly faced."

In other business, the council heard a report on the recent breakthrough settlements among the struck Las Vegas hotels and on the outlook for bargaining with the holdout members of the Nevada Resort Association. The report was presented by Vincent Sirabella, organizing director of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, on behalf of HERE President Edward T. Hanley, who remained in Las Vegas, and by President Robert F. Harbrant of the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

A statement adopted by the council sharply denounced the struck hotels for their union-busting approach to the bargaining table and called on union members across the country to continue their solid support for the strikers.

Other council statements, which are detailed elsewhere in this issue, dealt with the pro-employer trend of the National Labor Relations Board, accreditation of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty for coverage of the Olympics, the Machinists' strike against Israel's El Al Airlines, areas of policy under the internal disputes mechanism of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution, the "binge" of corporate takeovers, coming choices facing long-distance telephone customers, union-busting by the CENEX Refinery in Laurel, Mont., the operations of the Coca-Cola Co. in Guatemala, and the Administration's abandonment of economic sanctions against the repressive Jaruzelski regime in Poland.

Legal move

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue filled in the council on court action blocking a move to merge the Typographical Union with the unaffiliated Teamsters. Donahue also reported on developments affecting the status of the Housing Investment Trust and the Mortgage Investment Trust.

Kirkland gave a detailed account of the creation by Congress of the National Endowment for Democracy. The endowment will channel funds to organizations and foundations of American labor, business and the two major parties to promote democratic institutions overseas. The AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute has been revived to receive funds and transmit grants to foster democratic trade unionism in other countries. Kirkland reported that Eugenia Kemble of the Teachers, who was active in the legislative effort to create the endowment, has been appointed director of the Free Trade Union Institute.

Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. advised the council of the effectiveness of its boycott action in helping to achieve settlement of the Newspaper Guild's strike against the publications of Consumers Union. He conveyed the thanks of Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., for the strong labor support generated by the council's boycott, which was dropped following the settlement.

The council also heard from Legislative Director Ray Denison on the outlook for the remainder of the current congressional session, President Howard Samuel of the Industrial Union Dept. on prospects for industrial policy legislation, Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler on organizing developments, International Affairs Director Irving Brown on coming meetings of the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Labor Organization.

Other reports

Interim committee reports were given by Donahue on the evolution of work and on finances; by Vice Presidents Glenn Watts on public relations, William H. Wynn on regressive legislation, and Thomas W. Gleason on the George Meany Memorial.

The council approved budgets for the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, the African-American Labor Center and the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. It also approved contributions to the National Symphony Orchestra, Economic Education for the Clergy, the Education Commission of the States, International Games for the Disabled and the Institute for Civil Justice.

The next meeting of the Executive Council will be held Aug. 20-22 in Denver.

Tax policy spurring 'takeover binge'

Piney Point, Md.—Corporate takeovers aimed at hyping profits for the already rich without adding jobs to the economy are endangering the nation, the Executive Council warned as it called for an end to the practice.

"The laissez-faire policies of the Reagan Administration encouraging takeovers and cannibalization of corporations must be changed," the council declared in a statement.

"The interests of employees and consumers must be taken into account. The tax policies and credit policies that favor takeovers need to be changed."

The takeovers are encouraged by the Reagan deregulation fever and the failure of the Justice Dept. and the Federal Trade Commission to rigorously enforce antitrust laws, the council asserted. Also, the Securities & Exchange Commission fails to require adequate notice and accounting for the actions of financial stock manipulators.

Workers sacrificed

No account is taken of the interests of employees involved in the takeovers, the council stressed. Employees are traded and bartered as chattel in the corporate wars for control and fast profits. Workers' wages, working conditions, pensions—and even their jobs—are threatened by divestitures and takeovers, the council said.

Takeovers in the oil industry have substantially reduced competition in the industry, leaving consumers at the mercy of a few large conglomerates. Takeovers have changed the makeup of financial institutions. Bank and thrift holding companies engage in interstate banking as well as in brokerage activities, savings and loans, insurance and other activities all intermingled in a new conglomerate operation.

In the media, concentration of ownership threatens the promise of a free press.

Executives take care of themselves during the takeovers, however, devising special protective devices—so-called "golden parachutes"—that provide large bonuses and buyouts if a firm is sold or merged.

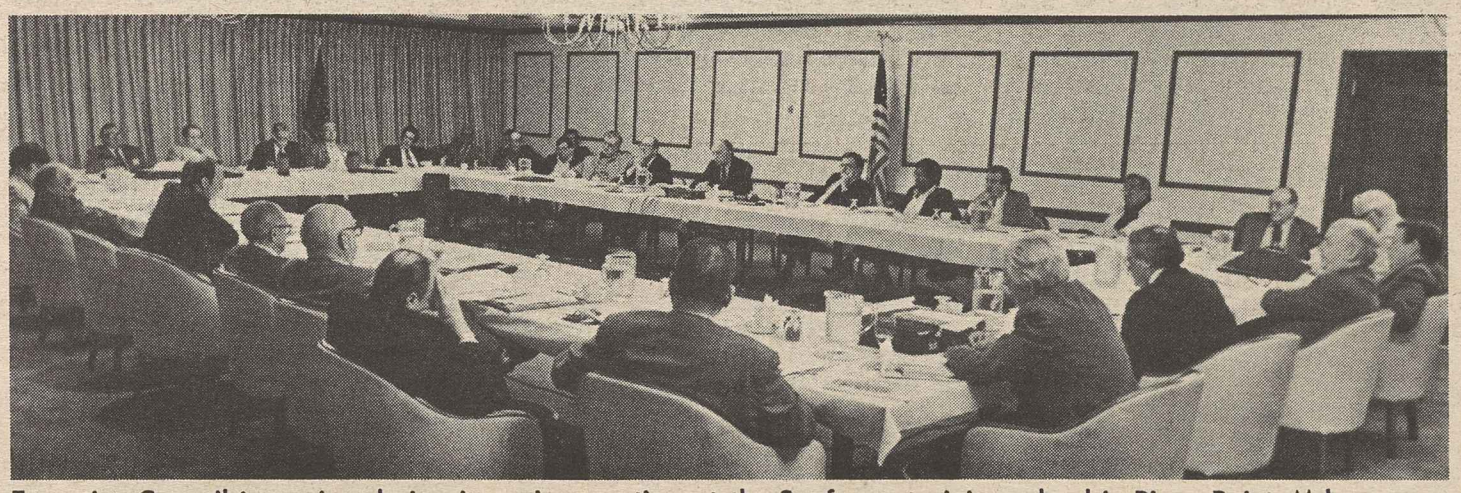
Accelerated depreciation provisions under new tax laws enacted during the Administration encourage the acquisition and divestiture of assets strictly for tax avoidance, not for investment purposes. Some firms are being bought solely for their tax losses, to be used to reduce tax liabilities, the council noted.

Boosting interest rates

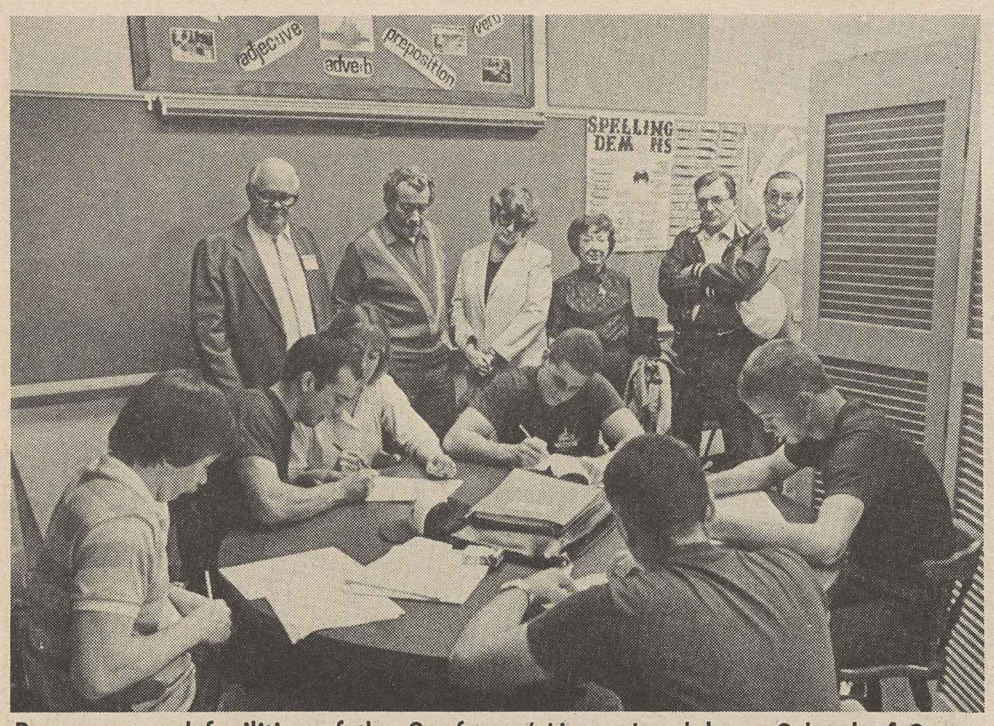
Banks aid and abet the takeover mania by extending tens of billions of dollars in credit to competing takeover aspirants. These credit commitments tend to raise overall interest rates and limit the ability of banks to make other, more productive loans. In the leveraged buyout schemes, a few executives obtain bank loans collateralized by the corporation's assets to purchase controlling stock interest in a corporation.

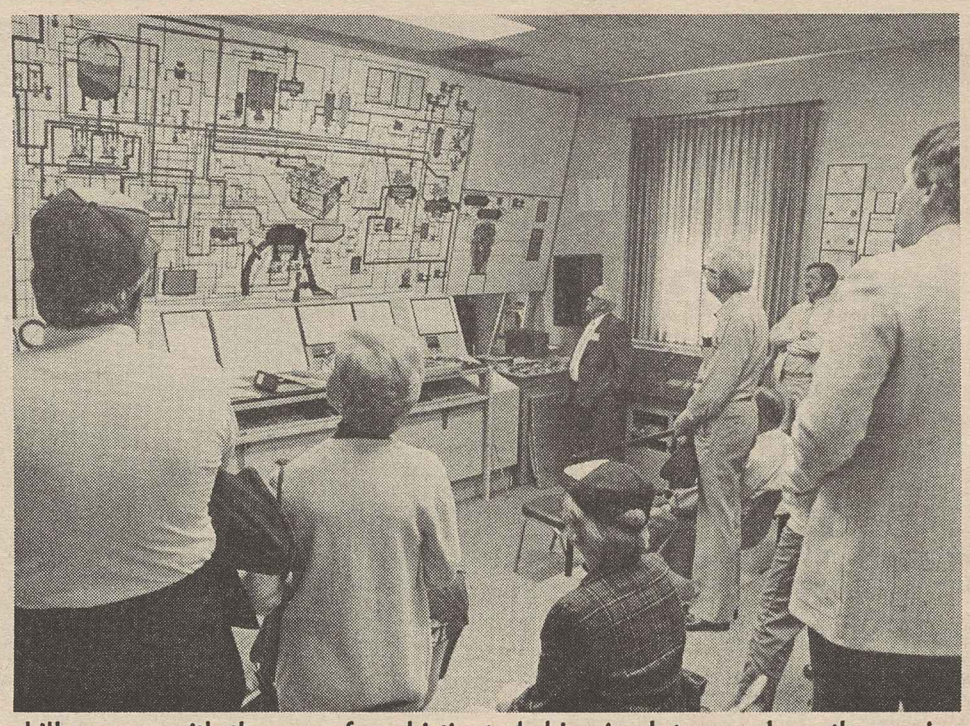
To remedy the situation, the council called for:

- Prohibiting huge conglomerate mergers.
- Changing tax laws to limit the repeated depreciation of assets through mergers and acquisitions, curb the carryover of tax losses, and narrow capital gains treatment of such profits.
- Credit control legislation to restrict extension of credit for large mergers, or leveraged buyouts involving more than $100 million in credit.
- Guarantees for workers' pensions as part of divestiture and takeover arrangements.
- Protection of worker and consumer interests during divestiture or takeover.
- Restricting foreign acquisition of firms engaged in operations related to national security.
- Curbing "golden parachutes."
- Federal chartering of major corporations.
- Prohibiting interlocking directorates of major firms and banks.
- Temporarily prohibiting any more mergers in the oil industry.
- Limiting media concentration.
- Restricting interstate banking and non-banking institutions.



Executive Council in session during its spring meeting at the Seafarers training school in Piney Point, Md.





Programs and facilities of the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship are explored by members of the Executive Council and AFL-CIO staff. Courses offered to SIU members include reading and writing skills, taught in one-on-one classes, left, along with all levels of seamanship skills, many with the use of sophisticated ship simulators such as the engine control room. In a statement, the council commended the SIU on its training program and expressed gratitude for making the Piney Point, Md., facility available for the council's spring meeting.

Senate votes down health care aid for elderly, disabled

The Senate refused to shield America's elderly and disabled from Medicare cost increases that would be required under a spending reduction bill that is being debated.

It rejected two labor-supported amendments proposed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). One sought to block a projected increase in monthly premiums for Part B of Medicare, which pays doctor bills. It also would have prevented higher deductibles to be paid by patients. The vote to table, and thus kill, the amendment was 58-36.

The other Kennedy amendment, defeated by an almost identical 59-36 vote, would have kept intact the present provision for Medicare coverage to start in the month a person reached the age of 65. The bill before the Senate would have delayed coverage until the next month.

In a letter to senators before the vote, Legislative Director Ray Denison expressed the AFL-CIO's support for both Kennedy amendments. Economy should not begin with increasing the health care burden on the elderly, he said. Most of them can't afford additional costs, he said.

Persons on Medicare now spend an average of 20 percent of their incomes on medical care, Denison noted. Any further increases would be unjustified, he said.

Cold Coke

Piney Point, Md.—The 450 workers who have occupied a Coca-Cola bottling plant in Guatemala City since Feb. 18 have the AFL-CIO's full support, the Executive Council said.

The council called on the Coca-Cola Co. to abide by an agreement it had made and begin "serious discussions" with the International Union of Food & Allied Workers, with which the union representing the embattled workers is affiliated.

Occupation of the plant by the workers came after management announced that the firm was bankrupt and would close the next day.

The validity of the bankruptcy claim was challenged by the IUF and the union's case was further supported by a delegation of North American trade unionists that went to Guatemala at the end of March.

Nearly four years earlier, when the plant was under different ownership, labor disputes resulted in the killing of eight local union leaders, the Executive Council noted. The Coca-Cola Co., headquartered in Atlanta, then agreed to finance new ownership, retain management supervision, assure union recognition and meet with the IUF, the council said.

In that context, the council asserted, "Coca-Cola's disclaimer of responsibility in the present dispute amounts to a breach of contract."

Council statements clarify policy on internal disputes

Piney Point, Md. — Two statements issued by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting here are designed to clarify and strengthen policy with respect to Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution governing internal disputes.

Both statements were recommended by the council's Article XX review committee. They deal with "general work or trade jurisdiction" disputes among building trades unions and with the affiliation of independent unions.

In the former, the council notes that "general work or trade jurisdiction" disputes are not covered by Article XX (they are subject to the building trades' joint disputes procedures), but the question of when a dispute falls within this classification continues to cause difficulty.

"The situation that has generated most of the difficulty," the council said, is where two or more unions seek for the workers they represent, "in collective bargaining or otherwise," the same construction work at a site where that work has not been customarily performed.

Jurisdictional resolve

In issuing its statement of policy covering this situation, the council said:

"Section 3 of Article XX, in terms, protects only 'established work relationships' which are 'deemed to exist as to work of the kind which members of an organization have customarily performed at a particular plant or work site (emphasis added). Thus, Section 3 plainly does not provide protection in the situation covered by this statement.

"And stretching the words of Section 2 — which protects 'established collective bargaining relationships'— to protect the affiliate with the longest standing claim to the particular type of construction work in question would produce two wholly unacceptable effects: such a reading of Section 2 would in practical terms negate the careful limitation of Section 3 to 'customary work' and would also extend the reach of Article XX to most, and perhaps all, of the jurisdictional disputes in the construction industry. For this reason, the council concludes that Section 2, like Section 3, does not provide protection in the situation covered by this statement."

Constitutional criteria

In its other statement, the council noted that since 1974 it has had three criteria for determining whether an independent union has become a "local or other subordinate body" of a federation affiliate and thus subject to the protections of Article XX. These criteria are the issuance of a charter to the independent union or its inclusion with a previously chartered subordinate body, payment of regular per capita to the AFL-CIO on all members involved, and the granting to those members of full rights of membership in the AFL-CIO affiliate.

The basic aim has been to bring independent unions "into the mainstream" of organized labor by encouraging such affiliations, the council said. It noted, however, that recent experience shows that the policy has not been "sufficient to encourage affiliations that effectively integrate the independents into the labor movement."

The council reported, for example, that some independents have sought conditions of affiliation that "in practical effect" preserve their independent existence. This has encouraged a bidding competition among AFL-CIO affiliates "directly contrary to Article XX's purposes."

Rules for independents

For these reasons, the council adopted the following additional criterion that must be met for an independent's affiliation to receive the protection of Article XX:

"4) No later than four years after the affiliation, the affiliated local or subordinate body must be required: to pay the regular per capita to the AFL-CIO on all members of the local or subordinate body; and to maintain its status as an affiliated local or subordinate body of the AFL-CIO continuously thereafter."

In another action, the Executive Council granted the Operating Engineers an extension of Article XX jurisdictional protection for Unit No. 13 of Fresno County, Calif., employees. The extension runs until the council meets next, Aug. 20-22.

Reagan appointees transform NLRB

ers to be represented by a union of their choosing.

Past administrations, both Republican and Democratic, "had pretty well observed" an understanding that NLRB appointees wouldn't be active partisans of unions or management, Kirkland said. But that all changed under Reagan, he said.

An analysis prepared for the council documented the trend. It compared NLRB decisions during comparable September through February periods in the Ford, Carter and Reagan Administrations.

In NLRB decisions on unfair labor practice charges against employers, 280 of 325 were upheld in whole or substantially during the Ford Administration, 374 of 445 during the Carter period, but only 68 of 135 under Reagan.

And in disputes over representation elections, the union position was upheld in a substantial majority of cases in the Carter and Ford Administrations. But the employer side won in 13 of 18 cases acted on by the current board.

The Senate Labor Committee had called a one-day hearing on Collyer's nomination while the council was in session, and its Republican majority was pressing to quickly bring the nomination to the Senate floor for a confirmation vote. But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the ranking minority member, served notice that Democrats would resist such hasty action. Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) then said he would hold off a vote on reporting the nomination until June and meanwhile schedule another hearing.

The council concluded that Collyer "does not have a single qualification for the job." It cited her relatively brief legal experience after graduation from law school. She was appointed chairman of the Mine Safety & Health Review Commission early in the Reagan Administration. In that post, the council said, "she always voted for the employer position in hard cases."

A hostile NLRB can make organizing and bargaining more difficult and the present board "is plainly intent on doing so," the council noted.

The council statement urged the need for Congress to limit the NLRB's ability to frustrate the intent of federal labor law. A "first step" in that direction would be rejection of the Collyer nomination.

President Reagan still has another NLRB vacancy to fill—a seat that has been open since the expiration last August of the term of Howard Jenkins, Jr., a highly regarded moderate Republican. The only Carter Administration holdover on the board is Don A. Zimmerman, a political independent.

Benjamin, Buckmaster get key posts

Daniel K. Benjamin has been appointed chief of staff to Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan, and Duane Buckmaster has been named deputy director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Benjamin, 36, had been acting assistant secretary for policy at the Labor Dept. since March 1983. Prior to joining the department in June 1982, he was an assistant professor of economics at the University of Washington.

Buckmaster, appointed by FMCS Director Kay McMurray, joined the agency Apr. 29. Before taking the post he was a management consultant in Chicago. He also had been a management negotiator for United Airlines, and early in his career he had been a member of Machinists Local 1979 in Honolulu.

Buckmaster replaced former Deputy Director Richard D. Williams who has returned to his previous position as director of the FMCS western region based in San Francisco.

High joblessness persists

Import relief termed vital to steel recovery

America's steel industry needs a curb on job-destroying imports to recover from a devastating recession, union and employer witnesses told the International Trade Commission.

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams and Vice President Leon Lynch said the start of economic recovery hasn't been felt at the plant gates because imports have taken over a bigger share of the U.S. market.

Steel imports, increasingly from low-wage countries, have captured 25 percent of the domestic market. And imports creamed off 40 percent of the rise in U.S. steel consumption during the first months of this year, Williams said.

As a result, he testified, employment isn't much above its recession low point. "Steelworkers are not being recalled and, unless some relief is afforded from the surge of imports, no end to their suffering is in sight."

Joint effort

Bethlehem Steel Corp., the nation's second-largest producer, joined with the union in petitioning the ITC for relief. They are urging the commission to recommend that President Reagan restrict imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market for the next five years.

Governors, mayors and members of Congress from districts where steel unemployment is heavy were among the opening-day witnesses endorsing the request for import quotas.

Lynch, who joined Williams in presenting the Steelworkers case, said the loss of some 200,000 steel industry jobs since 1977 has meant that many long-service employees have been "permanently displaced," with no realistic expectation of recall.

He cited a study of laid-off USWA members at two steel pipe plants at Duquesne, Pa., and said it was typical of the plight of other groups of jobless workers.

More than 6,700 union member were employed at the two plants at the end of 1981. Of these, 4,100 lost their jobs during 1982 and another 500 in 1983. Most had been laid off more than 16 months at the time of the survey.

Decreased earnings

Only 9 percent had found full-time jobs and 19 percent had part-time work. Of those with employment, 83 percent said their earnings had "decreased significantly," 14 percent said the decrease was "moderate."

Unemployment compensation had run out for 44 percent of the group and most families had no health insurance. In addition, Lynch testified, the survey found 80 percent of the unemployed steelworkers had experienced illness, depression or distress linked to their unemployment.

As for the future, Lynch told the ITC that the Duquesne facilities were among those slated by the U.S. Steel Corp. for permanent shutdown.

Williams testified to the pay cuts the union has accepted to bring down employment costs. He spoke of "dramatic results" achieved by joint union-employer teams in improving efficiency and quality of production.

"We are doing our part," Williams testified.

As for efficiency, he said, U.S. steelworkers produce substantially more steel per hour than workers in other industrialized countries, including Japan. The cost gap with the industrialized nations would be greatly diminished if the dollar wasn't overvalued on the world market, Williams testified.

Labor costs

But he stressed that the union has no apology for the fact that steel labor costs in the United States are higher than in so-called Third-World countries that have become major exporters of steel products to the United States.

Their living standards are "far lower," Williams noted. For the most part, "they toil under oppressive regimes in which free trade unions are either heavily restricted or outlawed altogether."

It surely should not be national policy to reduce the wages and living standards of American workers "so that they will match those of the worst paid steelworkers anywhere in the world," he insisted.

Federal investigation begun on OSHA's former director

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is conducting a conflict-of-interest inquiry into the relationship between Thorne G. Auchter, former director of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, and B. B. Andersen, owner of a building construction firm that recently hired Auchter.

The investigation centers on Auchter's role in dismissing $12,600 in proposed fines for a dozen violations of the federal job safety law in May 1981, and his subsequent employment by the company.

Field staff questioned

Vernon Strahm, OSHA's former Kansas City regional director, and John Miles, the agency field office coordinator, confirmed they were interviewed by FBI agents, the Associated Press reported.

Strahm said he was contacted by FBI agents "twice by phone and twice in person." He said the agents' line of questioning centered on Auchter and Andersen and "if I felt any collusion existed" in the events that occurred.

Strahm said that two of his inspectors, armed with a court warrant, conducted an inspection of a B. B. Andersen Co. construction site in 1981 over the objections of company officials.

The inspection resulted in 12 violations—10 considered "serious" and two "willful"—and fines totaling $12,600. In trying to nullify the results of the inspection, the company enlisted the aid of Rep. George Hansen (R-Idaho) who wrote to Auchter demanding "you look into this matter with a view toward correcting the injustice to the Andersen Co." Auchter dropped the penalties.

Strahm was given a verbal reprimand by Miles, Administrative Program Director David Zeigler, and Mark Cowan, who had been Auchter's assistant. Strahm was later given a poor job performance evaluation and a choice of demotion or retirement.

Asked whether Auchter may have been acquainted with Andersen prior to his being hired by the company, Strahm said that although he couldn't prove it, it would "seem possible" given that both belonged to building associations which hold national meetings, and that both are Republicans who were active in the 1980 election campaign of Ronald Reagan.

A Justice Dept. representative would "neither confirm nor deny" that its public integrity section was continuing an investigation of Auchter.

Major banks push prime lending rate up to 12.5 percent

A new boost in the prime lending rate—the third rise since mid-March—threatened to pinch the recovery and set the stage for increased joblessness.

Led by New York's Chase Manhattan Bank, commercial banks across the country fell in line with a half-percent increase to 12.5 percent, the highest level in the prime in 18 months. The prime rate is a base lending rate that banks charge their best corporate customers. Other short-term bank loan rates are tied to it.

Quickly following Chase Manhattan's lead were Citibank, Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co., First National Bank of Chicago, Marine Midland Bank, and Mellon National Bank.

These and other of the nation's big banks had raised prime rates to 11.5 percent from 11 percent on Mar. 19, and another half percentage point to 12 percent on Apr. 5.

Credit surge

Industry analysts saw the latest boost in the prime as the result of a surge in credit demand by the private sector on top of the ongoing demand for funds by the Treasury Dept. Many observers predicted that rates would continue to rise.

In late March, the Federal Reserve Board's Open Market Committee decided to tighten credit conditions, an action that generally precedes higher interest rates.

Within hours of the move to a higher prime rate, the Veterans Administration announced an increase in its maximum home loan interest rate from 13 to 13.5 percent. The rate was last raised in March, when it was increased from 12.5 to 13 percent.

Fixed-rate mortgages around the country are now above 14 percent in most places. The VA contends it cannot let its rates get too far out of line with mortgage rates in general because lenders begin to penalize owners of homes with VA mortgages when they want to sell.

'Call union' urged for long-distance telephone service

Piney Point, Md.—Unions and their members should "call and buy union" when choosing long distance telephone service or buying equipment, the Executive Council urged.

A council statement calls on AFL-CIO affiliates, state and local labor bodies and union members to select a long distance telephone carrier with a unionized workforce and to purchase only telecommunications equipment made in America by union labor.

The council noted that because of the court-ordered breakup of the Bell System formerly owned by AT&T, consumers now have to make choices about the telephone services they want and about equipment they buy.

Of the major companies competing for long distance telephone business, the council pointed out that only AT&T Communications and Western Union's Metro-Call have unionized workforces.

Divestiture terms

Some consumers will be asked to pick a long distance service as early as July 15 under a provision of the AT&T divestiture settlement that requires local Bell operating companies to provide other long distance companies "equal access" to local phone services. Consumers in cities where the "equal access" ruling is taking effect will be asked whether they want to stay with AT&T or choose another service.

The process will stretch over a two-year period, and the systems used by the phone companies to find out customers' preferences will vary in different parts of the country.

The first market where a long distance choice will be required from consumers will be Charleston, W. Va.

Profits shoot up

Corporate profits continued to soar in the first quarter of 1984, with spectacular gains in some industries.

A Wall Street Journal survey of 510 major companies showed after-tax earnings zoomed an average 58 percent over last year's January-March period. The surge was only slightly less than the robust 64-percent increase in the 1983 fourth quarter.

Sharp gains were posted in the three biggest industrial groups. Profits of the Big Three auto makers totaled $3.21 billion, more than triple the year-earlier levels, and all three companies set record earnings for any quarter. As a group, autos and equipment saw net profits rise 236 percent.

Profits of 18 big oil companies rose 39 percent, and earnings of 68 utilities climbed 28 percent.

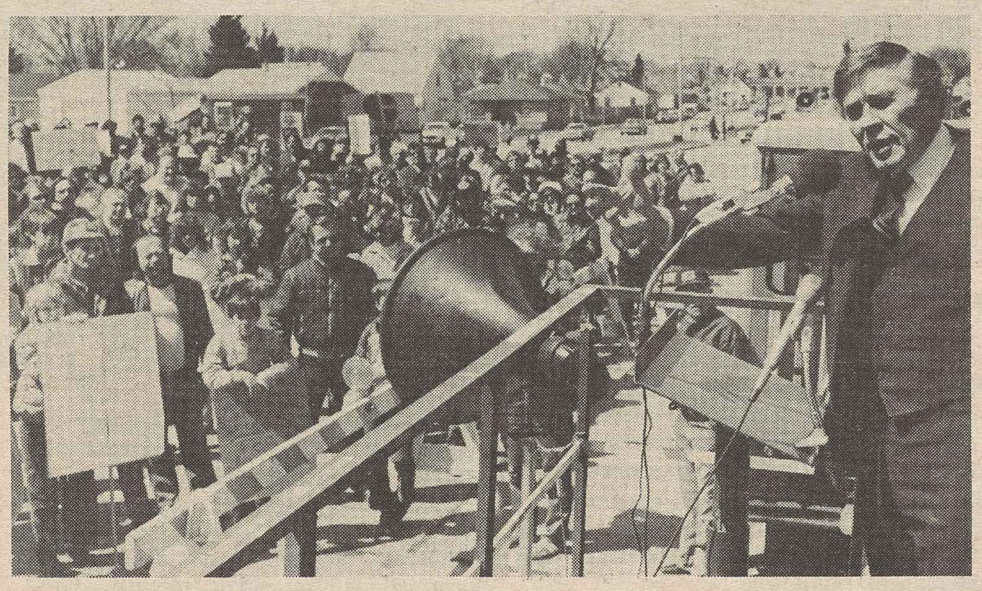
Food processing firms chalked up a giant increase of 196 percent over the quarter, rubber companies 150 percent, railroads 116 percent, and tools and machinery 115 percent.

Only two of the 28 major industry groups—banks and distillers—sustained a decline and these were relatively slight, 8 and 10 percent, respectively.

Major airlines narrowed losses from the 1983 first quarter. A 2-percent decline in passenger traffic was more than offset by higher ticket prices and an end to fare discounts.

Rally for jobs

State and city government officials join some 700 members of Allied Industrial Workers Local 806 in a Milwaukee rally to focus attention on the impact of plant closings. The AIW members marched to the Caterpillar Tractor Co. plant, which is scheduled to close next year. Communities in that area of Wisconsin have been hit by recent shutdowns of a foundry and a meatpacking plant. Caterpillar has rebuffed the union's offer for concessions and a city offer to refinance the property. Milwaukee Mayor Henry Maier, right, told the rally the threatened shutdown ranks as the "saddest moment" of his 24 years in office.



Jobless rate hovers at 7.8% as economic recovery slows

Unemployment remained stuck at a high 7.8 percent in April for the third month in a row, "a continuing tragedy for the millions of Americans seeking jobs," the AFL-CIO declared.

"It is another indication that the U.S. economy is not expanding enough to bring a real recovery from the deep 1981-83 recession," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"The frozen unemployment rate is continued proof that current economic policies of huge budget and trade deficits will not bring recovery."

The April jobless rate was nearly 3 percentage points below the recession high of 10.7 percent in December 1982, but still above the 7.4-percent rate when President Reagan took office.

Government figures

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that 8,840,000 people officially were unemployed during April, an increase of 71,000 from March, but not enough to increase the seasonally adjusted jobless rate. By the AFL-CIO's estimate, however, "true" unemployment was much higher.

BLS's measure of civilian unemployment does not count the number of Americans employed only part time because they are unable to find full-time work, or those too discouraged to find any work. There are an estimated 1.3 million discouraged workers and 5.6 million others employed part time "for economic reasons."

If these workers were added to the count, the jobless rate for April would have been 11.4 percent, with 13.1 million unemployed Americans.

Economy slowing

Historically high by any standard, the April jobless rate bears out the view of many analysts that the economy is slowing. Recent government statistics on new orders for consumer goods, net new business formation, building permits and other leading economic indicators, along with a trend toward higher interest rates, point in that direction.

For certain categories of workers, unemployment remains a "national disgrace," Oswald stressed. The jobless rates for blacks and Hispanics each rose two-tenths of 1 percent last month, to 16.8 and 11.5 percent, respectively, BLS reported.

Employment in April grew by 260,000 to 10.4 million, seasonally adjusted, but a surge of about 330,000 in the civilian labor force to 113.2 million offset the jobs growth. By another measure of unemployment, which includes members of the armed forces stationed in the United States, the jobless rate was 7.7 percent, also unchanged from March and February levels.

Nonfarm payroll employment, as measured by a survey of establishments, showed gains in more than two-thirds of the 186 industries sampled by BLS. Almost half of the April job gains were in the goods-producing sector.

Factory employment continued to rise in April, posting a gain of 100,000. Durable goods increases occurred largely in machinery and electrical and electronic equipment while in nondurable goods, food processing and printing and publishing posted the strongest job growth.

There was an increase of 175,000 new jobs in the services industry. Construction employment improved over levels that had declined in March.

Labor opposes tax breaks for foreign investors

The United States shouldn't become a "tax-haven country" that lures foreign capital with special tax concessions, the AFL-CIO urged in a statement submitted to the House Ways & Means Committee.

The committee is considering legislation to repeal the 30 percent withholding tax now imposed on interest income from various types of foreign investments in the United States.

"We see no reason why foreign investors who enjoy security, protection and profit from investing in the United States should be exempted from making some contribution to this nation's taxes," the AFL-CIO stated.

As for the claim that repeal of the withholding requirement would attract more foreign capital to the United States, the AFL-CIO suggested that any such capital would most likely be "speculative" money for quick profit rather than long-term investment.

Such an inflow of capital adds instability to the economy without creating new jobs or production, it warned.

Primaries add to Mondale's delegate lead

The four-primary day, which the Hart campaign hailed as a turnabout, in fact enlarged Mondale's lead. He collected 188 delegates, more than the combined total of 138 for Hart and 41 for Jackson.

The Hart campaign substantially outspent the Mondale organization on television time, but some of its commercials may have backfired. One Hart ad aired in Ohio featured what was supposed to be a conversation between two blue-collar workers.

"Union leadership may get our union dues, but they don't get our hearts and minds," one Hart supporter is shown telling another.

But, as in other states, polls agreed on Mondale's strong first-place showing among union households.

Small stakes

Hart has realistic expectations of picking up strength as the campaign moves West, but the May 15 votes in Nebraska and Oregon have a low delegate yield, as does the May 18 caucus selection in neighboring Idaho.

In the big June 5 windup of the campaign, Hart is pinning his hopes on California's 306 delegates and hoping for an upset in the battle for New Jersey's 107 delegates. West Virginia, New Mexico and South Dakota also pick their delegates on that date.

But there are only 571 delegates still to be chosen and by the UPI news service count, Mondale already has a lead of 1,518 delegates to 886 for Hart, 303 for Jackson, 339 uncommitted and 58 pledged to other candidates.

Almost lost sight of in national coverage has been the selection of candidates for House and Senate seats—sometimes in the same primaries at which presidential preferences are voted and in some states in separate elections.

Texas runoff

Texas had a primary for congressional nominations on the same day as its evening caucuses for presidential choice, but a runoff will be needed to choose a Democratic candidate for U.S. senator.

The incumbent, Republican John G. Tower, is not seeking re-election and the GOP nominated Rep. Phil Gramm to succeed him. Gramm is the turncoat Democrat who, as strategist for the "boll weevils," was instrumental in pushing through President Reagan's budget and tax program three years ago.

On the Democratic side, three contenders ended up in almost a dead-heat. The runoff, on June 2, will be between Kent Hance, a conservative House member, and labor-endorsed State Sen. Lloyd Doggett, a strong liberal.

N.J. unions mount Mondale drive

Atlantic City, N.J.—The 1,200 delegates to the 19th biennial New Jersey AFL-CIO convention endorsed Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale and pledged to work for his victory in the state's June 5 primary.

The endorsement highlighted the three-day convention which centered on the need to prevent the re-election of Ronald Reagan.

Sen. Bill Bradley told delegates that the Reagan Administration is not concerned about unions or their members, reminding them of the number of workers' jobs that have been sacrificed to lower inflation. He stressed that the Reagan policies have resulted in the "most serious recession since the '30s," in a record trade deficit and a record budget deficit, and in double-digit unemployment—all in just one term.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg similarly emphasized the need to prevent a Reagan second term, keying on the possibility of Reagan's appointing four or five new members to the Supreme Court.

The delegates heard Rep. Peter W. Rodino proclaim that he has been proud to wear the label of "labor-endorsed" for the past 36 years. The Judiciary Committee chairman pointed out bankruptcy reform legislation he sponsored has passed the House and is awaiting action in the Senate.

Rep. James J. Florio urged the delegates to work for Mondale's defeat of Reagan, while Rep. Robert G. Torricelli stressed the importance of gaining a national industrial policy.

More jobs

Gov. Thomas Kean called "jobs" his top priority—the creation of new jobs and the retention of existing jobs in the state. He highlighted the impact of the Job Partnership Training Act on employment and pressed for support of a $3 billion transportation bond program covering highway and bridge construction and repair, and public transit.

Other guest speakers include COPE Director John Perkins, President Edward J. Cleary of the New York AFL-CIO, President Arthur R. Osborne of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO, State Labor Commissioner Roger Bodman, General Assembly Speaker Alan Karcher, and Air Line Pilots' member Jerry Schofield, who detailed ALPA's efforts in the Continental Airlines strike.

Delegates re-elected by acclamation all the officers and board members of the state federation, including President Charles H. Marciante, who begins his fifth term, and Sec.-Treas. Edward B. Pulver, who starts his third four-year term.

Delegates attended workshops on plant closings and aid for workers, on strike assistance, and on public employee bargaining.

Resolutions passed by the convention supported continuation of the Trade Adjustment Assistance program, a ban on industrial homework, development of a national policy, quotas on textile imports, and plant closing legislation.

The Hidden Cost

LAST WEEK it was the shoe industry. This week it is the steel industry. In both cases, unions and employers have jointly petitioned the International Trade Commission for temporary relief from job-destroying imports.

The case they make is compelling. Hundreds of thousands of jobs have been lost, and there are no jobs to replace them. Factory towns have become ghost towns.

In both industries, union members have gone the extra mile to help their employers stay in business. They have accepted pay cuts and a rollback of benefits, where needed. Joint union-management teams have searched for and found ways to increase productivity.

But a currency exchange rate that prices imports artificially low and makes U.S. goods so expensive abroad is beyond the scope of labor-management cooperation. And as Steelworkers President Lynn Williams told the Trade Commission, there is a limit to the lowering of U.S. living standards to compete with low-wage countries where workers are exploited and unions suppressed.

The unchecked flow of imports is no bargain for anyone if the cost of unemployment and empty plants is added to the price.

On a Takeover Binge

INSTEAD OF INVESTING in new plants and machinery and creating jobs for the future of America, corporations have gone on a takeover binge and have engaged in leveraged buy-outs, stock speculation and wild bidding wars.

These actions are designed to achieve enormous profits for the already rich without adding a single additional job. They do nothing to improve the competitiveness of American firms in the international arena but rather amount to little more than executive mud-wrestling. Tax policies and bank lending policies fuel the craze for the buying and selling of corporations.

In these takeovers, no account is taken of the interests of the employees involved. Employees are traded and bartered as chattel in the corporate wars for control and fast profits. Workers' wages, working conditions, pensions and even their jobs are threatened by divestitures and takeovers.

The takeovers are encouraged by the Reagan deregulation fever, and the failure to rigorously enforce antitrust laws. In the oil industry, takeovers have substantially reduced competition, leaving consumers at the mercy of a few large conglomerates.

Takeovers have changed the make-up of financial institutions. Bank and thrift holding companies engage in interstate banking, as well as in brokerage activities, savings and loans, insurance and other activities all intermingled in a new conglomerate operation.

In the media, concentration of ownership threatens the promise of a free press.

EXECUTIVES HAVE devised special protective devices to take care of themselves—so-called "golden parachutes"—that provide large bonuses and buy-outs if a firm is sold or merged.

The new tax law's accelerated depreciation provisions encourage the acquisition and divestiture of assets strictly for tax avoidance, not for investment purposes. Some firms are being bought solely for their tax losses, to be used to reduce tax liabilities.

Banks aid and abet the takeover mania by extending tens of billions of dollars in credit to competing takeover aspirants. These credit commitments tend to raise overall interest rates and limit the ability of banks to make other, more productive loans. In the leveraged buy-out schemes, a few executives obtain bank loans collateralized by the corporation's assets to purchase controlling stock interest in a corporation.

The laissez-faire policies of the Reagan Administration encouraging takeovers and cannibalization of corporations must be changed. The interests of employees and consumers must be taken into account. The tax policies and credit policies that favor takeovers need to be changed.

Home ownership dreams dimmed by interest rates

By Press Associates, Inc.

The American dream of home ownership has been fading into a nightmare of high interest rates.

The Census Bureau recently reported that the percentage of families that own their homes has declined under the Reagan Administration, marking the first drop since the bureau began keeping records in 1962. Home ownership dropped from 65.6 percent in 1980 to 64.6 percent in 1983.

The housing industry is probably more sensitive to interest rate fluctuations than any other area of the economy. Both home builders and prospective home buyers are profoundly affected by even slight changes in the cost of credit.

A look at housing activity in recent years illustrates the point. In 1978, when mortgage interest rates averaged 9.5 percent, housing starts reached a record high of 2 million. In 1979, starts fell to 1.7 million as interest rates rose.

As the Federal Reserve Board, backed by the Reagan Administration, further tightened its grip on the nation's money supply, high rates sent the housing industry into its worst depression since World War II. In 1982, barely more than 1 million housing units were started.

In the summer of 1982, with mortgage rates at 15.7 percent, the Federal Reserve Board began easing up on the monetary reins and by the summer of 1983 mortgage rates fell to 12.5 percent. Housing starts then rose to 1.8 million.

March reversal

By February 1984, starts rose to an annual rate of about 2.2 million, the number of new units which labor experts say is necessary to provide for new households and replace old housing stock. However, with interest rates creeping up again, starts plunged nearly 27 percent in March to an annual rate of 1.6 million units.

If interest rates hover near their current levels or continue to inch up, housing industry economists say that starts won't improve much from the March level for the rest of the year, and probably will decline even more during 1985.

A weak housing industry means bad news for the rest of the economy because of the strong ripple effect on industries supplying home appliances, furnishings and building materials, and on public construction of roads, sewers and schools.

Priced out

With mortgage rates now at 14 percent, fewer than 30 percent of American families can afford the purchase of a typical $75,000 home. If mortgage rates rise one percentage point, an additional one to two million families will be priced out of the housing market.

Many recent home purchases were made with adjustable rate mortgages subject to increased payments if interest rates rise. Large-scale home foreclosures will result if rates keep going up, analysts say.

The dramatic effect of mortgage rates on the total cost of a new house can be illustrated by a purchaser of a $75,300 house with a 10 percent down payment and a 12.5 percent mortgage at a fixed rate for 30 years. That house ends up costing over $267,000, more than $192,000 going just to pay off interest.

Unlike the weather, something can be done about interest rates. Some proposals came from a recent legislative conference held by the National Council for Low Interest Rates. These included:

- Reinstating and improving the expired Credit Control Act to give the Federal Reserve Board and the President the stand-by authority to impose credit controls.
- Democratizing the banker-controlled Federal Reserve by including on its board representatives of labor, farmers and consumers.
- Cutting the record federal deficits resulting from President Reagan's tax cuts favoring the rich and his huge military spending increases. These deficits are contributing to high interest rates, an artificially high dollar, record trade deficits and lost jobs.

July 31 deadline

Labor Dept. orders ITU elections rerun

The Labor Dept. has ordered the Typographical Union to rerun elections for the top five ITU offices after finding violations of the Landrum-Griffin Act in campaign activity for last November's elections.

This follows a federal court order delaying the planned referendum vote on merger of the ITU with the unaffiliated Teamsters, a move which AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said is not in the best interest of the ITU membership.

In an exchange of letters with the ITU, the Labor Dept. explained it is ordering a mail ballot referendum of the union's 70,000 members be held "as soon as practicable." The department said it would tally and announce the vote by July 31. Any challenges to the supervised election would be decided by a representative of the Secretary of Labor.

The Labor-Management Services Administration ordered the rerun following a two-month investigation, which was requested by Robert McMichen, winner of the November 1983 ITU election for president by 5,000 votes over incumbent Joe Bingel.

In the federal court ruling in San Francisco, Judge Thelton Hendersen had ordered an indefinite delay of the ITU-IBT merger proposal pending resolution of the challenges to last fall's elections.

AFL-CIO support

At a press conference during the Executive Council meeting in Piney Point, Md., Kirkland expressed the federation's support for continued affiliation by the ITU.

"We certainly have an interest in doing everything that we can to support those members of the ITU who believe that the ITU should remain an affiliate of the AFL-CIO," Kirkland said.

He added that the interest of the ITU membership would be best served by a merger with other unions in the printing industry "and their interests are not served by the colonial imperialism of the Teamsters that would submerge that proud organization within the Teamsters' structure."

Kirkland noted that the AFL-CIO has had its "ups and downs" with the Teamsters, "particularly since their expulsion in 1957" from the federation. But, this is the "first time that they've undertaken a raid on an affiliate—an entire affiliate—of the federation."

Union fund use

In its decision, the Labor Dept. found that the election violations, which involved "the illegal use of union funds to promote candidates," could have affected the outcome of all five elections. All candidates will again be matched against each other.

As part of the accord, the ITU leaders agreed not to conduct a referendum on any proposal "to merge with any other labor organization or take any other irrevocable action" until a new election of officers is held and the results certified by the government.

McMichen, who heads a group of ITU leaders opposed to a merger with the Teamsters, welcomed news of the agreement. He said this was the second piece of good news for ITU members "who want a voice in their future."

In the federal court ruling, Judge Hendersen noted that "McMichen's opposition to merger with the IBT and Bingel's support for it, were critical issues in the election campaigns."

McMichen strongly favors merging the ITU with the Graphic Communications Union, and it is likely the results of the rerun election will mirror the membership's preference for a merger partner.

Strikers step up campaign against 26 holdout hotels to discuss details of the sensitive contract negotiations.

The union coalition reached agreements with 24 other major hotels before the strike.

Members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, meeting at Piney Point, Md., received a thorough briefing on developments since the strike began Apr. 2 from HERE Organizing Director Vincent Sirabella, who thanked the federation for its solidarity and support in behalf of the 14,000 striking workers.

In a statement, the council condemned employer-inspired brutality during the walkout, charged the member hotels of the Nevada Resort Association with a "naked effort to destroy" the unions, and called on all AFL-CIO affiliates to continue their support of the federation's Strike Assistance Fund until all of the hotels have returned to the bargaining table and worked out a just and equitable settlement in the contract dispute.

The council also called for an intensified boycott of the 26 holdout hotels, asking the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to publicize the names of the struck hotels, and asked all union members to refrain from patronizing them.

Holdout list

The hotels are the MGM Grand, Tropicana, Desert Inn, Sands, Castaways, Silver Slipper, Frontier, Union Plaza, Four Queens, Mint, Holiday International, Showboat, Marina, Holiday Inn South, Treasury, Sam's Town, California Hotel, Golden Gate, Westward Ho, Imperial Palace, Las Vegas Club, Paddlewheel, Hotel Continental, Palace Station, Holiday Inn Hotel and Vegas World.

Hilton Hotels Corp., became the first association member to settle with the unions. The company reached agreement May 3 on pacts covering several thousand employees of the Las Vegas Hilton and the Flamingo Hilton. The agreements were followed on May 6 with settlements at Caesars Palace, Western Hotel and El Cortez, which cover another 2,300. Ratification meetings are being scheduled.

As negotiations went forward, the Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority released figures showing the city lost 92,000 visitors during April and more than $35 million because of the contract dispute. The figures were believed to be conservative, and did not include lost gaming revenue.

Police arrested 14 striking workers at the Union Plaza Hotel and nine others at the Desert Inn on May 8 for demonstrating in violation of a court order. The arrests brought the total booked since the strike began to 678.

In briefing the Executive Council, Sirabella said that the striking unions agreed that their members would not return to work until all had signed agreements at the remaining hotels. He also assailed the union-busting tactics of the hotel owners.

Court orders homework ban restored

The Ladies' Garment Workers won a federal district court ruling ordering the reinstatement of the ban on industrial homework in the knitted outerwear industry.

But the Labor Dept. said it will take the case back to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia for the third time.

That court, in a November 1983 decision overruling a lower court, ordered the homework ban reinstated in February. It denied a request by Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan for a further extension.

A month later, Donovan published a rulemaking notice and issued an "emergency suspension" of the ban.

The ILGWU then challenged Donovan's action charging that he violated the court's mandate because it was not supported by the "reasoned decisionmaking" that the court of appeals had ordered in its November 1983 ruling.

The union charged that Donovan's action violated "both the spirit and the explicit terms" of the court's previous decision. After the federal district court ruled it lacked the power to reinstate the ban, the appellate court held the lower court had an "erroneous view of its judicial authority" and ordered it to decide whether the emergency rule "violates the terms of our previous mandate."

The three-judge appellate panel noted the justification given by Donovan for issuing the emergency rule "is merely a repeat of the argument he advanced in his motion to stay this panel's decision—an argument that already has been rejected by the court. Undaunted by this repudiation, the Secretary has now, in effect implemented the stay on his own.

"Such an attempt to circumvent a lawful order of this court does not satisfy the requirement of reasoned decisionmaking imposed on the Secretary."

District Court Judge Louis Oberdorfer agreed and ordered the homework ban be reinstated "until modified as a result of reasoned decisionmaking, after notice and comment, as prescribed by the Court of Appeals mandate."

He stayed the reinstatement until May 15.

Donovan contended that there was a "good cause" exception that allowed the department to issue the emergency rule lifting the ban. The good cause, he reasoned, was that "the disruption among homeworkers currently engaged in the knitted outerwear industry constitutes an emergency which is beyond the control of the department."

Unions win high marks in poll of members

By a whopping margin, union members who participated in an independent national survey said they would vote for their unions again in a certification election.

The study, done by researcher Stephen M. Hills under the auspices of Ohio State University, asked more than 1,000 male union members aged 28-38 how they would vote in a certification election in their workplaces. The survey was designed to measure how satisfied workers in various industries are with their unions.

Overall, 85 percent of those surveyed said they would vote "yes" for a union again. Pro-union response ranged from a high of 92 percent among public employees to 80 percent among workers in the mining industry.

In other categories examined, pro-union results were 88 percent in manufacturing; 88 percent in transport, communication and utilities; 87 percent in construction; 83 percent in retail and wholesale trade; 82 percent in professional services, and 83 percent in other service industries.

The high degree of satisfaction found by the survey refutes the theory that rank-and-file members are alienated from their own unions, Hills said.

In other findings, the same question asked of non-union males revealed a much lower support for unions, ranging from a low of 15 percent in finance, insurance and real estate to a high of 54 percent in public administration. Overall, 27 percent of those surveyed said they would vote for a union, including 36 percent of those in professional services, and 34 percent of those in the construction industry. Other industries scored close to the national average.

The study pointed out that one explanation for the differences may be a "self-selection" process through which people whose personal attitudes are inherently anti-union may be disproportionately represented in the non-union sector of the economy. Also, the study said, in non-union firms, employers may pursue "union substitution policies," such as high wages and benefits, which reinforce "non-union" attitudes.

The "self-selection" factor is probably less pronounced in the public sector as well as in the professional services sector —which includes teachers—according to the study.

Another major finding in the survey was the high degree of pro-union attitudes among black workers, including both union members and non-union employees. With all other factors constant, being black raised a worker's support for unionism by an average of 19 percentage points in each of the categories surveyed.

Coalition hits subminimum wage scheme

By David L. Perlman

Black members of Congress scoffed at the Reagan Administration's claim that a lower minimum wage is the answer to teenage unemployment and urged legislation that would target jobs and training—not pay cuts—to needy youngsters.

The Congressional Black Caucus is leading the fight against President Reagan's new campaign for a subminimum youth wage because the Administration is touting the plan as an "opportunity" for black teenagers to get summer jobs.

The Administration wants Congress to reduce the minimum wage for persons under age 20 by 85 cents an hour—from $3.35 to $2.50—between May 1 and Sept. 30. Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan asserted this would generate 400,000 additional jobs without any cost to the government. Since black teenagers have the highest unemployment rates, cutting the pay floor would help them the most, he argued.

At an overflow Capitol Hill news conference, the 21 Black Caucus members were backed in their opposition to a subminimum wage by representatives of the AFL-CIO, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and other concerned groups, including the United States Students Association.

Hawkins bill backed

The caucus is supporting a youth employment bill co-sponsored by Rep. Augustas F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Hawkins, who is chairman of the House Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities, termed the Administration bill "the opening wedge" in an attempt to push down wage levels generally.

If it succeeds, he warned, look for further attempts to weaken wage-hour protections.

Black Caucus Chairman Julian C. Dixon (D-Calif.) made clear the group's determination that the Administration bill will not get through the House.

"We strongly oppose President Reagan's effort to undermine the principle of equal pay for equal work," he said. And despite the Administration's denials, "it is clear that a youth subminimum wage will lead to substitution of teenagers for older workers presently receiving the minimum wage."

Hawkins and Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), both subcommitee chairmen on the Education & Labor Committee, said they had no intention of acting on a bill to reduce the minimum wage. And the chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor Standards, Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.)

Domestic content rule pushed to salvage jobs

Kirkland cites critical role of auto industry

A domestic content requirement for cars sold in the United States would give consumers a wider choice and curb the greed of U.S. auto makers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Auto Workers President Owen Bieber testified.

The House has already passed a domestic content bill, and Bieber and Kirkland urged the Senate Commerce Committee to take it a big step closer to enactment.

Kirkland stressed America's need for the jobs the auto-related industries represent, and the importance of strengthening the nation's industrial base.

Bieber acknowledged that the union's job in making the case for a domestic content law is harder because of reports of higher sales, profits and executive bonuses.

A lot of people think there is no longer any need for legislation that would require most autos sold in the United States to be built in this country, with American parts, Bieber noted. But "nothing could be further from the truth," he stressed.

"The auto companies employ 23 percent fewer production workers than they did a few years ago," he testified, and the outlook is for a further shrinkage of jobs.

Bieber told the committee that the union and its employers have different perspectives about the need for a domestic content requirement.

Soaring imports

"The companies can earn profits whether they supply this market with autos made here or abroad," Bieber noted. He cited "massive increases in vehicle imports" that have been scheduled by the Big Three U.S. auto manufacturers. Without a domestic content law, U.S. imports of subcompacts could more than double by 1990, he warned.

Bieber testified that the UAW "has protested early and vociferously about inadequate small cars, huge profits, excessive prices and outrageous executive bonuses."

He termed the domestic content legislation "pro-investment and pro-competition." By assuring competition among the major companies, he said, "it will keep down prices and profits" while spurring technological advances.

Union workers' skills on display in Memphis

By Susan Dunlop

Memphis, Tenn.—It was a warm welcome to the South for the 39th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show as labor's annual exposition of union skills, services and union-made products opened its doors for a six-day run here.

Thousands of visitors attended the exhibition held May 11-16 at the city's convention center. The show was previously held in the city in 1974.

The public exposition again highlighted the skills and productivity of union workers alongside a panorama of the goods and services they produce in cooperation with their employers. The show is produced and managed in a different major city each year by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

At the show's opening day ceremonies, Dept. President James E. Hatfield stressed that the exhibit is a celebration of the outstanding skills and productivity of American workers and of the high quality of union-made goods.

Hatfield also thanked both Memphis and Shelby County officials for cooperation that included placement of a full-page color ad in the city's daily paper, urging citizens to attend.

A joint effort

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said at opening ceremonies that the show demonstrates "the successes and the best of our collective bargaining system," including labor's interest in a "cooperative approach to solving the concerns shared by labor, management and government."

Donahue noted that the goods and services wearing a union label at the show "are proof of what can be accomplished through mutual acceptance, mutual respect . . . and a lot of give and take."

Donahue called for changes in trade policy to give American workers a chance

Solid commitment urged on rights

Los Angeles—The AFL-CIO called on the Democratic Party to go into the presidential election campaign with a firm platform commitment to put the United States back on the path to equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity.

AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson said much of the progress the nation made in bringing minorities and women into the economic mainstream has been reversed during the Reagan Administration.

Civil rights laws have gone unenforced and government programs have been put under administrators who are hostile or indifferent to them, she charged. Hutchinson, director of women's affairs of the Government Employees, testified at a regional hearing of the Democratic Platform Committee keyed to the themes of opportunity and fairness.

"The message this Administration has been sending is that discrimination is not a matter of great concern to the government," Hutchinson testified.

Reagan retreat

Under President Reagan, she said, "court decisions on pay equity are more likely to be challenged than enforced. Affirmative action programs will be opposed, rather than supported."

Hutchinson spoke to the committee of labor's striving to achieve a society in which quality health care, education and opportunity for productive work is available to all—with "no citizen excluded by reason of race, sex, religion, color or economic status."

That should also be the "central goal" of the Democratic Party, she urged.

But in addition to the civil rights reversals, Hutchinson testified, the Administration's economic policies have fallen hardest on those who already have the least.

Blacks and Hispanics still face double-digit unemployment, and the jobless rates for both groups have risen over the past three months, she stressed.

Domestic content bill called key to preserving auto jobs

Kirkland reminded the committee that Congress has too often stood aside and let American industry and jobs be permanently lost.

Once-strong industries have been destroyed, he said, "not because these industries have become obsolete or their workers less productive, but because these industries have been overwhelmed by imports flooding into our uniquely open market."

The fate of the auto industry, Kirkland suggested, "could decide whether this nation will recover from recession and regain its productive strength or slide downward."

Kirkland termed it ironical that U.S. Trade Rep. William Brock had pointed to the huge executive bonuses given to the top management of the auto companies as the basis for his recommendation that the United States not seek to renew the voluntary import restraints agreement with Japan.

"The lifting of import controls will not punish management," Kirkland stressed. "The immediate harm will be felt by production workers through further loss of income and jobs." Further, elimination of restraints will allow and encourage U.S. manufacturers to import cars from Japan for sale in their U.S. outlets.

Except in the United States, Kirkland noted, domestic content laws or other trade restraint measures are commonplace. He said enactment of a U.S. domestic content requirement would enable "manufacturers from all nations to sell and produce cars here, employing U.S. labor, and providing a multiplier effect on both service and production jobs in this country."

The beneficiaries will be consumers as well as workers, he stressed.

Louisiana-Pacific dispute

Lumber mill strikers press shareholders

Rocky Mount, N.C.—Striking lumber mill workers from the Pacific Northwest crossed the continent by plane and bus to confront their employer, the Louisiana-Pacific Corp., at its shareholders meeting about its admitted union-busting policies.

Some 1,500 L-P Corp. workers have been on strike since June 1983, when L-P broke ranks with seven other companies in an industry bargaining group and rejected a modest three-year contract which included a first-year wage freeze. Company concession demands included elimination of the union security provision for new hires.

The workers at 16 of the 18 struck plants are members of the Carpenters' Western Council of the Lumber Production & Industrial Workers. Employees at the two other L-P plants are members of the Woodworkers.

Some 40 strikers from northern California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana came by plane to Carpenters headquarters in Washington, where they boarded two buses for the five-hour drive to Rocky Mount.

Support pledged

In greeting the strikers, Carpenters President Patrick Campbell pledged the union's full support in their efforts to win a fair settlement.

"There is absolutely no economic justification for Louisiana-Pacific's refusal to pay decent wages to its employees," Campbell said. He accused the company of totally ignoring the needs of its workers.

Under the banner of the Louisiana-Pacific Workers for Justice Committee, the 40 strikers were joined in Rocky Mount by more than a hundred trade unionists and their supporters from senior citizen, church and environmental organizations.

They entered the morning shareholders meeting armed with nearly 2 million proxied shares of L-P stock which had been garnered through mail solicitation of the company's shareholders. Union-sponsored shareholder resolutions challenged the company's strike-provoking actions and other policies.

Union strategy

The proxy fight was part of a many-sided "corporate campaign" aimed at pressuring the company at its weakest points. The campaign is accompanied by a stepped-up organizing drive at many of L-P's non-union mills and the AFL-CIO's national consumer boycott of L-P wood products.

Dave Bigby, a striker from Oroville, Calif., speaking at a rally preceding the shareholders meeting, called the campaign against L-P part of "the beginning of a new era for the labor movement in America, a demonstration that working people are still together on the things that matter to them." He accused L-P President Harry A. Merlo of "unbridled greed and arrogance."

Elmer Chatak, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., likened the L-P dispute to the union-busting era of the 1920s and '30s "when the greedy people had control of this nation. That's what we have today, with President Reagan setting an example that many are trying to mimic, including Merlo."

Joseph Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said, "We're not going to let anybody turn back the clock, including the cowboy in the White House."

"Companies can't escape to the South, where they think blacks and whites are divided. We're not as together as we're going to be, but we're not as divided as we used to be," declared Lowery to a standing ovation.

Later at the L-P shareholders' meeting, Merlo was barraged with questions from the proxy-bearing workers, including the $2.4 million in salary, bonuses and stock option compensation he received last year.

Bigby spoke of the "human costs of the strike" and presented the union resolution calling on L-P to issue quarterly reports detailing the financial cost of the strike. Union officials have estimated that the strike so far has cost the company over $50 million in lost production and other expenses. They compare this to the $4.7 million cost over three years of the contract rejected by L-P.—(PAI).

supposed to be upholding the laws of the land, seeks to reverse the anti-discrimination laws and policies that have been won through lengthy struggles," Hutchinson said.

She charged that the Office of Federal Contract Compliance "has so watered down its regulatory guidelines that this important arm of anti-discrimination enforcement has lost its bite."

At the same time, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, dismisses cases that should be prosecuted, "and each new round of budget cuts undermines the staffing and functioning of the agency," she asserted.

Outlining the concerns of women in the workforce, Hutchinson noted that 18 of the 20 lowest-paid occupations are "overwhelmingly female," that women office workers typically earn less than men in the same classifications, and that women college graduates earn less on the average than men who have only completed high school.

With the economic policies of the Reagan Administration, she said, "women are the fastest-growing poverty group in America."

The Democratic Party should put the federal government "back in the business of fighting discrimination and inequality—rather than condoning and encouraging them," Hutchinson said, urging enactment of the Equal Rights Amendment.

It should seek legislation to bar discrimination in pensions and insurance and to correct the inequities of social security for homemakers and women with interrupted careers. The party should seek restoration of funding for AFDC, food stamps, Medicaid and day-care services, she recommended.

Hutchinson also called for an immigration policy to prevent exploitation "in ways that are fair to citizens and immigrants alike," including "strong penalties" against deliberate employment of illegal aliens as a means of bringing down labor standards.

Policy shift under Reagan leaves trail of hardship

A radical and "unconscionable" shift in national priorities during the Reagan Administration favoring the rich over the poor and an unprecedented military build-up over pressing domestic needs, has brought hardship to millions of Americans, a study by the State, County & Municipal Employees shows.

In the comprehensive program-by-program analysis of budget cuts made or proposed during the Reagan years, the union estimated that the cumulative reduction in social spending would exceed $88 billion if fiscal 1985 cuts submitted to Congress are included.

"The purpose of these spending cuts has not been to encourage more efficient or effective delivery of public services, or to reduce the overall size of government," AFSCME said.

"Instead, these huge cuts represent a departure from the basic role of government in our society."

The AFSCME report notes that reductions in federally supported state and local services—education, health services, employment and job training, income maintenance and human services, and infrastructure and economic development programs—amounted to $59 billion, while $29 billion was slashed in federal assistance to needy and elderly people.

"The pressing needs of citizens are no longer being met," AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee warned in a preface to the study. "Social programs are being abandoned with little concern or attention to the effects on people."

As a result of the Administration's actions, McEntee said, 493,000 families have been dropped from the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program, and one million participants have been terminated from the food stamps program, and 150,000 poor families have lost day care services.

Rising insecurity

With the shift in priorities, he noted, there has been an increase in economic insecurity for the average American, rising poverty, a less equitable tax system, a bloated military and a runaway federal deficit.

"These problems must be redressed," he said. "Lost tax revenues must be restored in a fair manner, based on ability to pay. Military spending must be restrained to affordable levels. Social programs must meet pressing needs.

"It is time that the excesses of the Reagan Administration be curbed, and that balance and equity, once again, guide our nation's priorities."

The report—titled "The States, the People, and the Reagan Years"—examines on a state-by-state basis the cuts in 172 individual federal aid programs to state and local governments, as well as in five major federal assistance programs to needy and elderly individuals.

Altogether, the programs considered in the study account for nearly 90 percent of all federal aid to state and local governments and 75 percent of all federal payments to the needy and elderly.

Many federally supported state and local programs have been cut more than 50 percent during the Reagan years, including the special milk program, juvenile justice assistance, Appalachian regional programs, economic development programs, job training, energy conservation and work incentives programs.

The most severe reduction in direct assistance to individuals has been the food stamps program, which was reduced nearly 6 percent. One million participants have been terminated from the program.

The AFSCME study proposed to curb the Administration's tax giveaways and excessive military spending and called for a better balance in the priorities of the federal government while reducing the huge federal budget deficits.

Limit defense spending

It also called for limiting increases in military spending to a "sensible" level that carefully weighs the security needs of the nation against the social and economic needs of society.

Fairness and simplicity should guide tax policies to restore lost revenues, the unproductive tax loopholes should be closed, effective corporate taxation of at least 25 percent should be insured, and regressive tax proposals rejected.

"A voice of reason is desperately needed now to put the nation on a more equitable and sensible course."

Coalition hits subminimum wage scheme

came to the Black Caucus news conference to affirm that the legislation would get nowhere in his panel.

Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten reiterated the AFL-CIO's continued strong opposiiton to any form of subminimum youth wage. The federation, he said, will be appearing before the Hawkins subcommittee later this month to declare its support for his youth employment training bill. That measure would fund a program of summer jobs and after-school work, linked to continued education.

Last year, the Administration touted a similar subminimum bill that would have applied to persons under the age of 22. The current version would cover only persons under 20 — in effect making it more profitable for employers to hire high school students for summer jobs than college students. But Donovan suggested that college students wouldn't want such low-level jobs anyway.

As proposed by the Administration, the subminimum wage would have a "sunset provision," and would expire in the fall of 1986, unless Congress renewed it.

Timing rationale

When asked why the Administration waited until mid-May to introduce its new bill—making highly unlikely that it can clear Congress—Donovan said time had been spent to build a "coalition" in support of the bill. With him were representatives of the black mayors' group, the Hispanic GI Forum, and the small business employer trade association.

Several members of the congressional caucus called on the black mayors' organization to reconsider its endorsement of a subminimum wage, and noted that a number of big city mayors did not take part in the decision. Others were on record only for a small-scale experimental program.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard earlier had written the naiton's black mayors urging repeal of the subminimum resolution.

"The logic of the subminimum is unsound," Pollard said, and basing wages on either age or race is "unacceptable."

Higher floor needed

Hawkins and other critics of the Administration proposal noted that the $3.35 wage floor has been so eroded by inflation that the Administration should be pressing to raise the minimum instead of looking for ways to reduce it.

Labor Sec. Donovan was asked at his news conference if the Administration would support a higher minimum wage if teenagers weren't included.

Whether or not the teenage minimum is reduced, Donovan said, the Administration has no plans to seek a higher minimum wage for adults. That might hold back economic recovery, he contended.

In the Senate, the Administration bill has been cosponsored by Labor Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.). Its House sponsor is Rep. Ronald C. Packard (R-Calif.), a first-termer whose COPE record for 1983 showed no right votes and 16 wrong votes.

to compete fairly in world marketplaces.

At the show itself, the exhibits included the AFL-CIO's own which stressed communications and services to unions and their members. Visitors could also view television programs produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO's video communications arm.

Advantages of union membership were explained at colorful booths staffed by members of the Office & Professional Employees and the State, County & Municipal Employees. An exhibit by the Teachers' Tennessee Organizing Project told of careers in teaching.

The spectacular range of quality products produced by American workers was the theme of the Steelworkers exhibit that included under its huge, floating "steeler" hardhat union-made goods ranging from vacuum bottle to travel trailers.

Focal point

Pride in the products and services provided by Machinists was the focal point of that union's exhibition where show visitors could take a close-up look at everything from IAM-made watches to IAM-made and serviced jet engines and spacecraft. And the labor movement's deep interest in service to the community was underscored with a live demonstration by a blind worker of how guide dogs are trained by International Guiding Eyes, founded by an IAM member.

"Tire-kickers" at the show were in their element at the Auto Workers' own miniature auto and aerospace show featuring the latest models of UAW-made cars and a scale model of the Challenger shuttle, backed up by films of the shuttle's spectacular ascent into space.

And back on earth, a wide range of exhibits by the Railway & Airline Clerks, the Maintenance of Way Employes, the Carmen and Signalmen showed how workers keep the railroads humming.

In the Food & Commercial Workers exhibit, showgoers tasted products made by the union's members while they watched a shoemaking demonstration, learned how to judge quality meat and poultry from meatcutters and participated in drawings for prizes from UFCW-represented retail stores. A highlight of the show was the Barbers & Beauticians Hair Fashion spectacular, a national competition for men's and women's union hairstylists.

The culinary arts were on display at the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees exhibit where employees of union hotels prepared gourmet dishes and shared the recipes with visitors.

And at the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers arena, a mouth-watering cake decorating demonstration was topped off by giveaways of the cakes and many free samples.

Craft and skill demonstrations are the highlight of every Union-Industries Show, including the one-of-a-kind exhibition of glass-blowing staged by the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers.

Show visitors stopped by the Ladies' Garment Workers booth to watch union members stitch together aprons made of special ILG print fabric, and to learn the words to the famous "Look for the Union Label" song.

Visitors could watch their own souvenirs come hot off the presses at the Graphic Communications Union exhibit and sign up for prize drawings of fine, etched glass products made by Flint Glass Workers.

After touring the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers display and getting a behind-the-scenes look at how mail is processed and delivered, visitors could mail a letter from the booth's working post office.

Skills on display

Pride in the products made by members was the focal point of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union exhibit which featured members' skills in making everything from yogurt to highly technical medical equipment.

A key theme of many show exhibits was apprenticeship and training, including the Sheet Metal Workers booth that sparkled with copper lanterns and other items made by apprentices and skilled craftsmen as prizes for show visitors. Plumbers & Pipefitters apprentices stressed the importance of using trained, union craftspeople as a guarantee of quality in construction.

The Carpenters booth detailed the skills of the union's members, and the Electrical Workers showed off their products and services from construction to top quality consumer goods to providing gas and light for homes through public utilities.

Fine furniture "Made in Memphis" was a keynote of the Furniture Workers booth, and the high quality of service to the community offered by Memphis fire fighters and paramedic units was showcased at the Fire Fighters exhibit where personnel were "on duty" to talk about fire safety and first aid.

Construction model

The Ironworkers brought their skills—usually performed "on high steel"—down to earth in an exhibit of intricate scale models of construction projects. In another example of just how important union members' skills are in American society, nurses who belong to the Service Employees provided free blood pressure screening to show visitors, along with information on the benefits of belonging to a union.

Without the skills of union members, the world would be a duller place, the Theatrical Stage Employes stressed in their "theater" featuring clips from popular movies and shows made possible by the many IATSE craftsmen.

And a variety of products made by union members was also the spice of the Allied Industrial Workers colorful exhibit, featuring everything from AIW-made toys to motorcycles.

Prizes and craftsmanship

The Rubber Workers exhibit pointed out the diversity of its members' union-made products in a display that included giveaways and prize drawings ranging from balloons to top-of-the-line tires. The Plasterers showcased their skills in an exhibit highlighting craftsmanship.

Seafarers not only sail ships, they also make a wide variety of fine food products, and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers not only bring in oil wells, they also make an array of consumer products, show visitors learned at the unions' exhibits.

The more than 300 exhibits in the show made the point that union members are behind many of the nation's finest products. The Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers, for example, showed off fine china, and members of the Molders explained how they make the highest quality cooking utensils. The Stove, Furnace Workers displayed union-made stoves and ovens, while the Upholsterers displayed comfortable union-made home furnishings.

Communications Workers urged visitors to "call and buy union" with an exhibit of union-made telephone equipment, sparked by demonstrations of services provided by highly trained, experienced operators and technicians.

Prize giveaways were a popular event staged by many show exhibitors, including the Boilermakers whose booth featured a game stressing workers are "winners" with their unions.

Variety of products

The Clothing & Textile Workers provided prizes of union-made clothes, and the Paperworkers coupled a demonstration of how paper is made with giveaways of useful paper products. Show visitors enjoyed the regular drawings held by the Grain Millers for huge sacks of union-made food products. They sampled many items made by the Chemical Workers while watching the union's "Magic of Chemistry" performed by Memphis's own famous magician, 97-year-old Harmon Baker.

With education a major theme, the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers division of the Boilermakers and the Firemen & Oilers provided visitors with information about their unions.

Exhibitors, including the United Garment Workers and the Electronic Workers, displayed products made by their members, while reminding visitors that the "union label" means jobs and living standards that benefit the nation.

Service Employees gain units of 11,000

The State Employees Association of New Hampshire and the California Faculty Association voted in separate special conventions to affiliate with the Service Employees, bringing in 11,000 members.

The New Hampshire convention voted overwhelmingly for the affiliation that had been backed unanimously by the association's executive board, the SEIU reported. Joan Dolloff, president of the 6,000-member group, will become a member of SEIU's executive board.

Delegates representing the 5,000 members of the California Faculty Association also delivered a strong vote for affiliation.

The CFA had been an affiliate of the California State Employees Association, a 70,000-member organization which earlier this year joined SEIU. The CFA represents the 19,000 faculty employees of the California state university system.

The SEIU said that during the past 18 months, it has increased its membership by more than 150,000 through the affiliation of established public employee unions to raise its membership to more than 850,000. In addition to the CSEA's affiliation earlier this year, the 60,000-member National Association of Government Employees joined the SEIU last year.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley, left, presents Sidney Hillman Foundation awards for journalism to Bob Wyrick and Patrick J. Owens of Newsday.

Works on social issues cited for Sidney Hillman Awards

New York—Reporters Patrick J. Owens and Bob Wyrick of Newsday received one of four Sidney Hillman Foundation Awards for communications. The honor marks the second win for Owens and the Long Island, N.Y., newspaper.

Owens and Wyrick received their prize for "The Disability Nightmare," a report which appeared in Newsday last year examining the Reagan Administration's attempts to drastically tighten eligibility regulations for social security disability benefits.

In 1961, Owens received a Hillman award for his editorials in the Pine Bluff, Ark., Commercial, and last year Newsday was honored for its series exposing book-banning efforts by a local school board.

Other winners at this year's 34th annual awards presentation—which honored work produced in 1983—include:

- Seymour M. Hersh for his book, "The Price of Power: Kissinger in the Nixon White House," an investigation into the conduct of foreign policy under President Nixon.

- Leslie Cockburn for her CBS television documentary, "The Pentagon Underground," an examination of defense spending and waste by the military services.

- Dr. Carl Sagan for his article in Foreign Policy magazine, "Nuclear War and Climactic Catastrophe: Some Policy Implications," an explanation of the long-term natural and social catastrophe likely to result from a nuclear war.

Honoring Hillman

The awards are presented annually as a memorial to Sidney Hillman, first president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. The honors were established to recognize and reward excellence in social issue journalism and social responsibility among print and electronic journalists and producers, authors, and commentators as well as programs and publications.

The awards, which included $750 prizes and scrolls, were presented by Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley at a luncheon in New York.

Judges for this year's competition were Edward P. Morgan, television commentator; Harrison E. Salisbury, correspondent and author; and Los Angeles Times reporter Sara Fritz.

Coordinated talks win union gains in Jersey lockout

Paterson, N.J.—The Okonite Company's 19-week lockout of 130 members of the Rubber Workers and the Operating Engineers here ended with the signing of a new three-year agreement.

Last fall, the company locked out members of URW Local 637 and IUOE Local 68, despite the members' willingness to work while negotiations continued. The company then cut off all insurance coverage for the workers.

The settlement, arrived at following negotiations by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. Coordinated Bargaining Committee, provides a 47-cent-an-hour wage increase the first year and a guaranteed 45 cents hourly in prepaid cost-of-living adjustments in the second and third years.

Additional payments are possible if the COLA formula generates more than 45 cents.

The settlement provides for joint negotiations by locals at the company's plants here and in Phillipsdale, R.I., and North Brunswick, N.J., and for a common expiration date.

Another joint bargaining group will embrace locals at plants in Ashton, R.I., Passaic, N.J., and Richmond, Ky. The locals belong to the URW, IUOE, Machinists and Electrical Workers.

The contract provides an early settlement for the locals in Phillipsdale and North Brunswick, whose contracts would have expired on May 1 and Aug. 31, respectively. Those members will receive the 47-cent hourly increase retroactive to Jan. 10, 1984.

The workers also gained an increase in pension benefits from $12 per month per year of service to $16, an added holiday and improvements in the health and life insurance plans.

Sweeney outlines plan

Organizing push set by Service Employees

Dearborn, Mich.—A 10-point agenda, including an expanded organizing push, streamlined administrative operations and expanded services to members was unveiled by Service Employees President John J. Sweeney at the union's 18th convention.

Sweeney said the program to restructure the union is designed to build on the substantial growth and progress the union has experienced over the last several years, and to make SEIU "the pre-eminent union in the labor movement in the coming years."

The action plan will be keyed to a "greatly expanded" organizing effort that will stress targeted campaigns and take advantage "of the shift in our economy from a manufacturing base to a service economy," Sweeney said in his keynote address.

He told the 612 delegates that organizing directors will be appointed for each major industry where SEIU has members. New organizers will be recruited and trained, particularly from the ranks of minority and female members, he said.

Corporate strategy

Sweeney said the SEIU plans to step up the use of so-called corporate campaign techniques against anti-union employers such as that used successfully in the union's joint effort with the Food & Commercial Workers to organize nursing homes owned by Beverly Enterprises, Inc.

Organizing targets, he said, will include the building services industry, hospitals, health care, public employees and clerical workers. Sweeney stressed that while the union will be mounting organizing campaigns nationwide, there will be an increased emphasis on efforts in Sunbelt states.

Sweeney said the union has plans to restructure its administrative staff and services. Key changes will include establishment of six industry divisions to serve building services, health care, public sector, clerical, professional and industrial and allied services workers.

In addition, he said, SEIU will open regional offices in the United States and Canada and establish a "Canadian desk" at its headquarters.

Other points of the program include expansion of field staff and administrative staff and providing greater computer capability for local unions.

Sweeney said the union will also broaden its communications, publications, safety and health programs and political action.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland commended the SEIU for its "growth and progress," which is "all the more extraordinary against the background of hard times in an anti-union atmosphere nurtured by an Administration hostile to workers."

Kirkland stressed that the labor movement "through this entire bleak period" has stood firm with its allies in the civil rights movement and "with retired people, with women, with the poor and the disadvantaged." Labor has "never yielded an inch in our affirmation of the goals of a humane society and the public interest," he asserted.

Organized labor's determination to maintain that role in society was the basis of the AFL-CIO's decision to endorse Walter Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination, Kirkland said. He stressed that the federation "never said or pretended that we could 'deliver' our membership to any political candidate."

Inform members

What the AFL-CIO said, Kirkland pointed out, was that it would inform union members on the issues and urge them to play a role in the political process.

The record is now clear, he said, that "where our members were fully informed and turned out in substantial numbers (for caucuses and primaries) they chose Walter Mondale, and they made a difference."

He told the delegates the labor movement is in the midst of a crucial election year in which "the size of the challenge is matched by the size of the opportunity . . . to make a very big difference in the shape of things to come for future generations."

The labor movement is united "as never before, and the spirit of solidarity is surging in our ranks," Kirkland said.

In a report to delegates Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz said the SEIU membership is now at 850,000—an increase of more than 35 percent since its latest convention four years ago.

AFL-CIO observer team finds El Salvador vote 'free, fair'

New York—El Salvador's runoff presidential election which put moderate Christian Democrat Jose Napoleon Duarte at the head of government was "free and fair, and representative of the will of the Salvadoran people," an AFL-CIO observer team declared.

"We saw this election as a significant, even definitive, step in the process of creating democracy in El Salvador," President Edward J. Cleary of the New York State AFL-CIO reported at a news conference attended by Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Other members of the observer team were Deputy Executive Director Sam Haddad of the federation's American Institute for Free Labor Development, Assistant Director Edward Collins of the AFL-CIO's western region, and Eugenia Kemble, director of the federation's Free Trade Union Institute. They were joined by special AFL-CIO representative Anne P. Morton, Chairman Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador Angier Biddle Duke, who represented the Appeal of Conscience Foundation.

Morton is the widow of Mark Pearlman, one of two AIFLD staff members shot to death three years ago while working on El Salvador's land reform program.

Cleary said the May 6 runoff election showed marked improvement over the initial election on Mar. 25 in that the military "stayed in the background" and voters seemed far more relaxed and confident about going to the polls despite sporadic leftist guerrilla attacks.

President-elect Duarte's opponent in the voting was ultra-rightist candidate Roberto d'Aubuisson, who stepped down as president of the nation's Constituent Assembly to run for the office. Duarte, who was officially declared the winner May 11, received about 54 percent of the total vote cast.

Machinists voting on 3-year accord with aircraft firm

St. Louis—The Machinists scheduled a vote on a new three-year contract with McDonnell Douglas Corp., for May 20, after reaching tentative agreement on terms covering 9,600 employees at its aircraft plant here.

The accord, which was reached May 12, the day before the old agreement expired, follows the pattern of the company's settlements with IAM and the Auto Workers at its West Coast facilities.

Chief IAM bargainer Cassell Williams said the new agreement does not boost pay rates but provides lump-sum payments equal to 3 percent of pay each year. Continued full cost-of-living coverage would be restricted to the highest paid 75 percent of the workforce, and new employees would receive lower rates of pay.

For workers in the highest pay grades, adjustments would amount to 5 cent per hour, and certain employees in classifications that have been merged would get an additional 16- or 17-cent raise, Williams said.

Under the agreement, employees will be required to make contributions to a new health insurance plan. They would begin paying $2 a week for single coverage and $4 for family coverage. These amounts would rise by 20 cents each year.

Pension improvements include the return of all employee contributions to the plan before 1969, when it became fully employer-paid. That would amount to $10 million for the IAM unit and up to $5,600 a member, Williams said. The basic monthly benefit would increase from $15 a year of past and future service to $17 a year for past service and $20 for future service.

Other provisions include an increase in life insurance coverage and an improved savings plan.

Study questions tax breaks for 'high tech' firms

By James M. Shevis

A comprehensive study of "high tech" industry from a labor point of view challenges the wisdom of pouring more public resources into its development without greater accountability to taxpayers.

"It is by no means clear that the high technology industry has repaid the public sector's investment in its economic welfare," a new report by the High Tech Research Group concluded.

The group of university and union researchers have made the first systematic examination of the validity of the industry's demands for greater public funding.

Directed by James A. Parrott, an economist with the Ladies' Garment Workers, and funded by five unions and other organizations, the report focuses on Massachusetts. The high concentration of high tech firms there has made the state one of the nation's two leading centers of the industry. But the study carries implications for the nation as a whole, the researchers said.

From its beginnings, the high tech industry has relied on taxpayers' money, the study noted. Government military contracts funded the development of technologies and prototype products. Public education has provided a highly educated and skilled work force, and public money at state and local levels has been used to lure high tech firms.

In Massachusetts, where high tech electronics manufacturing became the dominant industry in the late 1970s, localities have bent over backward to accommodate the industry, providing industrial parks, tax breaks, low-rate loans, funding for research and development and other benefits paid for by taxpayers, the study showed.

Questionable investment

But the study questions whether the state's citizens are getting a fair return on their investment and whether they should continue to support the industry.

While the rapid growth of the industry from 1976 to 1981 has been partly responsible for the state's comparatively low unemployment rates, the industry's need for special, favorable public policy initiatives has not been proven, the report observed.

"The lack of accountability to public interest characteristic of private sector decisions about investment and employment location permits particular firms and industries to act without regard for the social consequences of these actions," the researchers said.

Led by the powerful Massachusetts High Technology Council, an association of prominent high tech firms, the industry succeeded in its drive to lower taxes when it financed the campaign to pass Proposition 2½ in Massachusetts, for example.

But the effect of tax breaks for the industry has been counter-productive to Massachusetts citizens, the study found, citing evidence that the Prop 2½ cuts helped the already thriving high tech firms at the expense of other industries and other constituents.

The new report on high tech will be used by state labor and other progressive groups to counter the industry's efforts to kill plant closing legislation, reduce business taxes and to obstruct important social legislation. Parrott said the report can also be used to help organize workers in the industry.

The distribution of earnings in the industry is dramatically polarized between highly paid company executives and engineers and those in lower clerical and production levels, the study points out.

Highest paid

For instance, executives in the largest firms received average compensation of $221,000 in 1982, and, along with a handful of rich shareholders, they benefited the most from rapid stock equity increases in the 1980s, the study shows.

The group also found significant health and safety hazards in some high tech production work, which it attributed in part to the fact that the industry tends to be non-union.

Copies of the report, titled "Massachusetts High Tech: The Promise and the Reality," can be ordered from the High Tech Research Group, P.O. Box 441001, Somerville, Mass. 02144, at $8.00 per copy.

Court backs Longshoremen on containerized cargo rules

Richmond, Va.—The Longshoremen scored a clear-cut victory in their protracted legal battle to protect members' rights to handle containerized cargo as the 4th U.S. Court of Appeals upheld a National Labor Relations Board decision backing rules governing the work.

The unanimous decision by a three-judge panel went even further than the NLRB did in its finding early last year, affirming the validity of the provisions in their entirety. The board had made two exceptions.

The negotiated provisions give the union's membership the right to load or unload all container cargo within 50 miles of an Atlantic or Gulf Coast port where the ILA has a contract with shipping management groups.

Reviewing a group of nine cases on appeal from the NLRB decision, the Richmond court agreed with the board that ILA's primary objective was to preserve work threatened by containerization rather than to acquire work previously performed away from the piers by non-union members.

The rules have been the subject of a decade of legal challenges. They were developed in the late 1960s in response to the advent of mobile cargo containers.

Shipping companies which owned or leased the containers allowed owners of the cargo, truckers, and warehousemen to load or unload the containers away from the pier, and the practice threatened to severely reduce the volume of work available for ILA members.

In its decision, the court reversed the NLRB's ruling last year that application of the rules to "shortstopping"—the loading and unloading of full shippers' loads by truckers within the 50-mile radius—and to warehouse operations not performed by ILA members amounted to an unlawful secondary boycott.

Supporting evidence

The court said it found "substantial evidence" to support the NLRB finding that the union had a primary work preservation objective in negotiating the container rules in a collective bargaining contract, pointing out that the rules "seek to preserve work traditionally performed by the bargaining unit. . . .

"The rules grant them the right in certain instances to load cargo piece by piece into containers and unload it piece by piece from containers. In short, containerization has simply changed the locus of the work, moving the operation shoreward."

Candidates focus on final round of state primaries

Gary Hart's "western strategy" helped him to primary victories in Oregon and Nebraska, where his rivals did little campaigning. But delegate pickups in both states plus a gain in the second round of Alaska's caucuses carried Walter F. Mondale a step closer to the Democratic presidential nomination.

At latest tally, the UPI press service showed 1,564 delegates who have declared for Mondale, 941 for Hart and 291 for Jesse Jackson.

With only a Utah primary intervening, the focus of the campaign shifted to California and New Jersey—the largest delegate prizes in the five-state windup of the primary season on June 5.

All three candidates campaigned for the support of California's Mexican American Political Association, but the endorsement went to Mondale.

Uninsured health epidemic

Added to other evidence that the Reagan Recession has severely damaged the nation, a study by the Urban Institute revealed that there are now about 38.6 million Americans—that's 19 percent of the population—who don't have health insurance.

The institute lays the blame largely on the recession, pointing out that between 1979 and 1982 the number of uninsured Americans rose by 9.9 million.

Katherine Swartz, senior research associate for the institute, told a Senate health subcommittee that while the 1981-82 recession is the chief culprit in the dropoff in protection, changes in employer attitudes toward health care benefits have hurt, too.

Many families have dropped health insurance rather than pay out-of-pocket for higher premiums or co-payments as employers have cut benefits, Swartz testified. She predicted that employers are not likely to restore the benefits even if the economy improves.

Swartz also disputed a 1983 Reagan Administration study that claimed that only a small portion of the unemployed don't have health insurance.

The conclusions are faulty today because they are based on outdated 1977 data, Swartz said. In 1977, she pointed out, the economy was in a recovery period and many of the unemployed were chiefly secondary wage earners. But by 1982, with the economy in a deep recession, most of those who lost their jobs were principal wage earners.

Kirkland cites import costs in empty steel mills, lost jobs

The United States can't afford to become dependent on foreign suppliers for its steel, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed in testimony before the International Trade Commission.

Kirkland's testimony supported the joint petition by the Steelworkers and Bethlehem Steel Corp. for a temporary curb on imports that have wiped out jobs and forced the shutdown of steel mills. Earlier, Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel also joined USWA and industry officials in urging import restraints.

Steel imports have nearly doubled over the past 10 years, Kirkland noted, and plant closings last year reduced the industry's production capability by more than 14 million tons.

Kirkland told the ITC that the workers displaced by imports are "proud, productive men and women . . . who have spent their lives in an industry that has literally built America."

There is no comfort for them in "explanations that try to brush under the table the real damage from imports," Kirkland said. "They live in the present, and their present consists of empty mills and unemployment."

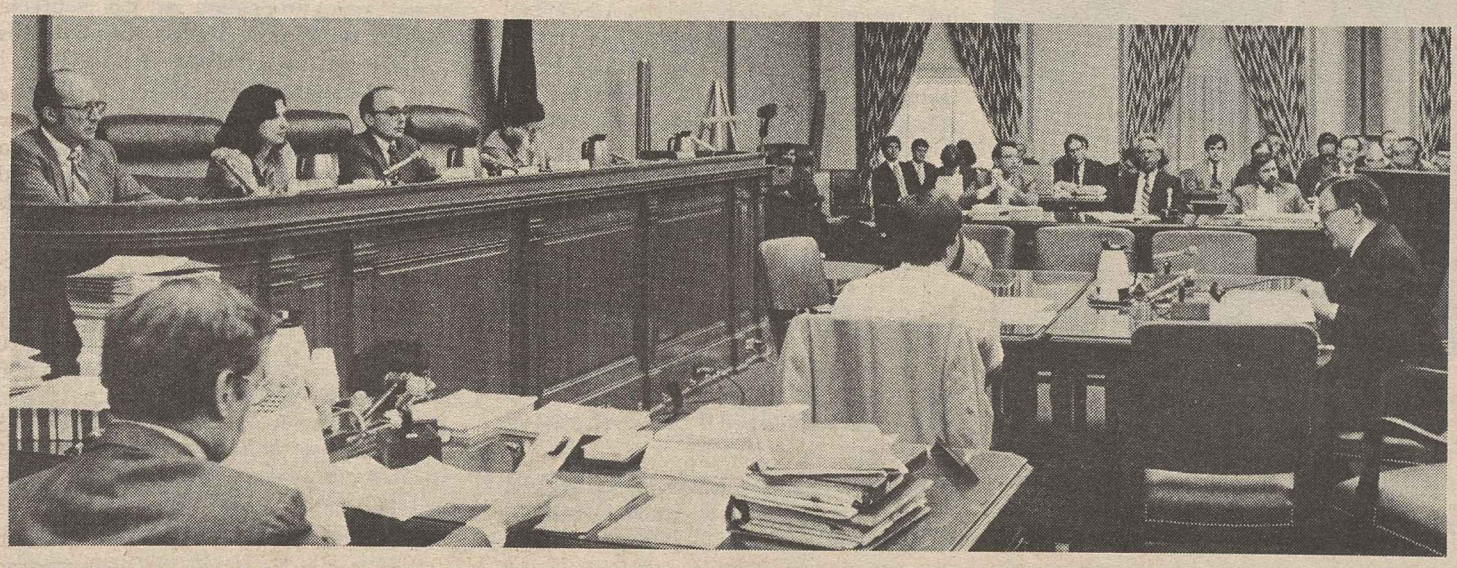
Foreign subsidies

Kirkland noted that the steel production facilities of other nations are either government-owned or government-supported, with financing for modernization provided on favorable terms. Sometimes the subsidies are even more direct.

"The capability to produce steel is central to the strength of the United States," Kirkland stressed. "From both a national security and overall economic perspective, steel production provides the necessary foundation for a strong and growing America," he said.

Samuel told the ITC that its decision on import relief "will have an effect on the nature of American society and help determine whether a large part of our population must abandon the American dream."

Steel is the key to the nation's industrial base, Samuel testified, and without an industrial base, "the nation cannot provide millions of workers jobs at decent pay."



Trade Commission hears Lane Kirkland urge curbs on steel imports that have wiped out jobs.

Pacts ratified at five hotels in Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Nev.—Bartenders, musicians and stagehands at five major hotel-casions ratified new four-year agreements with employers, and culinary and hotel service workers are also expected to approve terms recommended by their bargaining committee.

Members of the four local unions have gone back to work at the Las Vegas and Flamingo Hiltons, Caesars Palace, Western and El Cortez hotels, and the ratifications will formally end a walkout against those employers that began April 2.

But there has been no movement in negotiations with 20 other hotels where more than 10,000 workers are still on strike. Most of the holdout employers are members of the Nevada Resort Association.

The workers won some relief, however, when an appeals court eased tough terms of a temporary restraining order that local police had used in arresting more than 800 union pickets.

The ruling makes it harder for police to charge picketers with criminal violations. Instead, infringements of the restraining order will be considered civil infractions.

The new four-year agreements were reached with the five hotels by Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 165 and Local 226, Musicians Local 369 and Stage Employees Local 720 after the employers began negotiating separately with the unions—stepping out from behind hardline takeaway demands pressed by the employers' association which had been bargaining for them.

Earlier agreements

Earlier, 30 hotels had agreed to the new pacts, many without being struck.

The focus of bargaining has turned to the MGM Grand Hotel, the largest of the holdouts. Union negotiators said the resort association led by MGM Grand has refused to change its bargaining stance.

The employers are demanding a five-year agreement with a no-strike clause and a wage package substantially lower than that agreed to by the signed employers in four-year contracts, the unions reported. More than 40 other issues are also unresolved.

To help press the MGM Grand toward a settlement, the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. launched a national campaign to highlight the financial dealings and interlocking directorates between the hotel-casino and MGM/UA Entertainment. The companies share seven directors.

FAST President Robert F. Harbrant said the campaign will include an effort to remove the directors and to urge securities analysts to persuade investors not to buy MGM Grand stock.

Organized labor's role cited in job aid for handicapped

Assuring that handicapped and disabled persons who want to work are able to participate fully in the nation's workforce and in society is of deep concern to the American labor movement, winners of the national "Ability Counts" essay contest for high school students were told.

Everett Lehmann, director of special programs for the Electrical Workers, said that through its overall employment, safety and health policies and directly through the collective bargaining process, organized labor works for employment of handicapped and disabled workers.

Lehmann, representing AFL-CIO Vice President Charles H. Pillard who is a member of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, stressed that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates are firmly pledged to cooperative efforts with employers, government and organizations of disabled people to make sure that handicapped Americans have full access to job training and placement programs.

The essay contest winners, their families and a number of their teachers were the guests of the AFL-CIO at an awards luncheon held during the annual meeting of the President's Committee. AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller chairs the committee's labor panel.

Elizabeth Tunney, legislative representative of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and a vice chair of the President's Committee, also attended the awards luncheon.

The students' trips to Washington for the awards ceremony were paid for by the AFL-CIO and its state federations.

The five national essay contest winners, along with 25 other state winners, wrote on the theme, "Employers or Employees: Disabled People Working." The five top winners shared $6,500 in cash scholarships donated by the Disabled American Veterans.

First prize of $2,000 went to Lisa Powel of Dale City, Va. Second prize of $1,500 went to Abel Montez of Roswell, N.M.; third prize of $1,250 to Julie Reimann of Idaho Falls, Idaho; fourth prize of $1,000 to Jacquelyn Howard of Andalusia, Ala., and fifth prize of $750 to Robyn M. Wampler of Helena, Mont.

Shipbuilding goals linked to broader policy

A revitalized shipbuilding and maritime program should be made an integral part of the nation's industrial policy, AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons urged in a statement submitted to the House Merchant Marine subcommittee.

Lyons, president of the Iron Workers, presented the views of the AFL-CIO in the statement supporting the goals of a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.).

The Biaggi bill provides a financing mechanism to facilitate construction of American-flag vessels in U.S. shipyards. It would establish a Maritime Redevelopment Bank that could make loans, loan guarantees and investments backed by ship mortgages.

Its concept is similar to the financing provisions of the labor-endorsed industrial strategy bill that has been approved by the House Banking Committee and is awaiting action by the full House.

Lyons said the AFL-CIO believes that a special maritime industrialization program should be part of a broad national industrial policy. But "until such time as the more comprehensive program is enacted," Lyons said, "it would be an appropriate, important step forward to proceed with a separate program."

Industrial policy

If it should be enacted first, he said, such a program could later be combined with an industrial policy measure.

Lyons told the subcommittee that the organizational structure to deal with maritime industry problems requires representation from management and labor in the shipbuilding and shipping industries, along with government representation. Government participation would include the Maritime Administration and the Navy.

He said such a council would have the assignment of determining the nation's shipbuilding and ship repair needs "within the context of the U.S. position as a leading economic, political and military power."

Economy sends out mixed signals

The economy seesawed amid signs that economists found ominous, particularly lingering pockets of double-digit unemployment, rising interest rates, and a sharp rise in consumer debt.

While the Reagan Administration hailed last month's 2.9-percent surge in retail sales, analysts said it could mean added pressure on already increasing interest rates. Much of the growth in retail sales in April was due to "big ticket" items bought on credit. Financing these items could exacerbate competition between the government and business for funds and tighten credit still more.

Another Commerce Dept. report, on housing, was greeted similarly with mixed feelings. While starts of new housing rebounded 19.3 percent in April after a record 27-percent drop in March, higher mortgage interest rates are causing an abrupt drop in sales, and builders' expectations for the rest of this year also are down.

Building permits, an indication of builders' plans for this summer, slipped one-tenth of 1 percent in April, despite the month's big increase in actual construction.

High jobless rates

Meanwhile, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that 11 states, plus the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, still had unadjusted jobless rates of 10 percent or more in March. West Virginia led the states with 16 percent, followed by Michigan, with 12.5 percent, and Alabama and Alaska with 12.2 percent each. Puerto Rico's rate was 21.6 percent.

Other states with double-digit unemployment in March were Illinois, 10.6 percent; Indiana, 10.5 percent; Kentucky, 10 percent; Mississippi, 10.3 percent; Ohio, 10.6 percent; Oregon, 10.7 percent, and Washington, 10.7 percent. The District of Columbia had a rate of 11.8 percent.

Among metropolitan areas, McAllen-Pharr-Edinburg, Tex., reported the highest rate, 24.9 percent. Laredo, Tex., had a jobless rate of 21.2 percent, while Modesto, Calif., was next with 20.7 percent.

In other economic reports, the Federal Reserve Board said consumers took out $5.87 billion more in installment debt than they paid off in March despite a sharp drop in auto loans. It was the second highest increase ever. The record of $6.61 billion was set in February.

Industrial production continued to climb, rising 1.4 percent in April, the Fed said in a separate report. The jump was almost three times the March increase.

The large increase in factory output marked the 17th consecutive monthly increase, and nearly matched January's 1.5-percent rise. Production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities rose a modest five-tenths of 1 percent in March.

Wholesale prices, frequently a harbinger of prices at the retail level, were unchanged in April from March, BLS said. A steep six-tenths-of-1-percent decline in food prices was offset by a 2.9-percent jump in gasoline prices and prices for other finished goods.

Dick Howard retires from Labor newspaper

Veteran labor editor Richard C. Howard retired Apr. 30 after 26 years with Labor Newspaper, published by 17 railroad unions.

Howard, who served as secretary-treasurer of the Labor Cooperative Educational & Publishing Society which publishes the paper, has been a member of the Railroad Signalmen since 1940. He was editor of the Signalmen's Journal for ten years prior to joining Labor.

Howard also has served as chairman of the Association of Railway Labor Editors, and as a vice president and president of the International Labor Press Association.

Succeeding Howard at Labor is Calvin C. Bevins, a former vice president of the Railway Carmen.

EDITORIALS

There He Goes Again

THE CASE the Administration has tried to make for its subminimum youth wage proposal is flimsy at best. But the arguments made for it would be somewhat less suspect if President Reagan hadn't repeatedly expressed his distaste for the entire concept of the wage-hour law.

Just last December, the President complained that "a lot of our ills are due to the minimum wage." The "very least we should do," he told a group of editors, is to enact "a lower minimum wage for young people."

On another occasion, Mr. Reagan suggested that doing away with the minimum wage law would be "the right thing to do." But since it wasn't likely Congress would go along, he was prepared to accept a "half-loaf" in the form of a subminimum youth wage from May through September.

Given this background, Congressman Hawkins was on sound ground in suggesting that the Administration's new push for a lower wage floor for teens was merely "the opening wedge" in an Administration attack on all wage standards. And some mayors who have been able to discover virtue in the Administration proposal to drop the pay floor when hiring workers under the age of 20 would be well advised to take a closer look at the philosophy behind it.

The youth subminimum proposal is hardly new. It has been pushed by fast-food restaurant chains and their congressional allies for some years.

WHEN HE FIRST took office, Labor Sec. Donovan demonstrated commendable coolness toward the proposal by Senate Labor Committee Chairman Hatch to allow employers to pay workers under age 20 only 75 percent of the minimum wage.

It wouldn't be a "cure-all for youth unemployment," Donovan noted. It would be difficult to avoid abuse and existing law already allowed employers to start students at 85 percent of the minimum wage in after-school jobs and summer employment.

Besides, he would want to "carefully review" the report by the congressionally established Minimum Wage Study Commission that was due shortly.

Well, the commission did make its report and concluded that a lower wage for teenagers conflicts with the purpose of the Fair Labor Standards Act and contradicts the principle of equal pay for equal work.

But now, Sen. Hatch's bill is the Administration bill, and Mr. Donovan hails it as the answer to youth unemployment.

Perhaps the Secretary of Labor should somewhat more "carefully" review that minimum wage study for which he was waiting.

An Escape Hatch

HIGH INTEREST rates can reverse the nation's painfully slow economic recovery and add to an already huge trade imbalance.

So it's not surprising that Administration officials have been sniping at the tight-money policies of the Federal Reserve Board that have contributed to the latest spurt in bank interest rates and in the cost of Treasury borrowing.

Nor is it surprising that the Fed looks askance at the fiscal recklessness of a President who insists on the combination of huge tax cuts and big increases in military spending.

There is a recourse the Reagan Administration has shunned in the past that at least offers an emergency escape hatch from the dilemma it may soon face.

That's a revival of the Credit Control Act, which would allow the President and the Fed to regulate credit by curtailing its use for non-productive purposes such as corporate takeovers. The intent would be to make funds available at reasonable rates for housing and job-creating investment.

The Administration let the standby control authority expire two years ago. That was a mistake. But fortunately, it is still correctible.

Asbestos risk time bomb still ticking in classrooms

By Press Associates, Inc.

When disease epidemics hit the United States in the past, it wasn't difficult to recognize a health emergency. Cholera, typhoid, polio and influenza brought down their victims swiftly, with an iron grip of death-threatening symptoms.

Recently, a school superintendent proclaimed a health emergency and closed a high school in Wappingers Falls, N.Y., for the rest of the academic year. None of the school's 1,750 students had died or even displayed so much as a fever.

But the health hazard that shut the school was no less an emergency than well-known killer diseases—it was asbestos.

Dr. Irving J. Selikoff, director of the Environmental Sciences Laboratory at the Mt. Sinai School of Medicine and an expert on asbestos-related diseases, used the example of this high school to stress the health emergency that asbestos poses for the nation.

The danger at the school was real, Selikoff told an Environmental Protection Agency hearing in Washington, because of asbestos's "iron grip of latency." Only one asbestos fiber lodged at one microscopic site can produce lung and other cancers 20 or 30 years from the time the fiber was inhaled or ingested.

Body count

The hearing was the result of a Service Employees petition to the EPA to issue a rule requiring an estimated 14,000 schools nationwide to get rid of asbestos hazards. The union could wait no longer for federal action. It was starting to count bodies.

A school custodian for 30 years in Boston died from the lung disease asbestosis. A teacher who later became a school administrator in Stamford, Conn., died at age 52 from mesothelioma, a cancer of the stomach and lung lining caused by asbestos. The SEIU president of a Chicago school custodians local with 8,000 members reported his local has a severe lung cancer epidemic.

The SEIU estimates that 3.2 million children and 650,000 employees currently are exposed to asbestos in schools. Asbestos was sprayed in schools as a fire retardant, insulator and materials reinforcer from the end of World War II until the EPA banned it in public buildings in 1973.

The EPA currently requires only that schools investigate asbestos hazards and report findings to parents and teachers. After that, the agency relies on schools to voluntarily clean up hazards.

Louis Kitchen of AFSCME Local 4 in Ohio told of an asbestos removal project where asbestos dust was blown onto cafeteria food eaten by children and school employees.

Local funding problem

The unions also described efforts of teachers and parents to get asbestos hazards removed which became mired in state and local jurisdiction mazes leading nowhere. Even when school districts make good faith efforts to identify asbestos hazards, they said, the costs, estimated at more than $1.4 billion nationwide, have stymied clean-up action by poor school districts.

All of the union representatives testifying at the EPA hearing reached similar conclusions on actions that must be taken immediately to fight the asbestos health disaster. The EPA must first require schools to get rid of asbestos hazards, spell out safe removal and containment procedures and enforce the rules.

Second, the federal government should provide help for those school districts that cannot shoulder the costs alone. Bills pending in Congress that provide loans and grants to schools to help investigate and remove asbestos hazards from schools must be passed and funds appropriated.

Anything short of these actions only compounds the shame the nation must bear for exposing millions of children and workers to high cancer risks from asbestos.

MEMO FROM COPE

CON — Or: How Long Will So Many Buy the Baloney That Humane Programs Failed? They Didn't

Government is the problem, not the solution. Right? (This wisdom, courtesy of Ronald Reagan.)

There are more poor now than when the war on poverty began in the 1960s. Right? (Courtesy same gentleman.)

Let's turn loose the good old private sector; that'll solve little matters like hunger and poverty. Right? (Ibid—that's Latin for same guy.)

How long are we going to keep buying this con? Not just Ronald Reagan's, but the con of a lot of Republicans . . . and a lot of Democrats, too, who are running away from some of the most humane laws on the books that their own party put there.

The con—and it's been going on for years—is that all those people-serving programs enacted in the early 1960s just drain taxpayers of money without accomplishing much.

That Ronald Reagan was elected President is ample evidence that years of repetition of this con have given it a certain credibility with a lot of Americans. In fact, a CBS/New York Times poll in November 1980 (the month in which Reagan was elected President) found that 62 percent of Americans believed anti-poverty programs haven't helped the poor and even made things worse for them.

There's an old line about the press: No amount of back-page truth can offset a front-page lie. And it is true that charges against people-helping programs, being more dramatic, make Page One, while defenses of them, being less dramatic, are found deep inside.

But there are such defenses, and some very convincing ones. A recent one appeared in the Washington Post, written by Spencer Rich who covers federal programs for the paper. Rich defends the anti-poverty programs of the Lyndon Johnson era . . . and does it with fact, not rhetoric.

His conclusion: "A much smaller percentage of Americans live below the poverty level today than when the efforts to attack the problem got underway in earnest." (This, despite Reaganism's substantial addition to the ranks of the poor.)

Reagan himself has charged that there were actually fewer living in poverty in the early 1960s than since, but Rich uses Reagan's own budget director David Stockman to knock that one down. Stockman said last November: "Substantial progress has been made in the last 23 years in reducing poverty . . . (it) is not nearly as extensive as it was at the outset of the war on poverty."

The probability is that Stockman knows more about it than Reagan, and the Census Bureau backs up Stockman, anyway. It points out the poverty rate was 22.4 percent in 1959. That figure dropped rapidly under the impact of wide-ranging Johnson programs to 17.3 percent in 1965 and between 11 and 12 percent in the 1970s.

Then, along came Ronald Reagan and the poverty rate climbed back to 15 percent.

Rich makes the point that standards of measuring poverty have remained the same throughout this period, so there is nothing new to skewer the figures under Reagan. Rich says, "poverty covers anyone whose cash income from all sources is less than three times the cost of an adequate diet as defined by the government. In 1982, a family of four with income below $9,862 was considered poor."

Rich cites a study by the House that demonstrates that one in every four Americans would be below the poverty level if it weren't for the federal programs in place to reduce poverty, compared with the actual figure of one in seven.

In other words, the number of poor would be almost doubled.

The number of Americans for whom people-helping programs keep poverty at bay is put at 23 million. In the case of the elderly, without these programs 55 percent would be living in poverty, an additional 14-16 million of them. That figure, too, is from Reagan's own David Stockman.

As if Stockman's perfidy were not enough, Reagan also is contradicted in his charges against anti-poverty programs by Martin Anderson, formerly the Administration's expert on social welfare, who says the welfare system is a "smashing, total success."

The program on which Stockman's and Anderson's positions are based are the major cash benefit programs: social security, welfare and unemployment. But if you factor in the non-cash benefits, Rich says, like food stamps, housing aid and medical assistance, the poverty rate goes down further.

If non-cash benefits were included in measuring the poverty rate, that rate would fall from the present 15 to 10-11 percent, according to the Census Bureau, and it would have been down to the six percent range in the pre-Reagan 1970s.

But these are all programs Reagan has cut ($110 billion) and is determined to cut more if he is elected to a second term. He seems unable to acknowledge, or tolerate, their success.

How successful they actually have been can be measured by imagining what it would be like if the programs were wiped out, all of them for people of all ages. Rich cites some experts:

"There would be a lot of starvation," says Henry Aaron, economist at the Brookings Institution.

Dr. Jacob A. Brody, associate director of the government's National Institute on Aging, says experts agree that the health of the aged has improved in recent years, with higher life-expectancies and, beginning shortly after Medicaid (which now covers 30 million Americans), "an astonishing decline" in death rates.

"I don't think there can be any doubt that Medicare is a factor in improving the health of the aged."

For example, "lowering blood pressure is one of the very potent life-prolongers" and Medicare treats the elderly for that. Since Medicare, blacks, who as a group tend to suffer more than others from high blood pressure, "are going to doctors" to treat it.

Cataract operations, cancer surgery, pneumonia treatment—all these life-preserving or life-enhancing treatments and many more are now available to many older people who once couldn't obtain them.

But you don't need experts, just your own common sense.

Without food stamps, millions of Americans would be hungry and/or malnourished (millions were before food stamps, that's why the program was enacted.) Without health programs, millions would suffer, as they did before health programs. Without housing aid, additional millions would be slum-ridden, as they were before housing programs.

The entire spectrum of people-serving programs is there because there was a demonstrable and deep need, not because a bunch of bleeding-heart-do-good-tax-and-tax-spend-and-spend-milk-of-human-kindness Democrats (and some Republicans) wanted a monument to themselves.

Rich concludes about the programs Reagan ridicules and is dead set on reducing further:

"So the secret is out. What we are buying with all these programs is a vast reduction in poverty, misery and sickness. Whatever the cost of these programs has been, it must be acknowledged that they have changed the American social landscape for the better. They have moved the country closer to its own lofty ideals of a society compassionate to the disadvantaged, as well as rewarding to the fortunate."

One Vote Counts!

If you're one of those sourpusses who grumps around at election time and snarls that one vote doesn't count, don't try to tell that to Kent Hance, Lloyd Doggett and Robert Krueger. They'll tear your toenails out.

The three just came through the Democratic U.S. Senate primary in Texas. Krueger got 453,600 votes, which was 1,161 votes short of Doggett's 454,761, which in turn was 1,076 short of Hance's 455,837.

Less than a percentage point separated the three out of a total of more than 1.4 million.

Krueger, of them all, would be miffed if you tried to tell him one vote doesn't count. The former House member lost a Senate race to outgoing Sen. John Tower in 1978 by fewer than 20,000 out of three million-plus votes.

Conservative Democrat Hance, a U.S. House member, and State Sen. Doggett will face each other in a run-off primary June 2. The winner goes against ultra-conservative Democrat-turned-Republican Rep. Phil Gramm who handily won the GOP primary.

Odds 'n Ends

IF YOU'VE BEEN waiting on edge of your chair for results of the annual "most admired conservative" contest run by right-wing czar Richard Viguerie's Conservative Digest magazine, here they are: Most admired conservatives in Congress (in order of admiration)—Sen. Jesse Helms (N.C.), Rep. Jack Kemp (N.Y.), Rep. Phil Crane (Ill.), Sen. Jeremiah Denton (Ala.), Rep. Henry Hyde (Ill.), Rep. Ron Paul (Texas), Sen. Bill Armstrong (Colo.), Sen. Orrin Hatch (Utah), Sen. John East (N.C.), Rep. Phil Gramm (Texas).

Most admired not in Congress: President Reagan; Moral Majority leader Rev. Jerry Falwell; Paul Weyrich, head of Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress; Howard Phillips, chief of Conservative Caucus; publisher William Buckley; writer Pat Buchanan; former Interior Secretary James Watt; millionaire Lewis Lehrmann; ex-Rep. Robert Dornan (Calif.); John Birch Society founder Robert Welch. Most admired conservative woman is (who else?) Phyllis Schlafly.

SLOGAN FOR REAGAN campaign apparently has been selected: "Leadership You Can Trust." It will blossom on Reagan-Bush posters to be unveiled soon, according to press reports. It doesn't spell out what you can trust this leadership to do, just leaves it to the eye of the beholder.

IT WAS BOUND TO HAPPEN, as national right-wing leaders hop on, and try to grab reins of, anti-tax bandwagon started six months ago in Michigan. Some folks there used state income tax increase as peg for recall election against two state senators, both Democrats, who supported boost. Recalls succeeded, Republicans won both special elections, took control of state senate. Now, you can look for right-wingers to use recall tactic in any state where tax increase comes up, is passed. Richard Viguerie is chairman, Howard Phillips vice-chairman, of Populist Conservative Tax Coalition, which will organize new "tax revolts."

BIG PUSH on absentee voting planned by both political parties this year as result of hugely successful Republican effort in California in 1982—a campaign credited with winning state's gubernatorial election for George Deukmejian over Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley. Bradley had 20,000-vote edge among those who voted election day, but Deukmejian ran up a 113,000-vote margin among absentee voters. California GOP had mailed 2.6 million special packets on absentee voting, covering all households with at least one registered Republican.

New hotel pacts add to pressure on holdouts

Las Vegas, Nev.—Proposed agreements between striking culinary workers and bartenders and 13 more hotel-casinos on the glittering Las Vegas Strip gave momentum to bargaining as organized labor planned to step up the pressure against management.

Members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Locals 165 and 226 balloted May 24 on five-year contract proposals with the 13 properties, while talks shifted to the Stage Employees and Musicians. All the unions kept up their picketing in line with their "all-or-none" code of staying out until all have acceptable agreements.

The tentative settlements are with MGM Grand, Tropicana, Union Plaza, Mint, Showboat, Golden Gate, and five hotels owned by the Summa Corp.—the Sands, Frontier, Castaways, Desert Inn and Four Queens. They were announced May 21 after a weekend of marathon talks between HERE negotiators and the Nevada Resort Association. Two days later, similar agreements were reached with the Las Vegas Club and the Holiday Inn/Center Strip.

Eight holdouts

Eight resorts employing about 2,000 culinary workers and bartenders—but no musicians or stagehands—were still holding out. None of the eight has casinos on the Strip, but are located in downtown Las Vegas and outlying areas of the city.

The resorts association, which negotiates for the richest Las Vegas hotel-casinos, forced the strike Apr. 2 with its union-busting campaign to exact concessions and unacceptable demands in new contract talks. More than 17,000 union members have been involved in the strike, the longest in the city's history.

The latest settlements are generally in line with earlier agreements with five other NRA members, the Las Vegas Hilton, Flamingo Hilton, Caesars Palace, El Cortez and Western hotels. The five hotels agreed to four-year contracts with wage increases of $1.46 an hour.

Before the walkout began, the unions had reached new contracts with 23 independent hotels and casinos. The main issue in the talks with all the employers has been management's insistence on doing away with the current 40-hour workweek guarantee.

Rallying support

Meanwhile, Nevada State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Claude Evans told a news conference that AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland would join other labor leaders here June 1 to draw national attention to the workers' struggle for economic justice.

Evans said Kirkland would meet with

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue voices AFL-CIO concerns on the NLRB's anti-union tilt. Legislative Director Ray Denison is at right.

Reagan's nominee for NLRB counsel called unqualified

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called on the Senate to reject President Reagan's nomination of Rosemary Collyer to be general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

Collyer lacks both the experience and the impartiality the position demands, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue testified at Senate confirmation hearings. He warned that the appointment would worsen the NLRB's already heavy pro-employer tilt.

Donahue charged that President Reagan's three appointees to the NLRB have demonstrated a "single-minded devotion to employer interests." Collyer appears to be cast in the same mold, he suggested.

Donahue's concerns were shared by Democratic members of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee and by the chairmen of two House subcommittees that deal with federal labor law.

Lack of experience

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), head of a Government Operations subcommittee that has held hearings on the NLRB, and Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.), chairman of the Labor-Management Relations subcommittee, contrasted the paucity of Collyer's legal experience with the heavy responsibilities of the NLRB general counsel.

The general counsel supervises the NLRB's 33 regional offices, directs the work of hundreds of attorneys and has the final say on the issuance of unfair labor practice complaints against employers and unions.

Collyer's only experience with federal labor law came during her relatively brief stay with a Denver law firm between her graduation from law school in 1977 and her appointment in 1981 as chairman of the Federal Mine Safety & Health Review Commission.

One committee member, Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.), said Collyer appears to have exaggerated even her limited experience in this field. A check with her former law firm, he said, showed involvement in only nine NLRB matters as a lawyer and only one case in which she was the principal attorney. She had testified she had handled about 30 cases before the NLRB and was the main lawyer in most of them.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the ranking minority member on the panel, said the Senate's confirmation of other "relatively unknown and inexperienced Reagan nominees" to the NLRB has led to unhappy results. With the labor board "in full-scale retreat from its statutory obligation to promote collective bargaining,"

Administration rebuffed as anti-bias bill advances

Two House committees gave a strong bipartisan endorsement to a labor-backed, Administration-opposed bill to strengthen the government's ability to act against discrimination.

President Reagan protested at his May 22 news conference that the legislation is "too broad" and would lead to federal "intrusion." But the next day, the House Judiciary Committee approved it unanimously, as did the Education & Labor Committee after rejecting changes sought by two Republicans.

The measure, needed to remedy a restrictive Supreme Court decision, would cut off all federal funds to any institution or program that discriminated in any of its functions. It would do this by amending various laws dealing with discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion, national origin, age or handicap.

At committee hearings, Assistant Atty. Gen. William Bradford Reynolds had protested that the bill goes further than needed to reverse the Supreme Court's interpretation of a law barring sex discrimination in educational activities receiving federal aid. The 6-3 court majority held the law in question denied funding only for specific college functions that discriminate, thus allowing federal support for other programs.

As civil rights groups see it, the ruling contradicted the intent of Congress and weakened other laws that also rely on a cut off of federal funds as a weapon against discrimination.

Pro-employer shift

Board continues to reverse policy

By James M. Shevis

The Reagan majority on the National Labor Relations Board has come up with a new reversal of established board policy that the AFL-CIO charged fits the mold of the board's recent anti-worker actions.

In a 3-1 decision, the board said that "under no circumstances" will it order an employer who has committed unfair labor practices to bargain with a union that has not demonstrated majority support.

"In case after case, the NLRB continues to operate as a tool of employers," the AFL-CIO declared in commenting on the case.

"The Supreme Court has said that an employer should be ordered to bargain with its employees if that employer has so poisoned the well with unfair labor practices that a fair election is not possible.

"Now the new NLRB majority is diluting that protection for employees with this ruling."

The ruling concerns Gourmet Foods, Inc., a St. Paul, Minn., specialty foods distributor that had embarked on a five-month campaign of unfair labor practices when the unaffiliated Teamsters attempted to organize its workers. The company threatened to fire the workers and close the plant.

Outrageously unfair

Even though a collective bargaining agreement was never reached, the Teamsters argued that the NLRB should order Gourmet Foods to negotiate a contract because the company's retaliatory moves had been so "outrageous and pervasive."

Refusing to go along with its earlier precedent of remedial bargaining orders, the board said in its decision that the principle of majority rule is paramount and fundamental to the right of workers to pick pick their own unions, and must be followed even in the most "exceptional" cases. Members Patricia Diaz Dennis and Robert P. Hunter joined Chairman Donald L. Dotson in the decision, while Member Don A. Zimmerman dissented.

Zimmerman, an independent who was appointed to the board during the Carter Administration, pointed to a 1969 Supreme Court decision involving the NLRB and the Gissel Packing Co. that identified a class of unfair labor practices so coercive in nature that they prevented union elections from being held.

In that case, he noted, the justices agreed with a lower appellate court about "the possibility of imposing a bargaining

Union welfare operation in Las Vegas includes a food bank that distributes thousands of pounds of necessities per week and a benefit claims office.

Las Vegas union welfare network issues tons of aid—by the numbers

Las Vegas, Nev.—This city lives on numbers.

And the strike by thousands of culinary workers, maids, janitors, bartenders, musicians and stagehands—now in its 56th day, a record number in itself—has been true to style.

For instance, take some numbers on how the unions came to the aid of their members: 160,000 pounds of staples for a food bank for strikers; 15,000 sandwiches a day for pickets; 3,000 union members turning up in one week at one location seeking help on their financial problems; 1,500 individual problems with landlords needing attention; 3,000 pounds of meat per day for a strike kitchen; countless tons of paper for all uses, including communications; thousands of gallons of coffee; and money—well, the final readings aren't in yet.

Not to upstage the massive logistical challenge presented by preparation for what threatened to be, and obviously turned out to be, the Las Vegas hotel-casino strike, answering the logistical demands of conducting the strike itself proved a monumental task.

Hundreds helped

It was performed in a totally effective and professional way, discounting an admitted wrinkle here and there by a cast of, literally, hundreds.

Those who put it together will be the first to tell you: "Like our picket lines, it was all done entirely by strikers."

Assigned by Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Organizing Director Vincent J. Sirabella to erect the network of strike-related welfare activities, Mort Miller structured a strike kitchen, member welfare office, food bank and child care center.

Virtually all of it was needed at once. With 17,000 members of HERE Culinary Workers Local 226 going on strike Apr. 2, and most on picket duty, the strike kitchen on Day One began producing army-size quantities of food and coffee.

The kitchen itself was under the immediate eyes of Local 226 business agents Manny Kantor and Joe Todaro. They oversaw a crew of 120, working six four-hour shifts a day.

Also "at once," the member welfare office opened its doors. Occupying a building adjacent to the sprawling Local 226 facility in Las Vegas, some 40 strikers began dealing "creditor help" cases—utility, bank, car, insurance payments-sort-of-thing.

Miller said creditors were asked that strikers who were persons of good risk character "should not be put to the wall on delinquent payments."

The welfare office also had a major job in providing food for striking families before the union food bank began operations. People got counseling on public and private agencies that could help and were referred for food stamps, welfare aid, and cut-rate lunches at schools for children.

Two MGM Grand hotel kitchen employees, Clarence Smith and Gerald Berry, manage the welfare office activity. With up to 3,000 cases a week to process, they worked from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. on a seven-day schedule the first three weeks of the strike.

As the hotels-on-strike list thinned, workdays shortened. They now work only 10 hours a day, five days a week.

One highlight was the "crisis center," which handled extreme emergencies like those of Caesars Palace waiter Jim Turner, pinned under a car wheel on the picket line, and waitress Dianne Redding, hurt when a scab deliberately backed his car into her at the MGM Grand. Both Turner and Redding needed immediate welfare assistance on medical and other expenses

Community agencies

Miller also credited United Way for "invaluable assistance" in many cases.

AFL-CIO Community Services liaison representative Bill Hardy also threw his energy into the assistance program, soliciting support from a wide range of community voluntary agencies and training union volunteers to help other strikers handle problems.

Crews working the member welfare office spent two weeks prior to the strike boning up on how to counsel, and learning about available services and how to cool nervous creditors.

The union's food bank is spending about $40,000 a week providing such necessities as rice, potatoes, macaroni, canned foods, powdered milk, lard and flour. It all goes out in carefully weighed bags—10,000 of them the first three weeks of operation.

Funds contributed by HERE local unions from New England to Hawaii, through the international's Las Vegas Strike Relief Fund, have helped generate energy for the food bank.

Nearly $100,000 in contributions from other AFL-CIO unions was received through the federation's assistance fund set up by the Executive Council to channel aid to the Las Vegas strikers.

The food bank is housed in an old warehouse west of The Strip that was once a meatpacking plant.

It has an interesting crew of 45, headed by hotel maitre 'd Bernie Gonzales, assisted by cocktail waitress Freda Green and waiter Roger Mueller, all of the El Cortez in downtown Las Vegas.

Family aid

Finally, something had to be done about the "children of the Las Vegas strike," offspring of the working parents, many single-parent mothers, carrying picket signs in defense of job and home.

Loaned a couple of rooms and playground space by the Holy Family Day Care Center, a Catholic community services agency, waitress Sharon Gaston and about a dozen strikers moved in to provide morning and afternoon care for some 40 youngsters a day.

Play was supervised, and there were classroom activities for the pre-school-age children at home, if requested.

Americans are fond of the adage: "Those who work together, stay together." The Las Vegas hotel workers' strike is "Exhibit 'A'."

New agreements add to pressure on hotel holdouts about 50 state and local union officials, tour picket lines and appear at a star-studded show headlined by singer Wayne Newton to benefit striking union members and their families.

Kirkland's visit would "emphasize once more the commitment of American labor to the Las Vegas struggle by thousands of workers forced to defend their rights and security against unmitigated corporate greed," Evans said.

Also, HERE Organizing Director Vincent J. Sirabella announced that a national television, radio and newspaper ad campaign keyed to Las Vegas's principal markets will be launched at an initial cost of $500,000.

Sirabella said HERE's media campaign would zero in on "the poor losers in the Las Vegas gambling community who have refused to accept the reasonable settlement other hotels have accepted, and who continue their effort to break the city's labor movement—an effort the other hotels since have abandoned."

Sirabella said the Hyatt hotel chain, with 79 facilities in the United States and Canada, had been added to the union's leafletting campaign against hotel chains with interests in Los Angeles, where picketing is also underway.

The union also put up informational picket lines at MGM studios, which are corporately linked to MGM Grand, at major bus terminals, Los Angeles International Airport and Union railroad station.

Postal Workers arbitration wins promotions, back pay

The Postal Workers won a major arbitration victory on job classifications that will mean promotions for thousands of postal employees along with substantial back pay settlements.

Arbitrator Richard Mittenthal held that the U.S. Postal Service violated provisions of its national agreement with the APWU by unilaterally creating a classification of "Mail Distributor" at a lower salary grade than the existing "Distribution Clerk" position. Duties in both classifications are almost identical.

The arbitrator ordered the Postal Service to upgrade all workers classified as mail distributors now at Level 4 salary to distribution clerks at salary Level 5. And USPS must reimburse the workers for lost earnings because of the difference in the pay levels. The arbitration is binding.

APWU President Moe Biller called the award "our biggest union victory under the collective bargaining procedure," and he stressed that the decision is especially welcome because it comes "in the midst of our new and more difficult battle—the battle for a fair and decent contract."

APWU, the Letter Carriers and Mail Handlers began negotiations with USPS for new agreements last month.

The union estimated that, based on USPS figures, as many as 57,000 workers could benefit from the decision. The differences in salaries could total as much as $44 million annually.

The APWU filed the grievance in 1982 after the USPS announced it was creating the mail distributor position.

The union charged that establishment of the position was unfair, that the Postal Service had a duty to bargain on the issue, and that the position was improperly classified since it required the same duties and responsibilities as the higher grade position.

Although the USPS prepared a job description for the new, lower-paid classification in 1979, it did not bargain on the issue in subsequent negotiations. Instead, the agency informed the APWU in June 1982 that it was putting the classification into effect.

The arbitrator's decision said USPS had a duty to bargain on the issue.

Electrical Workers awarded settlement by Sharp

Memphis, Tenn.—The Electrical Workers won reinstatement with a back pay award of nearly $250,000 for 27 members of Local 1561 employed by the Sharp Manufacturing Co. plant here.

Sharp signed an agreement with the National Labor Relations Board to settle a number of unfair labor practice charges that had been brought against the firm by the IBEW.

The charges stemmed from organizing efforts at the plant that included a representation election in May 1980 that was set aside by the NLRB after the company was found guilty of a number of unfair labor practice charges. The IBEW won a board-ordered second election held in February 1981, but Sharp stalled two years before agreeing to a first contract with the union.

The company is a division of the Japanese-owned Sharp Electronics Corp. The financial settlement covers wages, fringe benefits and medical expenses.

Panel asked to support youth employment bill, reject slash in wages

The AFL-CIO testified for jobs legislation to help teenagers from poor families stay in school and urged Congress to reject any form of a subminimum youth wage.

Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten said a youth employment bill introduced by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) points in the direction the AFL-CIO favors. It proposes to use federal funds for after-school and summer jobs that would enable disadvantaged youngsters to complete high school and gain job skills.

Hawkins is chairman of the House Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities, which is holding hearings on the bill he has cosponsored with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

The Reagan Administration has taken a radically different approach. It wants a two-tier minimum wage for five months of the year—May through September. During that time, employers could pay persons under the age of 30 a rate 85 cents an hour less than the regular minimum wage.

The Administration claims this would create so many new summer jobs that it would virtually eliminate teenage unemployment.

Hawkins and other critics of the Administration plan retort that the bulk of new job opportunities for teenagers would come by displacing older workers.

McGlotten, who was joined by AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts, noted that the present $3.35 an hour minimum wage has been so eroded by inflation that it amounts to a subminimum.

He and Roberts noted also that the wage-hour law already allows employers to hire students for after-school or summer jobs at a reduced "learner" wage, so long as no older workers are displaced. And employers are entitled to a big tax credit—amounting to 85 percent of wages—if they hire economically disadvantaged 16- and 17-year-olds for summer jobs.

Yet all of these inducements haven't created the jobs the Administration claims would be opened up by a subminimum youth wage, the AFL-CIO witnesses noted.

Wrong approach

McGlotten told the panel that the nation needs a full employment economy, and the evidence is conclusive that a subminimum wage "is the wrong way to approach the education, training and employment needs of young people."

In supporting the overall thrust of the Hawkins-Kennedy bill, McGlotten noted the success of a comparable demonstration program conducted by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, which helped more than 600 disadvantaged young people in 1979-81.

It offered a combination of summer and in-school services to help young persons set job goals and get the education and training they needed, McGlotten testified.

On the specifics of the legislation, McGlotten stressed the AFL-CIO's support for careful monitoring to assure that the programs aren't abused and that youngsters aren't used as a substitute for older workers who otherwise would be hired.

He urged that reimbursement to private employers participating in the program be limited to the costs of recruiting, counseling and training disadvantaged young workers. Direct wage subsidies, McGlotten said, should be limited to the public sector and non-profit employers which provide community services.

Testifying for a youth jobs program, Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten with Economist Markley Roberts.

Donovan blocked in scheme to lift ban on homework

The Reagan Administration lost another round in its attempt to clear the way for the return of the home sweatshop when U.S. Chief Justice Warren Burger refused to block reinstatement of the ban on industrial homework.

Burger refused a request—filed by the Justice Dept. on behalf of Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan—for a stay of a federal district court ruling ordering Donovan as of May 15 to put back in place the ban on homework in the knitted outerwear industry.

With the Chief Justice's refusal to grant an additional stay, the ban is now fully reinstated and industrial homework continues to be illegal in that industry.

Donovan's appeal was the latest move in a three-year legal tangle that has pitted the Ladies' Garment Workers, manufacturers and state labor law enforcement officials against the Reagan Administration in a fight to save the 40-year-old labor standard that protects workers against violations of wage and hour, health and safety and child labor laws.

Arbitrary action

The opening salvo was fired by Donovan in 1981 when he announced he was lifting the ban. The ILGWU immediately went to court to block the move, and after a series of legal actions, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia overturned the Administration's position last November. The court pointed out that the rule change had been done in an "arbitrary and capricious manner."

Donovan tried again in March, issuing an "emergency" suspension of the rule, but on a challenge from the ILGWU, the appeals court again found that the Administration had done nothing more than issue the same rule that the court had already firmly turned down.

The court sent the case back to federal district court with orders requiring the lower court to reinstate the ban. The district court stayed the reinstatement until May 15, and it was this action which Donovan tried unsuccessfully to get Chief Justice Burger to continue.

The Labor Dept. has already announced it would try for the third time to get the lifting of the ban past the appeals court where the case is again pending.

Convention shifted

The Theatrical Stage Employes will hold its 1984 convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., July 16-21 at the Sheraton Bal Harbour hotel instead of July 23-27 in Las Vegas, Nev. IATSE shifted the location because of concerns that the Las Vegas hotel strike would not be settled in time for the convention.

Reagan rebuffed in House as strong anti-bias bill gains

The bill the two committees approved is expected to be taken up at an early date by the House, and Senate hearings are under way on a companion measure. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland earlier committed the federation to "do all we can to assure passage."

As Congress prepared to break for a stretched-out Memorial Day holiday, the Senate again stalled on a bankruptcy bill that is seen as the vehicle to overcome the Supreme Court decision allowing companies filing for bankruptcy to unilaterally abrogate their union contracts.

A labor-supported amendment by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) was pending to the bill, but its foes were unwilling to let it come to a vote.

In an earlier vote, Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) was squelched when he tried to use the bankruptcy bill as a vehicle for an anti-labor amendment that has been pushed by the National Right to Work Committee.

Helms proposed to bar the use of dues from any workers covered by a union shop agreement for any purpose at all related to political activity, including voter registration campaigns and communications with members.

The Senate killed the amendment by a 65-32 vote to table it.

In another development, the Senate voted unanimously to block the Social Security Administration from dropping people from the disability benefit rolls unless the medical condition that caused the disability has improved.

The legislation was prompted by public outcries over the purge of the disability lists the Social Security Administration began in 1981 under a congressionally mandated review requirement.

Thousands of disabled workers were cut off from benefits, but about two-thirds of those who appealed their removals had their benefits restored by independent administrative law judges.

The Senate bill is not as strong as the version the House approved, 410-1, in March. The Senate measure puts the burden on the recipient to show that the disability still exists, while the House bill compels the government to show that the medical condition has improved. Both versions, however, prevent removal from the benefit rolls before a final decision is reached.

A House-Senate conference will be needed to resolve differences.

The Senate's Republican majority finally agreed to the deficit reduction package that President Reagan and GOP leaders endorsed, but only after a four-week battle in which some moderate Republicans worked with Senate Democrats in various efforts to shape a more equitable formula. Again, the next step is up to a House-Senate conference committee.

Rise in prices, drop in orders signal slowdown

Consumer prices edged up and durable goods orders declined substantially in April to fill out a picture of a slowing overall economy.

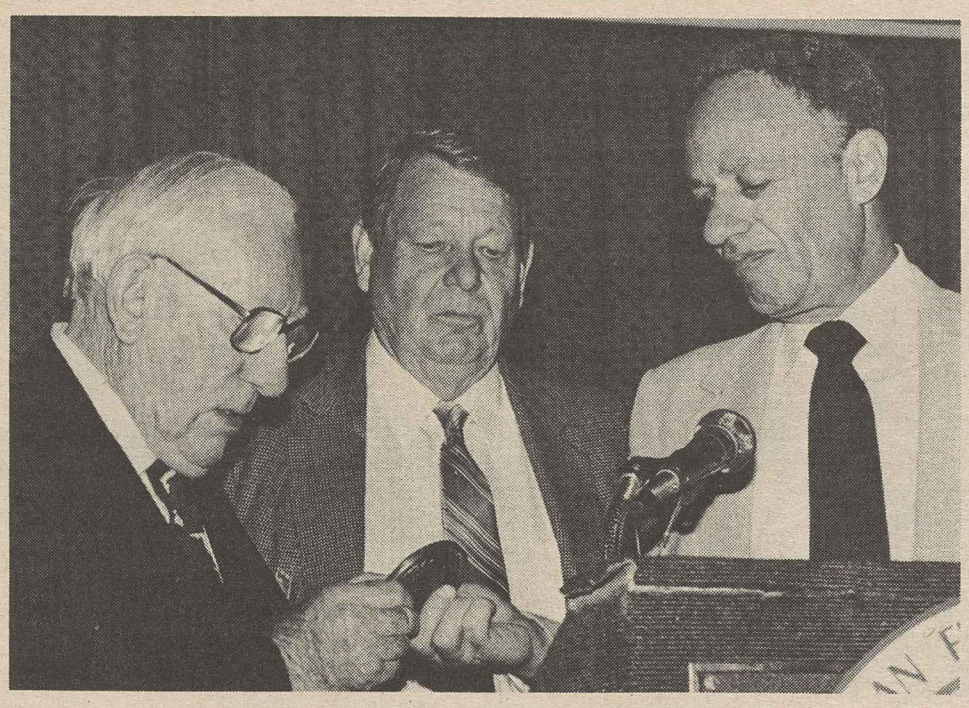
Earlier government reports showed unemployment hanging high at 7.8 percent for three months in a row, while banks and other lending institutions raised their key interest rates as the Federal Reserve Bank tightened credit.

Retail prices, as measured by the Bureau of Labor Statistics consumer price index for urban wage earners and clerical workers (CPI-W), rose two-tenths of 1 percent last month, mainly because of higher housing costs. By another index—the CPI for all urban consumers (CPI-U)—the March cost of living rose even more, five-tenths of 1 percent.

In a separate report, BLS said that workers' real weekly earnings rose 1.6 percent in April after declining in each of the two previous months. Over the year, they were up 3.3 percent. Expressed in constant, uninflated 1977 dollars, real weekly earnings of nonsupervisory workers on private, nonfarm payrolls averaged $176.30, compared to $173.58 in March and $170.64 a year earlier. Even with the April increase, real wages are below the 1979 level.

The two-tenths of 1-percent rise in the CPI-W compared with no change in March and a one-tenth of 1-percent increase in February.

The slower rise in the CPI-W was the result of a different method in accounting for homeownership costs. CPI-U uses a rental-equivalence approach while CPI-W is based on house prices, mortgage interest rates, property taxes, property insurance, and maintenance and repair costs.



Rep. Claude D. Pepper, left, accepts Murray-Green-Meany Award from AFL-CIO Vice President Alvin E. Heaps, and Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Claude Pepper honored

Labor community role focus of conference

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Labor's Special Interest" was the theme of the AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services here which stressed the trade union movement's commitment to "working, serving and giving" to its members, their communities eand citizens.

Community Services Director Walter G. Davis observed in his keynote address to the 330 participants that labor's extensive service to people and their communities is "the best kept secret of the labor movement."

He announced that the department is beginning a year-long national survey of labor's community services resources and activities as a way to "get data on the extent to which trade unionists are serving the communities where they live and work."

Participants were welcomed by South Florida AFL-CIO President Edward T. Stephenson and Florida AFL-CIO President Daniel J. Miller.

Humanitarian award

A highlight of the week-long conference was an awards dinner held to present Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.) with the federation's highest honor, the Murray-Green-Meany Award for humanitarian service. The award includes a medallion and a $5,000 grant.

The award was presented to Pepper by Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, and Federation Vice President Alvin E. Heaps, chairman of the community services committee.

Pepper, a veteran of 36 years of service in the U.S. Senate and House, is a staunch supporter of social programs and an outspoken advocate of the needs of the elderly.

In presenting the award to the 83-year-old congressman, Young stressed that Pepper fully meets "the criteria defining the purposes of the Murray-Green-Meany Award. It symbolizes a lifetime of friendship to labor, and recognizes your outstanding contributions and services to the working men and women of America."

Pepper told the more than 700 guests at the dinner that he is proud of his long relationship with organized labor and its concerns, which today include deep concern over the policies and actions of the Reagan Administration.

The congressman charged that President Reagan has failed to keep his campaign promise that "every commitment made to the elderly by the government will be honored under my Administration." Pepper said Reagan's policies mark him as "the worst President we've ever had in the White House."

Coping with the disastrous effects of the Reagan Recession were key themes in presentations throughout the conference which was attended by national, state and local community service liaison and staff representatives, state and local central body officers, and Community Services Committee members.

Worse than bad

Director Bert Seidman of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security gave the Administration an "F minus" for its record of damaging cuts in vital human service programs.

President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens recalled Reagan's 1980 campaign promises "to do no harm to the elderly" that were immediately followed by a massive attack on social security programs.

Clayman warned that the Administration is already hinting that it would "revisit" social security in a second term.

In other sessions at the conference, AFL-CIO Organizing Director Alan Kistler, who is also president of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute, reviewed the areas of cooperation between HRDI and the community service staff, including critical aid to the unemployed. Kistler noted that HRDI focuses its work on the after-effects of mass layoffs while community services organizations provide direct and immediate services to jobless workers.

Key topics

Conference sessions also included discussions of successful labor community services programs in a number of cities, means for coping with the stress of unemployment, the labor movement and volunteer activities, techniques for participating in and improving the work of local community organization boards, and effective use of the media to tell labor's important community services story.

Participants attended a series of six workshops offering practical techniques for dealing with community issues such as the human problems associated with plant closings, veterans affairs, increasing volunteer participation in community agencies, methods for obtaining grants for local programs, and access to local media.

Reagan majority on board again takes employer side order, without need of inquiry into majority status on the basis of cards or otherwise."

If the NLRB does not exercise its power to correct "exceptional" employer abuses, Zimmerman said, it fails in its obligation to "preserve employee rights to self-organization and free choice of a collective bargaining representative."

Two cases involving non-majority bargaining orders have been considered by appeals courts in recent years. The 3rd U.S. Circuit in 1980 upheld such an order against the United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association.

In a 1982 decision involving Conair Corp., a New Jersey manufacturer of haircare appliances and products, the District of Columbia Circuit Court struck down an NLRB bargaining order.

The AFL-CIO "will continue to do all in its power to make the NLRB an instrument of labor law, not a tool of employers," the federation said.

Rights jeopardized

"American workers have a tremendous stake in fair administration of federal labor law. The Reagan Administration has jeopardized that basic right with its NLRB appointments and is trying to make matters worse by nominating an unqualified candidate, Rosemary Collyer, as the board's general counsel."

Stephen Schlossberg, a lawyer who represents the Auto Workers in Washington, said the NLRB's latest anti-labor decision was "one more nail in the coffin" and pointed to a string of recent reversals unions have suffered at the hands of the Reagan board.

In its opinion on Gourmet Foods, the board acknowledged that it and the courts have used different standards for proof of majority status, but added it could not "dispense entirely with reliable proof of some sort that a majority of employees in a unit, at some relevant time, in some recognized form, asserted their choice and selected and designated a union as their representative."

Industrial policy legislation gains new endorsement

The labor-supported industrial competitiveness bill moved a step closer to the House floor, and the AFL-CIO pressed for a vote at the earliest opportunity.

A continued erosion of the nation's industrial base has left the economy weaker and unemployment higher at the end of each recent recession cycle than at the start, Oswald noted.

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.), had previously been approved by the House Banking Committee. The new endorsement came from the Energy & Commerce Committee, which had overlapping jurisdiction over a part of the legislation.

Joint effort

In testimony before the committee acted, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald and Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel urged the importance of a cooperative effort by labor, industry and government to channel public and private resources to address the nation's economic problems.

While the more controversial section of the bill — calling for establishment of a bank to help fund economic development — was not before the Commerce Committee, Oswald nevertheless emphasized its importance.

Such a financing mechanism would be essential to help provide the capital needed for new, developing industries and for modernizing older industries, Oswald said. The bank's role would stimulate further investments from the private sector, he contended.

Samuel's testimony for the IUD warned that the "high tech" industry "offers no hiding place for the U.S. economy" and more than half the domestic market in new products the United States has developed has been captured by imports.

Nominee for NLRB counsel opposed filling the post of general counsel is especially important, Kennedy stressed.

Donahue cited the AFL-CIO's comparison of NLRB decisions during the period in which the Reagan appointees have been a majority, under NLRB Chairman Donald Dotson, with the rulings of the board majority during the Carter Administration, under Chairman John Fanning, and the Ford Administration under Betty Murphy.

The survey showed the Dotson board ruling for employers and against unions substantially more than either of the two preceding boards, Donahue testified.

In its decisions, including the reversal of previous policies, "the Dotson board has consistently shown a mean-spirited hostility toward the needs and aspirations of employees," Donahue charged.

To back up labor's concern that Collyer would reflect a similar approach if she were to become the NLRB's general counsel, Donahue cited her record on the Mine Safety Commission.

Whenever the commission was divided, he said, Collyer voted for the employer position.

"Collyer has been for restricting the coverage of the Mine Safety Act, for reducing penalties against companies found to have violated safety standards, for narrowly interpreting and applying mandatory safety and health standards designed to protect workers from injury," he said.

She also has been "for restricting the involvement of workers and their authorized representatives in the administration of the Mine Safety Act," Donahue added. Her only dissenting opinion, he noted, was in protest against a finding by the commission majority that an employer had violated a safety standard.

Donahue reminded the Republican-controlled Senate committee of the long tradition of "some semblance of balance" in the membership of the NLRB and the appointment of the general counsel.

The present Administration is clearly out to destroy such a balance, he warned.

"The time has come to call a halt to the continuing erosion of employee rights, and rejection of the Collyer nomination is the place to start, Donahue urged.

El Salvador acquits killing suspect

The acquittal of another suspect in the 1981 slayings of two American labor representatives in El Salvador was met with "shock and dismay" by the AFL-CIO.

Referring to the May 17 release of Lt. Rodolfo Lopez Sibrian by the Fifth Penal Court in San Salvador, Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the federation's American Institute for Free Labor Development said it was another example of the corruption of the country's legal system.

"Nevertheless, we remain committed to the pursuit of justice in the appeals courts," he said, stressing that Lopez Sibrian's release by the court "does not end the case."

Doherty said that an appeal already has been filed by El Salvador's attorney general, and a response is expected shortly. If the appeal proves fruitless, another can be made to a higher court and, finally, to the nation's supreme court.

In late March, another Army officer, Capt. Eduardo A. Avila, was released from jail where he had been held for questioning in the 1981 deaths of AIFLD staff members Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman. Killed with them was Jose Rodolfo Viera, director of the Salvadoran Institute for Agrarian Reform, whom they were assisting in the country's land redistribution program.

Two Salvadoran National Guardsmen have confessed to carrying out the killings on orders from Sibrian.

They said Avila and Sibrian gave them guns to use in the killings. Under Salva-

Job study warns of loss of manufacturing base

The deindustrialization of America, with the transformation of the economy from a high-wage manufacturing base to one founded on lower-wage service industries, spells trouble for some time to come, a study of the nation's growing structural unemployment finds.

Laid-off workers and new entrants into the labor force are finding it harder and harder to land permanent jobs with middle-income pay.

There is a continuing long-term trend of little or no growth in manufacturing and substantial expansion in less permanent jobs in the service-related sector that pay less, the report observed.

Low-wage growth

Written by Economists Barry Bluestone of Boston College and Bennett Harrison of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the study cites Labor Dept. figures showing that industries that grew fastest in the 1970s and are projected to grow the most for the rest of the century are generally those in which the average wage in 1980 was below $12,500.

Most of these jobs are in service industries, including restaurants, hotels and medical care.

The industries that grew least in the 1970s and expect continued slow growth are generally those that in 1980 paid average wages above $22,000, the study noted. Almost all of these jobs are in manufacturing.

The hardest-hit manufacturing industries, among the 15 examined in the report, are motor vehicles, household appliances, apparel, footwear, electrical distribution equipment, radio and television receivers, textiles, and tires and tubes.

The study, "Storm Clouds on the Horibon: Labor Market Crisis and Industrial Policy," is in sharp contrast to the views of certain economists who have argued that deindustrialization is a myth.

"Any cursory analysis of the steel, automobile, textile, apparel or footwear industries, or simply a visit to Detroit, Buffalo, Youngstown or Akron, would leave little doubt that capital investment has been insufficient to maintain basic industry or to mitigate the virtual abandonment of entire communities," Bluestone and Harrison observe.

"Rising long-term unemployment, increasing underemployment, the proliferation of lower-wage jobs and an increasingly unequal distribution of the burdens of these changes among our population are storm clouds on the horizon. . . .

"The industrial policy debate is, in our opinion, one of the most important issues with which Americans will have to contend in the foreseeable future."

The report said the government should take a leadership role in helping the unemployed gain jobs.

Structural unemployment has mounted steadily since the early 1970s, Bluestone and Harrison noted. Structural unemployment occurs when potential workers do not have skills to match available jobs, lack basic literacy, motivation or technical skills, or are in a geographic area where appropriate jobs do not exist.

Job-loss causes

Structural job losses have resulted through rapid labor-displacing productivity improvement, the incursion of imports, plant shutdowns and the practice of many American companies of having parts of products manufactured outside the United States, the study observed.

Other highlights from the job study report:

● Structural unemployment has left a larger proportion of the work force unemployed after each recession, increasing the duration of joblessness, and reducing the odds of any unemployed jobseeker finding a job vacancy.

● The most dramatic and socially disruptive form of unemployment is job loss resulting from an actual closure of a plant. Over the most recent period for which such data exist, the 1978-82 period, an average of 900,000 jobs were lost every year to shutdowns in manufacturing companies with 100 or more employees. And while the labor force increased by almost 8 million, the net increase in new manufacturing jobs was only 77,000.

● Minorities and women suffered disproportionately from structural job losses in manufacturing industries.

The report concludes that what the nation needs are structural industrial policies to upgrade the nation's basic industries, and a productivity-enhancement program for the lowest-wage sectors that are expanding the fastest.

"Education, training and retraining programs will help smooth the industrial transformation for some, but without demand-side programs to restructure industries and jobs, all the human capital in the world cannot prevent the erosion of living standards if the economy is proliferating lower-wage jobs," it said.

Federal compensation law asked for job-linked disease

The AFL-CIO renewed its call for a comprehensive federal program on occupational disease to "compensate workers and their families for death or disability resulting from work-related exposure to dangerous substances."

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, stressed in testimony to the Senate Labor subcommittee that "the moral and ethical issues raised by occupational diseases are so serious that common sense tells all of us it is time to resolve this problem."

Young said state workers' compensation systems are not designed to deal with occupational disease, as most victims of disease are forced to sue before receiving compensation.

What is needed, Young said, is a federal program that is "comprehensive in scope, covering known occupational health hazards and providing coverage through administrative action for additional hazards as they become known."

Young's testimony included statements from President Howard D. Samuel of the Industrial Union Dept. and President Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Young stressed that a part of the federal response to occupational disease should be "companion legislative measures to identify, notify and diagnose workers who are at high risk of an occupational health hazard." The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health should be authorized to carry out medical research to isolate occupational diseases and to assist workers at risk.

He also called for legislative action to correct the "injustice of denying compensation to workers for job-related injury and disease on the grounds of 'alleged' bankruptcy."

Samuel said statistical estimates of significant "excess risk of death or disease" in specific worker populations can easily be determined.

He suggested compensation be available to workers in exposed groups whose risk of getting a specific disease from exposure to a hazardous chemical or substance exceeds the risk of the general population by 30 percent.

Trigger level

The 30-percent "benchmark" would be a "trigger" level at which compensation would be paid for workers contracting such a disease.

Georgine detailed the hazards faced by construction workers, especially from asbestos. He pointed out that researchers at the Mt. Sinai School of Medicine have estimated that 7.5 million construction workers are at some degree of risk in developing an asbestos-related disease.

He stressed that funding of a compensation program, especially for the construction industry, should not be based on the last employer method. Rather, he urged placing the "burden of payment on the manufacturers of the toxic substances. And he insisted that the "American public" should not have to pay for the workplace disability caused by exposure to toxic substances.

Pension equity bill passed by House in unanimous vote

The House approved unanimously a pension equity bill that contains a number of features the AFL-CIO has supported in congressional testimony. It is a part of the economic equity package that women members of Congress have proposed. A similar bill passed the Senate last year.

Under the House-passed version, employees can begin participating in and gaining vesting rights in private pension plans at an earlier age than the law now requires.

It also provides greater pension retention rights for workers who interrupt their careers, particularly for maternity leave. It automatically provides survivor benefits if a vested employee dies before retirement age—unless both spouses have given written notice otherwise. And it allows a divorced spouse to receive a portion of his or her former spouse's pension benefits if a court order so specifies.

Under current law, employees who are not yet 25 years old and do not have one year of service may be excluded from participating in a private pension plan. The new bill reduces the maximum age at which workers may be excluded from participation to age 21, but retains the one-year service requirement.

The bill also requires employers to take into account all service from the time the worker turned age 18—rather than 22, as under current law — in computing the length of service that is required for vesting.

Once employees are vested they have a right to all pension benefits accrued during their years of pension plan participation. Vested employees may leave a job and still retain the rights to their pension benefits.

Pennsylvania AFL-CIO President Julius Uehlein answers reporters' questions about worker deaths at Rohm & Haas.

Firm's attack on disclosure linked to chemical deaths

Harrisburg, Pa. — The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO has accused a large Philadelphia chemical manufacturer that is leading the fight against a strong state "right-to-know" law of conflict of interest, charging that a number of its workers have died from exposure to toxic substances.

The state federation asked the Pennsylvania attorney general and the district attorney of Philadelphia for a "thorough investigation and any other action they deem appropriate" against the Rohm & Haas Co. It cited a possible link between the deaths of workers and the company's failure to provide adequate information about chemical hazards and a safe working environment.

State Federation President Julius Uehlein, at a press conference, unveiled internal company memoranda indicating that Rohm & Haas failed to properly alert its workers about the hazards of bis-chloromethyl ether (BCME), one of the most toxic of cancer-causing chemicals, that the firm has produced since 1948.

Needless deaths

Uehlein said passage of the legislation "is the most important step we can take immediately to control these unnecessary deaths. The right of workers to know what they are working with is a fundamental human right."

Rohm & Haas "is the driving force behind the opposition" to a strong law, as it supports the so-called "compromise amendments" that would eliminate the real protections and safeguards, Uehlein said.

He said that because Rohm & Haas has taken such an active role in trying to weaken the measure, "we felt we had an obligation to examine Rohm & Haas's credentials on workers and community health and safety."

The State AFL-CIO gave reporters a copy of a company memo from 1965 which showed that production of the chemical chloromethyl methyl ether (CME), which contains some of the highly toxic BCME "on very short exposure can cause systemic injury including death." Despite this, it was 1974 before the company acknowledged a link between BCME and human cancer.

Content listing

The labor-backed legislation requires manufacturers to list all chemicals in a product on the container, while the compromise amendments mirror the weaker federal "hazard communication" standard. They cover only hazardous substances and requires employers to provide chemical information on request.

At the press conference with Uehlein was George Marunich, 33, who worked 13 years at chemical plants in Philadelphia. He suffered a paralysis in his legs from damage to his central nervous system caused by exposure to fumes from chemicals he mixed.

Mary Schneider of Allentown, Pa., told reporters, "It is our right to know what is dangerous in the workplace and in our communities. It is as fundamental as our freedom of speech, press and religion."

She is suing Rohm & Haas for the 1980 cancer-related deaths of her father and mother. Her father worked at a Rohm & Haas plant for 20 years.

Service Employees approve funds for organizing drive

Dearborn, Mich.—Delegates to the Service Employees convention voted to increase minimum dues and per capita tax to fund a major organizing effort and expand the union's services to members.

The three-step increase in per capita payments to the international begins with a 40-cent increment July 1, 40 cents on July 1, 1985, and 45 cents on July 1, 1986. Current per capita is $2.55 per month, and the increases will bring it to $3.80.

The SEIU's $8 minimum monthly dues will be raised in three steps of $1 each over the next three years beginning July 1.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney told the convention that the additional revenue would finance "the largest and most aggressive organizing drive in recent labor history."

In a speech to delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised the union for adopting its aggressive organizing and servicing program, and stressed that the labor movement is facing "enormous" challenges that include "changing and improving a nation—changing and improving its trade union movement to make it a more vibrant force in that nation."

Building better world

"We are attempting," Donahue said, "to construct a democratic society in which all of the institutions of that society serve the needs of people—a society in which education, opportunity, housing and health care are available to all; in which fairness and decency are the concerns of all."

Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale told the delegates that SEIU Local 113 in Minneapolis was among his first clients when he began to practice law. Through his work with the union, he said, "I learned in my heart what I knew in my head: how vitally important unions are to justice in America."

Unions support the cause of justice wholeheartedly "for all working people, whether they are union members of not," Mondale stressed.

Among key resolutions adopted by the convention was a call for a national industrial policy to preserve the nation's manufacturing base and for "investment in human capital" through improved education and training for workers and health care for all Americans.

The delegates also endorsed pay equity for working women, protection of the rights of health care workers in hospitals, health facilities and clinical environments including procedures to guard the health of employees who come in contact with dangerous infectious diseases such as sickle cell anemia and AIDS.

Officers re-elected

Sweeney and Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz were re-elected by acclamation to their second four-year terms.

Three new vice presidents—Ophelia McFadden of Los Angeles, Gus Bevona of New York and Ken Lyons of Boston—were elected along with nine incumbents. Delegates also elected seven new executive board members and re-elected 28 incumbents.

An award was presented to Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, citing his concern for the needs of nursing home patients and nursing home workers.

Other speakers at the convention were Michigan Gov. James Blanchard (D), Illinois Gov. James Thompson (R), New Mexico Gov. Toney Anaya (D), Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.), Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the NAACP; AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, Donald Montgomery, secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Labor Congress, and Michigan AFL-CIO President Sam Fishman.

OSHA-approved 'experiment'

Textile firm allowed to violate standards

By Arlee C. Green

An Occupational Safety & Health Administration official helped get a variance allowing 10 Dan River, Inc. textile mills to exceed federal cotton dust exposure limits as part of a controversial experiment on how workers contract brown lung disease.

The United Textile Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers are strongly opposed to the experiment in Danville, Va. The Virginia AFL-CIO charged that the study would turn workers into guinea pigs.

Dr. Leonard Vance, OSHA's director of health standards, drafted the letter that former OSHA Administrator Thorne B. Auchter sent to the Virginia Dept. of Labor urging the variance for Dan River plants which failed to comply with the cotton dust standard.

Vance was formerly a Virginia assistant attorney general when J. Marshall Coleman was the state's attorney general. Coleman represented Dan River in its efforts to obtain variance, which Virginia granted on May 4.

Auchter's letter to Eva S. Teigs, commissioner of the Virginia Dept. of Labor, said that Vance had reviewed the proposal and that "Virginia's encouragement of such studies would appear to be in the best interests of OSHA and the health of textile workers."

Funding efforts

The letter, as drafted by Vance, said Dan River was worthy of a variance as its study "addresses a fundamental question in the field of cotton dust disease and has the potential for making a significant contribution in that area." It said OSHA was working with the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health to facilitate its funding of the $414,314 study.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who uncovered the Vance-Coleman connection, noted that the proposal was also reviewed by Susan Harwood of OSHA's Office of Health Standards. Her written review expressed concern "about approval for human experimentation" and added, "I question the value of the results of this research particularly since it is not clear how the experiment will be carried out."

Intriguing connection

Obey said, "I find it intriguing that Dr. Vance appears to have countervened the only written review of the proposal and then to have personally written the agency's recommendation to the State of Virginia, given his previous work as an assistant attorney general . . . where his boss was Marshall Coleman, the individual who is now representing Dan River."

The study will test the theory that bacteria found in textile dust—thermophilic actinomycetes—are the cause of byssinosis, or brown lung. To do so, cotton dust levels must remain high and the 633 workers in the areas to be tested will be required to wear respirators.

Six years ago, OSHA adopted a cotton dust standard and this past Mar. 27 was the deadline for compliance with its air quality standards. Most textile mills complied by installing needed engineering controls. Dan River could save $7.5 million by not doing so.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley charged in a letter to Patrick Tyson, OSHA's acting administrator, that the agency's action "in this situation is reprehensible and must be reversed." He insisted that "the textile workers of Danville, Va., receive the same protection as workers throughout the nation. It is simply unconscionable to allow hundreds of cotton mill workers to continue to face a high risk of developing brown lung disease."

Escape hatch

Finley charged that Dan River's variance request is a "convenient excuse to defy the intent" of the job safety law, and to delay expenditures for workplace ventilation equipment. He said that respirators are inadequate substitues for clean air.

UTWU President Francis Schaufenbil said "we are opposed to any variance of OSHA standards for Dan River mills."

Virginia AFL-CIO Research Director Virginia R. Diamond protested the state's action. "We feel very strongly that this is a terrible precedent. One of the more ironic things is that unlike in North Carolina and South Carolina, here in Virginia workers are not compensated under workers' comp for brown lung.

"The Dan River firm has consistently held that brown lung doesn't exist. Now they have decided to study something they say doesn't exist. It's clear to us it's just a ploy to avoid installing engineering controls," she said.

Free-trade area for Israel termed bad for U.S. labor

The Administration's proposal to establish a free-trade area with Israel is not in the best interests of the United States, and would only further weaken the economy by increasing imports from that country, the AFL-CIO warned.

In testimony before the House Ways & Means subcommittee on trade, Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan expressed the AFL-CIO's strong opposition to a measure which would give the President authority to eliminate U.S. restrictions and tariffs on products imported from Israel.

Israel already enjoys privileged access to the U.S. market through its participation in the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) program, he observed. Setting up a free-trade area would wipe out the protection import-sensitive industries now have under GSP, he added.

"In fact, it is our understanding that this is one of the principal reasons the Israeli government is seeking such an agreement," he said. "They are apparently concerned that the preferential access granted them is too limited and inhibits their exports to the United States."

Affected industries

Industries that might be affected by the elimination of duties include sophisticated medical equipment, engine and aircraft parts, jewelry, glass, varous types of machinery and electrical equipment, textiles and apparel, and footwear leather products. Many of these industries have already been recognized by Congress as "import-sensitive" and are experiencing high levels of unemployment.

Labor's opposition to the proposed agreement in no way suggests a lessening of its commitment to Israel, Kaplan stressed. The AFL-CIO historically has been one of the most vocal supporters of Israel in the United States, he noted.

Advise and Consent

THE SENATE has a constitutional responsibility to pass on the merits of presidential appointments, and there is no way to avoid it. That duty of careful scrutiny applies to the nomination of a general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board as it does to the appointment of a Secretary of State or a member of the Supreme Court.

Clearly, the Senate should not refuse to confirm a presidential nominee for a frivolous cause or for strictly partisan reasons.

Senators must have good cause to refuse their "advice and consent" to a nomination. But that cause does not have to be what Washington jargon has dubbed "a smoking pistol" of lawbreaking, dishonesty or serious misconduct.

There is good cause for the Senate to refuse to confirm Rosemary Collyer as NLRB general counsel, and the AFL-CIO has made its case before the committee considering her nomination.

Under the most generous interpretation, the known qualifications of the nominee do not come close to measuring up to the demands of the job. That alone should be grounds for the Senate to refuse its consent to her appointment.

Collyer's already weak list of qualifications became still weaker with the disclosure at Senate hearings that she had apparently padded her experience with labor law cases. The law firm for which she worked could identify only nine cases before the NLRB in which Collyer participated, and only one in which she had the chief responsibility.

That was far from the dozens of such cases she had claimed to have handled.

PUT BLUNTLY, the NLRB has lost the confidence of American workers and their unions in the interpretation of federal labor law—thanks to the presidential appointments already made and confirmed.

If the prosecution of unfair labor practices, the provisions for representation elections and the machinery to enforce the National Labor Relations Act is put under the same management, the loss of confidence will be complete.

But there are other standards the Senate should insist on in presidential appointments to an agency as sensitive as the National Labor Relations Board. And a management partisan armed with years of experience in fighting unions should be no more acceptable to the Senate than Collyer.

The administration of federal labor law should be impartial and perceived as fair by advocates on both sides of the bargaining table.

There have been some exceptions. But never in half a century has the balance been so badly tilted.

It's time to set it right, not make it worse.

The Class of '84

THIS IS the season for high school and college graduations, a proud and happy time for many thousands of union families. Those are our sons and daughters out there, the caps, gowns and T-shirts.

We wish them well.

We wish there were a job with decent pay and a fair chance of advancement awaiting each member of the Class of 1984. Unfortunately, there is not. The worst of the recession may be over, but there still aren't the jobs or the prospect of jobs that America needs for a full employment prosperity.

So it will be a struggle, and the climb will not always be unbroken. For many there will be shifts of direction along the way.

It is a better world, however, because their mothers, fathers and grandparents built strong unions and used them to build a better life, a safer and healthier workplace.

With a bit of luck, our kids will take us all a step further.

Lumber workers resolved on winning bitter strike

By Press Associates, Inc.

"When we went out on strike on June 24, if somebody had told me that we would still be out on Thanksgiving, I would have said, 'No way,' " Hal Harris, a lumber mill worker from Tacoma, Wash., recalled.

But now, as the first anniversary nears, Harris is still out on strike along with some 1,500 other employees of Louisiana-Pacific Corp., the second largest lumber products company in the nation.

"More than anything else, it's been a lesson in survival and in union solidarity," said Harris, a stud mill worker and member of the Carpenters' Lumber Production & Industrial Workers.

Harris flew to Carpenters headquarters in Washington on May 13 with some 40 fellow L-P strikers on their way to confront the elusive top officials of the Oregon-based company at its annual shareholders meeting. L-P held the meeting in Rocky Mount, N.C., an open shop state far from the bitter strike in the Pacific Northwest.

Before boarding buses for the "Reckoning at Rocky Mount," the mill workers heard Carpenters President Patrick Campbell share his view of the 10½-month-old strike. "It doesn't look like just a regular strike in a regular bargaining year, but more like a conspiracy hatched in someone's kitchen," he said.

Union-busting pattern

Campbell explained that the L-P dispute fits into a pattern of union-busting by greedy and unscrupulous employers in the recent years of recession and high unemployment.

An example he cited was the Arizona copper workers who struck Phelps Dodge Corp. last July after the company rejected the wage freeze agreement reached with other copper producers. The mines have been run by non-union labor since August, when the state police and National Guard were brought in to escort strikebreakers.

Another recent example of calculated union-busting occurred in Las Vegas, Nev., where hotel-casino workers were forced to strike by employers who spurned a four-year contract signed earlier by other hotel owners.

Employers increasingly have been abusing the bankruptcy laws to get out of their union contracts. Last September, for example, a financially solvent Continental Airlines filed for bankruptcy and two days later resumed operations as a non-union company.

Reagan aid

The employer assault on unions has been encouraged by the anti-labor tilt of the Reagan Administration. President Reagan set the tone by firing the striking air traffic controllers and refusing to rehire them even after the strike was defeated and PATCO was dissolved. Reagan's stacking of the National Labor Relations Board with pro-management lawyers is just one example of his aid to the open shop offensive.

To save their union and their jobs, the L-P strikers traveled to Rocky Mount as part of a corporate campaign to get L-P to give up its acknowledged plan to go non-union.

Armed with the proxies of nearly 2 million shareholder votes, the strikers told L-P President Harry A. Merlo that the strike already has cost the company far more than the cost of the modest settlement proposed by the union. L-P provoked the strike by rejecting an agreement signed by the industry bargaining group and by making demands for big wage cuts for new hires.

Striker Dave Bigby said it became clear that L-P was out to break the union, and "there could be no relenting and no turning back."

"L-P grossly underestimated our staying power," Bigby said. The strikers have remained firm even though "members of my local have lost their homes and their cars. Families have broken up because of the anxiety" of the added hardship.

"No one realized it would go on this long and the trauma it would cause," Bigby said. "I don't know what it will take, but all of us are willing to give whatever is necessary."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Bankruptcy Vote Delayed

Helms Defeat Allows Unions To Continue Voter Education

Legislation to prevent corporations from abusing bankruptcy law in order to break their union contracts reached the Senate floor, but a few conservatives held it up with threats of filibusters and other maneuvers. Most Senators support the AFL-CIO-backed Packwood-DeConcini amendment on corporate bankruptcy, but the Senate has not yet voted on it because of the obstructionist few.

The AFL-CIO-endorsed language would overrule the Supreme Court's recent Bildisco decision and allow corporations to break their union contracts only if it were the only way to stay afloat. It would require employers to negotiate with workers to achieve a workable reorganization plan. And a bankruptcy judge--not the employer--would decide when breaking of contracts is necessary.

Congress has voted to make bankruptcy the pending business when it returns on June 4, and the deadline has been extended again, to June 22.

Helms Amendment Defeated; Would Have Prohibited Unions' Get-Out-the-Vote Drives

The good news is that Sen. Jesse Helms (R-NC) was trounced when he tried to attach to the bankruptcy bill his amendment to strip unions of their political rights.

The Helms amendment would have prohibited unions from spending dues money for political communications to their members, for voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives, and for the costs of administering voluntary contributions to political action committees.

The Helms amendment would not limit the right of corporations to spend corporate treasury funds for the same purposes. With a majority of Senators seeing the unfairness of Helms' amendment, the Senate voted 65-32 in favor of Sen. Mathias' (R-MD) motion to table (kill) the Helms amendment.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to delay no longer in passing a bankruptcy reform bill and to support the Packwood-DeConcini amendment to stop corporate abuse of bankruptcy.

Reagan Revives Youth Subminimum Plan

Summer is approaching, and that means it's time for President Reagan to renew his appeal to Congress for a cut in the minimum wage for those under age 22 seeking summer employment. Instead of $3.35 per hour, youths would receive $2.50 under the Reagan proposal.

Sure enough, the President has stepped up his drumbeat for a subminimum. He would like us to believe that his goal is to reduce unemployment, the idea being that employers will hire more people than they need if wages are lower. Isn't it odd, though, that no matter what the issue or problem the Reagan answer is either (1) more tax cuts for corporations or (2) lower wages.

A subminimum wage is a bad idea for a lot of reasons:

- It would not create new jobs. Employers, especially fast-food chains and others who employ lots of minimum-wage workers, would just be given an incentive to replace those age 22 or older with teens at a 25 percent savings.

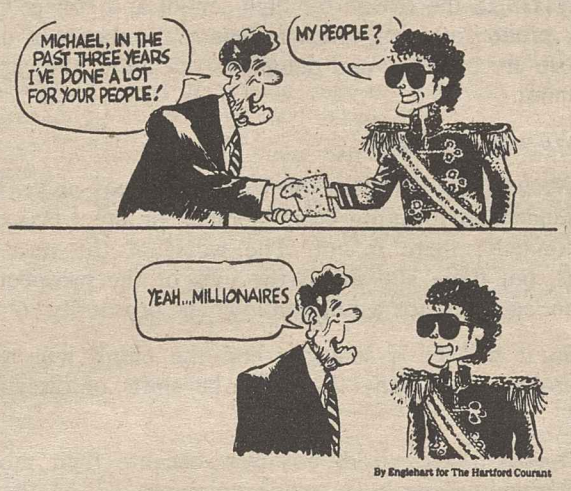
- There already is a subminimum program under which full-time students, handicapped workers and others receive $2.84 per hour. And ajobs tax credit provides an 85 percent tax credit for wages paid to disadvantaged youth in the summer. That tax credit allows employers to hire youths for a net cost of only 50 cents per hour!

- The minimum wage itself is a subminimum. To make up for inflation since January 1981, the $3.35 minimum wage would have to be raised to $3.90. At $3.35 the minimum produces an annual full-time income of less than $7,000.

A Better Approach: Jobs Combined with Schooling and Training

Rep. Gus Hawkins (D-CA) has introduced legislation, H.R. 5017, that offers unemployed youth real opportunity, not just a dead-end low-paying job in a fast-food joint. H.R. 5017 would help provide disadvantaged teens with jobs, part-time during the school year and full-time during part of the summer, combined with schooling, remedial education if needed, or on-the-job or apprenticeship training.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose S. 561, the subminimum wage bill. Urge your Representative to oppose H.R. 485 or any other subminimum bill. Ask your Representative to study H.R. 5017, the Hawkins youth employment bill.



Ellen Goodman

Son of Minimum Wage

The assertion that cutting wages would add 400,000 summer jobs is pure conjecture. The notion that we can give employers a powerful incentive to hire those under 20 without encouraging them to avoid those over 20 is pure fantasy. The penalty in the bill for firing older workers has more loopholes than a pretzel.

At the moment there are 5 million minimum-wage workers in this country. Seventy percent of them are adults. Two-thirds of them are female. There is a high turnover rate in minimum-wage jobs; there is a high degree of seasonal work.

Employers not only could—but would—turn over or pass up older workers for younger workers they could get cheaper. The union leaders who complain that a subminimum wage "would replace dad with junior" are a little wrong (it would replace mom with junior), but the idea is right.

This bill would mean that it is legal to discriminate on the basis of age. It would effectively bar unemployed older workers from competition for these jobs. It would allow young people to be paid less.

We know who the losers would be: the 7 million working teen-agers who might find their paychecks cut, adults working for minimum wage and those willing to work for minimum wage.

Who wins? The big winner is the minimum-wage employer. It's not for nothing they call this the McDonald's Bill. The investment firm Dean Witter once estimated that a subminimum wage would make McDonald's stock jump 31 cents. It may be the unemployed who deserve a break today, but if this bill passes, it's the employers who'll get the break.

At House hearings, OPM Director Donald Devine coaches James Byrnes, author of the "dirty tricks" memo on a scheme to divide union ranks.

Bid to split unions follows pattern of 'dirty trick' memo

By David L. Perlman

Unions representing both blue-collar and white-collar federal employees voiced outrage at a Reagan Administration "dirty tricks" memo that proposed to manipulate a study of pay inequities in order to sow political mischief.

The memo, prepared for Director Donald J. Devine of the Office of Personnel Management, outlined a strategy to create dissension among unions, cause "disorder" in Democratic ranks, and pit the labor movement against the women's movement.

At House hearings, indignation fought with laughter as Devine and the author of the memo sought to portray it as merely an "imaginative" policy option. Its only purpose, Devine said, was to help him make up his mind about a pending pay equity bill.

But the five union officials who attended a limited invitation meeting convened by Devine testified that the OPM director obviously followed the memo's script in his attack on legislation introduced by Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio). Her bill would require OPM to conduct a study of discriminatory pay practices in government.

Leaked memo

At hearings before the Subcommittee on Compensation & Employee Benefits, the validity of the leaked memo was acknowledged by Devine and James L. Byrnes, the $59,000-a-year deputy associate director who wrote it.

Byrnes, a former executive secretary of the Young Republicans Federation, convulsed the hearings by insisting that he wrote the memo because Devine had asked him to put together arguments for the Oakar bill from the viewpoint of "a liberal Democrat."

The resulting memo to Devine noted that there is a "good chance" the pay equity bill will pass the House but suggested that such study could be turned to advantage. It would show how "preposterous" the concept of comparable worth for male and female occupations really is, Byrnes suggested.

But most important, the memo stressed, are "the political possibilities" of doing a study that would match the government's blue-collar workers, whose pay is based on area prevailing wage standards, against salaried white-collar employees.

Such a study "would immediately divide the white-collar and blue-collar unions," in the private sector as well as in government, Byrnes asserted.

"We could create disorder within the Democratic House, pitting union against union and both against radical feminist groups," he said.

Republican opportunity

While this might be "a dangerous course," it offers "opportunities that we should not ignore," the memo declared.

The futility of Devine's apparent attempt to manipulate the diverse concerns of unions in the federal sector was demonstrated by the impressive solidarity at the hearings.

Devine had originally sought to exclude two unions with white-collar as well as blue-collar members, the American Federation of Government Employees and the National Federation of Federal Employees. Both were belatedly invited after they questioned the omission. The AFGE is the largest of the federal-sector unions.

Without exception, they endorsed the goal of pay equity and assailed the OPM's politically motivated distortion of the concept.

Senate action sought

Auto content bill tied to future jobless rate

The United States faces a return to double-digit unemployment if it fails to restrain Japanese auto imports, union leaders warned at Senate hearings.

The Reagan Administration is seeking to block Senate approval of the House-passed auto domestic content bill, and its chief trade negotiator has expressed his opposition even to renewing the existing "voluntary" restriction on Japanese auto exports to the United States.

The union panel, testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee, stressed that the job impact of U.S. auto production extends far beyond the auto assembly lines. The union officials testifying represented job-endangered workers in the steel, tire, textiles and electronics industries.

Retaliation unlikely

Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel challenged the Administration's assertion that a domestic content requirement for autos sold in the United States would touch off a retaliatory trade war.

Samuel pointed out that most of the world's industrial nations have a domestic content requirement—in practice, if not in law—that keeps home industries immune from foreign competition.

Considering Japan's $15 billion automotive trade surplus with the United States, it is not unreasonable to press for Japanese investment in production facilities and parts in the United States, he suggested.

• Rubber Workers President Milan Stone noted that one out of five U.S. jobs is linked to the automobile industry, and the rise of auto imports has corresponded with a decline in U.S. tire manufacturing jobs. Nineteen domestic tire plants closed between 1978 and 1982, he testified.

Stone reminded the committee that Akron, Ohio, where the union has its headquarters, was once known as the tire capital of the nation. But now, "Akron produces only a few experimental and racing tires, and some aircraft tires—no passenger car or truck tires."

• Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch stressed the heavy loss of steel industry jobs and the shutdown of 150 steel-producing facilities in the past two years alone. Despite the downsizing of automobiles, each automobile produced in the United States uses an average of one ton of steel, Lynch noted.

Passage of a domestic content requirement would mean some 55,000 new jobs in this decade, he testified.

• Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman told the committee that eight plants that once made auto component products such as carpeting, upholstery fabric, soundproofing panels and items from tire cord to seat belts have shut down completely since 1978. "Those that have managed to continue operating have

Staggering trade deficits pose new peril to economy

By James M. Shevis

The nation's foreign trade deficit soared higher in April, rising a record $12.2 billion, and posing a serious threat to the American economy.

It was the fourth consecutive month in which the deficit reached new heights, and brought the total for the January-April period to $42 billion. It was $69.4 billion for all of last year.

Analysis of the deficit shows an even gloomier situation for American workers.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald noted that the April deficit in manufacturing trade was more than five times greater than in April 1983.

"So far in 1984 the manufacturing trade deficit has grown to $29.2 billion," he said. "Should this trend continue, manufacturing deficits will reach almost $90 billion by year end, and total merchandise trade will be in deficit by more than $125 billion."

Oswald pointed out that as recently as 1980 the United States experienced a surplus in manufacturing trade. "These tremendous deficits are playing a major role in the industrial decline of the country and are a major contributor to our enduring high unemployment."

Imports rose in nearly every category of goods and product. The incoming flood of foreign autos rose in value to $2.78 billion, up about $300 million from March. Trucks and bus imports were other large gainers.

The Commerce Dept., which released the latest report on U.S. trade with other countries, now projects the deficit this

Bargaining saves jobs and wages at bankrupt firm

New union agreements have been negotiated with bankrupt Revere Copper & Brass, Inc. without cutting back wages or the jobs of its 1,750 employees.

The three-year contracts were worked out by a coordinated bargaining committee of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. to keep the pay and benefits of Revere workers on a par with the troubled copper and brass industry as the company strives to regain solvency.

The contracts were ratified by members of the Auto Workers, Machinists and Mechanics Educational Society employed at Revere plants in Rome, N.Y.; New Bedford, Mass; Oneonta, Ala.; Clinton, Ill., and Newport, Ark.

"The company, despite its Chapter 11 filing in the fall of 1982, continued to honor its existing contracts," IUD Collective Bargaining Coordinator Joe Campagna observed.

Cooperative spirit

"We salute their spirit of cooperation at a time when so many other corporations are using bankruptcy as a tool to escape from existing labor agreements."

For the past 18-24 months, there has been a rash of bankruptcy proceedings initiated by companies in an attempt to void union contracts, particularly in the meatpacking and airline industries.

The Supreme Court's Bildisco decision in February considerably strengthened the hand of employers in bankruptcy cases.

Trade deficit poses threat to recovery year will hit $130 billion, up $20 billion from its earlier forecast.

The April import surge of $29.7 billion was 6.1 percent above the previous high of $28 billion in March. Imports grew in the first four months of this year to an annual rate of $338.4 billion.

At the same time, exports declined slightly last month and at $17.5 billion were 1.1 percent below the March level.

Imports of shoes last month rose to a level 54.2 percent above that of April 1983. Footwear manufacturers and unions in the industry, pointing to the 17.3 percent jobless rate for American shoe workers during the first quarter, renewed their call for government action.

Steel industry representatives also called for government action as imports captured more than 25 percent of the domestic market. The industry seeks a five-year, 15-percent limit on imported steel.

"It is impossible to understand how government officials can look at the broad scope of the steel import problem, and not see the need for a comprehensive response," said Sheldon Wesson of the American Iron & Steel Institute.

Growing oil bill

The high oil import bill—over $5.5 billion in April—reflected import volume of 6.2 million barrels a day, compared to 5.6 million barrels daily in March.

The monthly trade deficit with Japan was $2.65 billion, down slightly from March. The monthly deficit with the European Economic Community also declined, from $1.65 billion in March to $1.39 billion in April. The deficit with Canada and the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries doubled, however.

The strength of the U.S. dollar and high interest rates are big factors in the trade deficit problem. But Oswald cited two other reasons for the huge imbalance: the Reagan Administration's unsound monetary and fiscal policies and the absence of a coherent and effective trade policy.

The large Reagan budget deficits have created the need for greater government credit, which in turn helps keep interest rates high, he observed.

"The really sad part of this story is not just that each month it gets progressively worse," said C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics, and the Treasury Dept.'s top trade official in the Carter Administration.

"It's that there's no end in sight."

Fire Fighters' awards honor top-notch media coverage

The Fire Fighters gave awards to 35 entries in the 1984 IAFF Media Awards Contest to honor outstanding journalistic achievement in portraying the professionalism of fire fighting and the hazards faced by fire fighters.

"The high quality of professional journalism evident throughout the hundreds of entries from the United States and Canada is a credit to the news media of our two countries," IAFF President John A. Gannon said. "The entries are outstanding examples of the value of educating the public about the need for strong, effective professional fire services."

First prize winners, who received a plaque and $500, are Nancy Menefee of the Maryland Gazette of Glen Burnie, Md., and Chuck Cook and Marla Cone of the Register of Orange County, Calif., for best news or feature story in newspapers below and above 100,000 circulation respectively.

The top award in the best news or feature photo category went to Bill Eisner of the Northeast Detroiter in Detroit, for papers under 100,000 circulation, and to John J. Spink of the Kansas City Times for papers over 100,000.

The top television news prize went to the news staff of WKBW-TV in Buffalo, while the radio editorial comment award went to Dave Lockhart, CKCW, in Moncton, N.B., Canada.

The top local union publication was the Los Angeles Firefighter, produced by IAFF Local 112. The runner-up prize went to the Seattle Fire Fighter of IAFF Local 27.

Second place prize winners received certificates and $250, while the honorable mentions in each of the seven categories were awarded certificates.

Contest judges were John M. Barry, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News; James Casey, retired editor of Fire Engineer magazine and Jeff Sheler of the Washington staff of U.S. News & World Report magazine.

Teachers flunk Reagan on education

The Teachers sharply refuted Reagan Administration claims that its efforts on education have reaped major success since the "Nation at Risk" report by the National Commission on Excellence in Education a year ago.

After nearly a full term in office, President Reagan has flunked the course when it comes to education," AFT President Albert Shanker said.

At a recent Rose Garden ceremony honoring high school recipients of the President's Academic Fitness Award, Reagan said, "education is back on the agenda" because of the commission's report.

"The federal government is doing its part," Reagan said, by "taking a new look" at violence in the schools, drop-out rates and truancy.

Earlier, Education Sec. Terrel H. Bell released a 229-page report, "The Nation Responds," which he said shows "the biggest reform in the history of American education."

Bell said the report found 48 states are considering tougher high school graduation requirements and 35 states have approved changes. Eight states have lengthened the school day, seven have lengthened the school year and 24 states are now studying master teacher or career ladder programs.

But Shanker said, "Rose Garden ceremonies and patting yourself on the back doesn't deliver reforms in education. The real delivery comes from what's happening in state legislatures, Congress and in positive efforts coming from the White House."

"Unfortunately, the White House has been short on delivery during the Reagan Administration," Shanker said. "This Administration is the one that cut education funding, not increased it," and "this is the Administration of tuition tax credits, school prayer and vouchers.'

Shanker said the union "welcomed with open arms the many reform reports of 1983." But he said that much of the credit must go to state governors, business leaders and teachers groups.

"Unlike the Reagan Administration, however, the AFT does not believe that fostering excellence in education can be accomplished through rhetoric and self-congratulation," Shanker said.

"We do believe, and strongly so, that in cutting funds for education programs for the poor, the handicapped, and the non-English speaking—programs that worked—this Administration has not only reneged on the nation's commitment to equal opportunity, it also has severely damaged the prospects for achieving excellence in education."

State and local governments may mandate tougher academic standards, but Shanker warned that "unless we provide the resources, programs, and extra help necessary for students to meet these standards, we are offering American children a lesson in cynicism and a course in failure."

IAM ratifies agreement at McDonnell Douglas

St. Louis—Machinists at McDonnell Douglas Corp.'s aircraft assembly plant here approved an industry-pattern agreement providing improvements for 9,600 workers.

IAM members ratified the pact by a vote of 5,095 to 1,996. The three-year contract provides annual lump-sum payments equal to 3 percent of pay, restricts cost-of-living adjustments to higher-paid workers, improves pensions, sets lower pay rates for new hires, and requires employees to contribute to a new health insurance coverage plan.

The agreement follows the pattern of the company's earlier settlements with IAM and the Auto Workers at its West Coast plants.

Senate stalls bankruptcy law changes

The labor-supported amendment to the federal bankruptcy law that was before the Senate when it began a holiday recess on May 24 will still be before the Senate when it reconvenes on June 4.

At issue is how close the Senate will come to the bill the House passed last March in an effort to remedy a Supreme Court decision that gave employers almost a free hand to use bankruptcy proceedings as an excuse for tearing up a union contract.

The House bill, and the Senate language the AFL-CIO supports, would require an employer to bargain over any contract changes and would set tight restrictions on the circumstances when a bankruptcy judge could modify an existing union contract.

The amendment, cosponsored by Senators Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) and Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.), is in effect a substitute for a largely token change supported by business groups and Senators Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) and Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah).

If the Packwood-DeConcini proposal had come to a vote before the recess, union lobbyists are convinced, it would have passed. But opponents maneuvered to block a vote and Congress avoided a deadline for legislation to appoint new bankruptcy judges by passing another temporary extension of existing law—until June 20.

The stopgap extension was the third time Congress had extended the law after the Senate's failure to break the deadlock over the labor contract provisions.

Union advocate, foe of apartheid, wins libel suit

A former South African trade union activist—now the coordinator of an AFL-CIO program supporting black unionists in that country—has won a libel suit against a British author and publishing firm that had questioned his loyalty to a banned political organization he helped shape in South Africa.

The allegation against Nana Mahomo, who is now with the African-American Labor Center, appeared in a book written by Gordon Winter and published by Penguin Books, Ltd., in 1981 under the title "Inside Boss." The book was advertised as "an ex-spy's dramatic and shocking exposé" and purported to deal with Winter's experiences as a spy for the South African intelligence authorities.

A passage in the book implied that Mahomo was used by the Central Intelligence Agency to try to overthrow the leadership of the Pan Africanist Congress, an equal rights group.

The defendants, Winter and Penguin, admitted in open court "there was no foundation" for the accusation and apologized to Mahomo "for the embarrassment and distress which this allegation has caused him."
